REPORTS of CASES ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS at DOCTORS' COMMONS and in the HIGH COURT of DELEGATES. By J. ADDAMS, LL.D., an Advocate in Doctors' Commons. Vol. I. Containing Cases from Hilary Term, 1822, to Trinity Term, 1823, inclusive. In Continuation of the ECCLESIASTICAL REPORTS of Dr. PHILLIMORE. London, 1823.

[1] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS; AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

PERRIN v. PERRIN. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1822.—The wife's incontinence in her single state not pleadable in the first instance by the husband in a suit for a separation à mensâ et thoro, by reason of adultery against the wife.

(On the admission of the libel.)

This was a suit for a separation à mensâ et thoro, by reason of adultery, promoted by William Perrin against his wife Frances Eleanor Perrin.

The three first articles of the libel pleaded in substance the marriage of the parties on the 7th of April, 1818, and their subsequent cohabitation as husband and wife, until the 26th of February, 1820. The fourth article then went on to plead,

"That on Saturday the said 26th day of February, in the year 1820, the said William Perrin was informed, and it then for the first time came to his knowledge, that his wife the said Frances Eleanor [2] Perrin had, previous to their aforesaid marriage, carried on a lewd and criminal intercourse with a person named , by whom she had become pregnant, and that she had been delivered of a male child, begotten on her body by the said , that she had also, previous to their said marriage, carried on a like intercourse with another person named , by whom she had also become pregnant, and that she had been delivered of a female child, begotten on her body by the said ; and that she the said Frances Eleanor Perrin had, since her said marriage, continued to receive from the first of her said paramours an allowance of 40l. per annum, and an allowance of 20l. per annum from the second. That on receiving such information the said William Perrin, in the presence and hearing of her mother Frances Hislop, and others their mutual friends, charged his said wife with the misconduct hereinbefore pleaded; the several circumstances of which she, the said Frances Eleanor Perrin, then and there admitted to be true. That the said William Perrin thereupon determined to, and did accordingly, separate himself from his said wife, and on the following Monday, the 28th day of the said month of February, quitted his house in Pitt's Place, leaving his said wife therein, and did not return to the same; that on the 13th day of the month of March following, a deed of separation was entered into and executed, by and between the said William Perrin on the one part, and the said Frances Eleanor Perrin and Frances Hislop on the other part, whereby it was agreed that the said William Perrin and Frances Eleanor [3] Perrin should live separate and apart from each other, and that the said William Perrin should make his said wife an allowance of 1l. 11s. 6d. per week for her board and maintenance; that the weekly allowance aforesaid was regularly paid by the said William Perrin from the time of the execution of the said deed of separation up to Saturday the 25th day of August last (1821) inclusive, in the beginning of which month the facts after pleaded first came to the knowledge of the said William Perrin."

The subsequent articles of the libel pleaded various acts of adultery committed by the wife after the separation, which, coming to the husband's knowledge, gave occasion to the present suit.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The objections to the admission of this libel are confined to the fourth article, which pleads the incontinence of the wife with two persons, neither of whom is an alleged adulterer in the cause, prior to the celebration of the marriage. It is objected that the marriage was a waiver of all former misconduct on the part of the wife; that as no sentence of separation can be founded on the wife's incontinence prior to the marriage it is improperly mixed up in a suit which is limited in its object to the obtaining of that sentence; and that the effect of its introduction is injurious to the wife, as disposing the Court to a belief of those charges which, being proved to its satisfaction, it is bound to pronounce as prayed by the husband.

[4] It is said, however, on the other hand, that the matter objected to is pleaded, not to criminate the wife, but in apology for the conduct of the husband—and to apprize the Court of the fact that the parties were living separate and apart at the time when the adultery in question is alleged to have been committed. But to compass this last object, which is all that is requisite, it will be sufficient if the fact of separation be pleaded generally, without a detail of the circumstances under which that separation was had. All which it is necessary, and, therefore, all which it is proper, for the Court to be informed of is that the parties, at the time in question, were living separate by mutual consent. If indeed the wife should set up a case of desertion by the husband, without any provocation on her part, her antenuptial misconduct might be fairly pleaded in his justification. It might, possibly, too, be fairly pleaded by the husband, responsively to the wife's libel, in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. But, in this stage, at least, of the present cause, I am of opinion that its allegation is improper, and, consequently, I direct the fourth article of this libel to be reformed,(a) by the omission of that part of [5] it which pleads the wife's incontinence in her single state. The wife, by these means, is precluded from suffering any injury by the production of extraneous matter unfavourable to her defence; and even the husband may be ultimately benefited in being saved the expence of going into proof of facts which, after all, may have little bearing upon the real question at issue in this cause.

CHICHESTER v. THE MARQUESS AND MARCHIONESS OF DONEGAL. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1822.—If a party cited as within the jurisdiction of an Ecclesiastical Court, though actually resident within another jurisdiction, appear and submit to the suit, such original defendant (a fortiori one cited to see proceedings by such original defendant) is bound to the jurisdiction.—Quære, whether a citation of the wife, at the domicile of the husband, is not sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Court in a suit, even of nullity of marriage against the wife, wheresoever the wife may be actually resident?—Steps taken by the

(a) The article stood as reformed,—

"That in the month of February, in the year 1820, some unhappy differences having arisen between the said William Perrin and Frances Eleanor Perrin his wife, it was mutually agreed between them, that they should thenceforth live separate and apart from each other; and that the said William Perrin should make his said wife an allowance of 1l. 11s. 6d. per week for her board and maintenance; that accordingly on Monday, the 28th day of February, the said William Perrin quitted his said house in Pitt's Place, leaving his said wife therein, and did not return to the same; that the weekly allowance aforesaid was from that time regularly paid to the said Frances Eleanor Perrin by the said William Perrin, up to Saturday, the 25th day of August last, inclusive, in the beginning of which month the facts after pleaded first came to the knowledge of the said William Perrin."

The omission of the "deed of separation" in the article, as reformed, was occasioned by the counsel for Mrs. Perrin insisting on its being annexed to the libel, if it were specifically pleaded.

Judge à quo on the same Court-day, but after appeal entered; and subsequent thereto, but prior to the service of the inhibition and subsequent to, even the service of the inhibition, the defendant not being founded in his first appeal, held to be no attentats.

(An appeal from the Consistory Court of London.)

This was a cause of nullity of marriage by reason (as alleged) of minority, promoted and brought originally in the Consistory Court of London by the Most Honorable George Augustus Marquess [6] of Donegal, of the parish of St. Mary-le-bone, in the county of Middlesex, and diocese of London, and province of Canterbury, against the Most Honorable Charlotte Anna, Marchioness of Donegal (wife of the said Most Honorable George Augustus Marquess of Donegal), the said Marchioness of Donegal being, in such cause, described as Charlotte Anna May, spinster, falsely calling herself Marchioness of Donegal, of the parish of St. James's, in the county, diocese, and province aforesaid.

The history of this cause, and the proceedings had in it, are so fully detailed in the judgment,(a) that any preliminary statement of them would be mere tautology.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the Consistory Court of London, where the suit was originally depending. It was a cause of nullity of marriage "by reason of minority, and want of legal consent," promoted by the Marquess of Donegal against the Marchioness of Donegal, or, as she is described in the proceedings, against Charlotte Anna May, spinster, falsely calling herself Marchioness of Donegal.

The citation was returned on the 2d Session of Easter Term, 1821, and on the same day an appearance was given for the party cited, and a libel prayed. That libel was brought in on the 3d session, or next following Court day—on which day a decree to see proceedings in the cause, [7] with the usual intimation, was taken out against Arthur Chichester and George Chichester, Esqrs., the lawful nephews of the plaintiff, and against Sir Arthur Chichester, Bart., and the Rev. Edward Chichester, clerk, two collateral kinsmen in the next degree—the presumptive heirs in succession, to the plaintiff's honors and estates, in the event of marriage with the defendant, sought to be impugned in the present suit, being pronounced null and void. This "decree to see proceedings" was directed to issue by the Judge, on motion of counsel, and at the instance of the defendant. It was returned, duly served upon three of the parties cited, on the 4th session. A decree, by letters of request, was served upon George Chichester, Esq., the fourth party cited, in another diocese—and was returned on the 1st Session of Trinity Term.

On the 4th Session of Easter Term the Judge admitted the libel, to which the proctor for the marchioness (confessing only the marriage as pleaded) gave a negative issue. At the same time, by way of further answer to the libel, he asserted, and then brought in, an allegation, which stood for admission on the 1st session of the ensuing term. On the same day, the Judge, on motion of counsel, founded upon affidavits of the witness's age and infirmity, permitted Dame Elizabeth May, widow, to be examined upon this allegation de bene esse. Afterwards, sitting the Court, a proctor appeared for Arthur Chichester, Esq., but under protest to the jurisdiction of the Court, which he asserted that he would be ready to extend by the next Court day; and prayed that no examination de bene esse of [8] Dame Elizabeth May should be had in the interval—to which prayer however the Judge, after hearing counsel on both sides, refused to accede.

The act entered into, on the part of Mr. Arthur Chichester, on one side, and of the Marquess and Marchioness of Donegal, severally, on the other, was not sped and concluded till the bye-day of the following term. It was argued on the 28th of July; and, further, on the 1st of August, two sittings of the Court after term; when the Judge was pleased, as the minute expresses it, "to overrule the protest so far as respected the jurisdiction of the Court by reason of the alleged residence of the party originally cited." From this order of Court the proctor for Mr. Chichester appealed instanter; and was assigned to prosecute his appeal by the 1st session of the next term. The Judge then proceeded to admit to proof the allegation brought in on the part of the marchioness, which had stood on admission ever since the 4th session of the preceding term, and a decree for answers, compulsories, and commissions, and requisitions for taking the evidence, were directed to issue in the ordinary course. On the same day Dame Elizabeth May was produced as a witness, and subsequently examined. All this in the presence, and without opposition on the part, of the proctor for the marquess. No further step appears to have been taken in the cause till the 15th of August, when other witnesses were produced and admitted before a surrogate, whose examinations were taken in due course.

The inhibition in this Court was extracted on the 17th of September, was served on the 24th; and [9] was returned on the 1st Session of Michaelmas Term. The libel of appeal was brought in on the 4th session—and, on the bye-day of that term, its admission was opposed, as not disclosing, upon the face of it, an appealable grievance. But the Court was of opinion that this objection could only be taken by an appearance under protest to the inhibition. The Court therefore admitted the libel of appeal, as declining to pronounce upon the merits of the appeal, with nothing before it but the libel only. The process has been since brought in, in proof of that libel, and the appeal has been solemnly argued—and it now becomes the duty of the Court to pronounce, upon full information, on the whole matter of the alleged grievance.

The pleadings and prayers on either side are, in substance, to this effect. The libel pleads that the party against whom the proceedings are had was illegitimate—was a minor—and was married by license, with no other consent than that of her putative father. It prays therefore a sentence, pronouncing and declaring the said marriage to have been null and void, by reason that a putative father is incompetent to give that consent to the marriage of a minor, by license, which is required by the marriage act (Horner v. Liddiard, Consistory, 24th May, 1799).

The defence set up is, not the defendant's legitimacy, or that her putative father's consent to her marriage was valid in law; but it is—that she was a major at the time of her marriage, notwithstanding her supposed minority; and, consequently, that she was capable of contracting lawful matrimony [10] by license, without any consent at all. Her allegation pleads that she was born in the month of March, 1774, and, therefore, that she was twenty-one years and nearly five months old when married to the plaintiff (then Lord Belfast) in the month of August, 1795. On this ground it is prayed that the marriage so had, and sought to be impugned on the suggestions made in the libel, may be pronounced good and valid.

And here, in the first place, I must observe that this allegation, upon the face of it, discloses the defendant's case as to the single material fact, with the utmost particularity. It specifies the exact time and place of the mother's delivery in 1774; it vouches, by name, the parties immediately privy to that delivery, as the midwife, the nurse, &c.; distinguishing, as it goes, those who are dead from the survivors. It establishes (in plea that is) the identity of the infant so born with the present defendant, by circumstances which, if established in evidence, are conclusive of that fact. It not simply, therefore, apprizes an adverse party of the nature of the case set up in defence, but fully instructs him how, and where, measures may be taken, and inquiries made, by which, if other than genuine, that case may be met and refuted.

Nor can the Court in this place omit also to observe, upon the substance of the decree, to see proceedings which have issued in the cause. For this is not, as has been suggested, a compulsory process, menacing the parties cited with any penalty in case of non-appearance—it merely invites them to become parties to the suit, if they deem it their interest so to do—with intimation—that otherwise the suit [11] will proceed in their absence. The decree therefore was hardly more than a legal notice of suit; and to what inconvenience it could subject the parties cited is not very obvious: it left them at liberty to appear or not to appear, to act or not to act in the cause, ad libita.

The grievances on the part of the Judge of the Consistory specially appealed from, as set forth in the several instruments of appeal, are, 1st, "That he, the said Judge, overruled the protest entered on the part of Arthur Chichester, Esq., to the citation issued and returned against him, to see the proceedings in the cause, so far as respected the jurisdiction of the Court by reason of the alleged residence of the party originally cited;" and, secondly, that he "proceeded to do further acts in the cause (to wit, by admitting an allegation, and granting a decree for answers, compulsories, &c.), notwithstanding an appeal from the protest being so, in part, overruled, was entered, instanter, by the proctor for the said Arthur Chichester, and deferred to, on the part of the Judge, by the assignation of a term for the prosecution of the said appeal." It will be proper, therefore, or convenient at least, to consider these heads of grievance in the order in which they thus present themselves.

When Mr. Arthur Chichester, the present appellant, appeared in the Court below under protest—he was assigned, technically speaking, "to extend his protest;" that is, to state his grounds of exception to the jurisdiction of the Court in a sort of informal plea, which is termed in our Courts, "an act of petition." The very object of that assignation was that such grounds of exception [12] should be stated, specifically, and distinctly so, that both the Court and the adverse party might be duly apprized of them; and in order that the latter might furnish, if able so to do, a counterstatement upon any matter either of law or fact. Now, upon adverting to the act of Court, which I must presume to have been entered into with this view, I am rather surprised at the present appeal. For the act, as originally extended, has not one word in respect to Lady Donegal's residence in Ireland, but alleges grounds of protest of quite a distinct and dissimilar nature. The grounds of protest stated in the act are, that no instance occurs of the issue of a similar process in any suit of nullity of marriage, where the alleged ground of nullity was a breach of the marriage act; that as no remainderman can institute this species of suit for his own benefit, so neither is he compellable to become a party to it for that of any body else; that the party cited has no direct, immediate, interest in the point at issue in the cause; and that neither the proceedings had, nor the sentence pronounced in it, will be, legally, binding on him. The act, therefore, prays that the Judge will, for all these several reasons, pronounce "the said Arthur Chichester, Esq., to have been unduly and illegally cited, and will dismiss him from any further observance of justice in the cause, with costs." In support of that prayer it goes on to charge that "the proceedings carrying on in the suit between the Marquess and Marchioness of Donegal are collusive;" and that the object of the suit is "to uphold a pretended marriage by fraud and connivance:" and, in verification of this charge, it travels into a variety of extraneous matter (par-[13]-ticularly as with reference to certain affairs of Lord Belfast, the plaintiff's eldest son, in the year 1819), not very regularly introduced, it must be admitted, into a mere question of protest. Now, it is obvious that all this had nothing whatever to do with the jurisdiction of the Court below, so far as it depended on "the residence of Lady Donegal in Ireland." And yet the Courts pronouncing for its jurisdiction, notwithstanding such residence, originally constituted the sole, as it still does the principal, grievance that is drawn by the present appeal into this Court.

The protest, so extended, was replied to, severally, on the parts of both Lord and Lady Donegal; the latter insisting on the propriety of the decree taken out, on grounds to which I shall presently have occasion to advert; and both denying, explicitly, the charge of collusion, either in the institution, or conduct, of the suit. It is in a rejoinder on this reply that the alleged fact of residence first discloses itself; namely, that Lady Donegal "had been continually for the four years last past, and then was, resident in Ireland." Now it is manifest, as well from its place or position in the act, as from the immediate context of this averment,(a) that it was [14] origin-

(a) "And the said Shephard (the proctor for Mr. Chicester) further alleged that whereas it is alleged by the said Gleunie (proctor for the Marquess of Donegal) that his said party, the said Marquess of Donegal, instituted proceedings against his said wife, without her concurrence and against her approbation, and denied that in the said suit the libel or allegation, or other proceedings, have been concerted, agreed upon, or settled by or between, and in behalf of the said Marquess of Donegal and Charlotte Anna May, calling herself Marchioness of Donegal: now the said Shephard denied the same to be true, and alleged that the said Charlotte Anna May, falsely calling herself Marchioness of Donegal, has been continually for upwards of four years last past, and still is, resident in Ireland—that the citation in this cause issued under seal of this Court on the 12th day of May last, and that, on the 14th of the same month, the letters missive of the Judge of this Court were shewn by the officer to the said Blake (the proctor for the Marchioness of Donegal), who undertook to accept the service thereof for the said marchioness, and to appear and defend this suit; and that the citation was returned into Court by the said Glennie on the 18th of May, and an ally introduced into the cause for a mere incidental purpose; namely, that of fixing on the original parties in the suit, a charge of collusion; and not as a ground of protest, properly so called. The matter therefore of residence, as applying to the jurisdiction of the Court, between Lord and Lady Donegal, was a mere objection, taken by counsel in the argument upon the protest; and how the over-ruling that "objection" (for such the minute should have termed it, and not "a part of the protest," since of the protest, properly speaking, it formed no part) can be a matter of appeal at all is first to be considered. Possibly the alleged fact of residence might be untrue, and might stand uncontradicted, simply from the adverse parties not being aware of the supposed bearing of that fact upon the question of jurisdiction. They might possibly, and not very unreasonably, think that the charge of collusion itself was too immaterial to the question of jurisdiction to call for the particular negation of any fact adduced merely in support of that charge. At any rate the proof of the alleged fact, which rests simply upon the affidavit of a [15] Mr. Robinson,(a)[1] as to "hearing and belief," is of the slenderest possible description.

Now, to apply these observations to the present question of appeal. The prayer of the act, as I have already stated, was, that the Judge would pronounce Mr. Arthur Chichester to have been "unduly cited," and would "dismiss him with costs;" and this upon grounds not including, but wholly foreign to, the matter of Lady Donegal's residence in Ireland. In the course of the argument upon that act an objection is taken to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the suit at all, even as between Lord and Lady Donegal, on the ground of such residence; which the Judge of that Court might, I think, very properly over-rule, as not considering it part of the protest: though whether he so over-ruled it, upon that, or upon any other consideration, is a point on which I am uninformed. But how the over-ruling of that objection, upon any consideration, could be a grievance on the present appellant—a party cited merely to see the proceedings in the cause—is what I am wholly at a loss to discover. The Judge of the Consistory Court, in making the order appealed from, neither assigned this party "to appear absolutely," nor refuse to "dismiss him," as prayed in his protest—that matter—the whole matter of protest, properly speaking—stood undetermined. Possibly the Judge, but for the intervention of the appeal, might have pro-[16]-ceeded, on the same Court day, to dismiss this party. I say possibly—for I would be understood as intimating no opinion of the probability of such an event. I rather, perhaps, infer that the contrary was probable. In suffering or ordering this decree to issue the Judge appealed from appears to have considered that it could at least lead to no injustice to give parties so deeply interested, as those in remainder, notice of the proceedings, and to afford them an opportunity of intervening, if they thought it for their interest, leaving it for them to choose whether they would appear or not. He seems to have conceived that as persons in remainder had been allowed to bring suits of nullity, to declare a marriage void, by reason of consanguinity, as in the case of Maynard v. Heselrige,(a)[2] and in other instances; so, by analogy, and upon principle, they might also possibly be entitled, even to institute such an original suit under the marriage act, though no instance had yet occurred—the more especially, as the marriage act itself is of no very remote antiquity, and as suits of nullity, under that act, were, comparatively, unfrequent, till in quite modern times. Perhaps he concluded, at the same time, that it was unnecessary for him to dismiss the party, as the party might attain the effect of that dismissal by the simple process of not appearing. But upon these and similar points the Court below intimated no opinion, and still less does this Court; they were undetermined by the Judge from whom this appeal is brought, and they have scarcely been touched upon, even in [17] argument before me. I desire therefore to be understood as expressing no opinion whatever, whether the Judge of the Consistory would have done right, or would have done appearance immediately given thereto on the part of the said marchioness by the said Blake."

(a)[1] "And this deponent saith that he hath heard and verily believes that the said Charlotte Anna May, calling herself Marchioness of Donegal, hath been continually for four years last past, or thereabouts, and still is, resident in Ireland." Affidavit of Mr. Stratford Robinson, sworn on the 18th July, 1821.

wrong, in complying with the prayer of the protest; but under that protest, the want of jurisdiction as between the parties principal on account of the residence of the defendant not being regularly before the Court—not being a part of the protest, properly so called, as extended in the act, I am strongly disposed to hold that the over-ruling of a mere objection on that account, taken at the hearing (and which the other parties had not been called upon to answer, eo intuitu, by the act), was no matter of appeal.

But taking it, on the other hand, that the defendant's residence in Ireland was made a part of his protest by the present appellant, in the Court below, still I am of opinion that the Court below was perfectly correct in pronouncing for its jurisdiction. It is certainly true that both the canon (vide Gib. Cod. 1004, 1008) and the statute law (23 Hen. 8, c. 9 (the bill of citations)) forbid the citing of parties out of their dioceses, or peculiar jurisdictions. But it is equally true that the rule, at least in the statute law (vide preamble of 23 Hen. 8, c. 9), was meant for the benefit of the subject; which benefit it hath uniformly, as far as I see, been held to provide for sufficiently, by giving defendants who are so cited a privilege of pleading to the jurisdiction. Consequently, if a party who is so cited once waive that privilege, by appearing and submitting to the suit, he or she is bound to [18] the jurisdiction (see Hetley, 19, 1 Vent. 61, Carth. 33, Show. 161, &c.). What then was the condition of the present defendant at the period of this protest? A citation had issued, describing her as "resident within the diocese of London" (b)[1]—to that citation she had appeared. A libel was given, pleading the fact of her residence within the same diocese—on that libel she had joined issue. She had not objected to the jurisdiction of the Court below, at the time when the point appealed from was determined by that Court; nor has she yet objected, as far as I am aware, to the jurisdiction of this Court. I have carefully looked through all the authorities to which I have been referred, in the course of the argument (vide n. (a), supra), by the counsel on both sides; and I am satisfied that no objection, on the ground of residence, to the jurisdiction of the Consistory Court could, in that stage of the proceeding, have been taken even by the original defendant. Still less then could it be taken by this defendant (if indeed the term defendant is applicable to a party cited merely to see proceedings by the original defendant); and who, to crown the whole, is cited within his diocese. What possible injury, or inconvenience, can this party have sustained from the [19] suit being prosecuted in the Court appealed from? (a) Neither the spirit, nor letter even, of the canon and statute law are applicable to him. That it was competent for this party to object the residence of the original defendant (appearing too, and under protest, to a process taken out by that very defendant) is a conclusion at which I should have some difficulty in arriving, even were I to hold, which I do not, that it was competent to the original defendant, in that stage of the proceeding, to have objected this matter of residence so as to oust the jurisdiction of the Consistory Court for herself.

But, lastly, independent of all this, could even the original defendant have taken this objection with effect, in any stage of the proceeding; or, in other words, was not the Consistory Court of London the legal jurisdiction notwithstanding her actual residence, as alleged, during a certain period in Ireland? A party may have two domiciles, the one actual, the other legal; and, primâ facie at least, the husband's actual, and the wife's legal, domicile are one, wheresoever the wife may be, personally, resident. (b)[2] Now it is admitted that the husband's domicile is [20] within the diocese

(b)[1] Had the citation described her as resident in Ireland or elsewhere, out of the local jurisdiction of the Court, the error would have been fatal; possibly if objected even after sentence; as the Court's want of jurisdiction would have been apparent on the face of the record. The Judge too in that case would have been clearly liable to the penalties denounced in the bill of citations, namely, the forfeiture of double damages and costs to the party, and of 10l. (for every person so cited), half to the King, and half to the informer, to be recovered in a qui tam action.

(a) Upon similar principles his Honor, the Vice-Chancellor, when applied to, on behalf of Mr. Chichester, for a prohibition to restrain the Consistory Court of London from proceeding in this suit, refused the prohibition. Vice-Chancellor's Court, 4th August, 1821.

(b)[2] Upon this principle of the domicile of the husband being the legal domicile of the wife, I apprehend that a citation of the wife at the domicile of the husband is of London. Mr. Chichester, too, has even alleged in his act that the parties are still cohabiting; nor can it be suggested that they were living asunder, under any legal separation, at the commencement of this suit. Lady Donegal has a right, and is bound, whensoever called upon, to return to the marquess's domicile, provided her marriage is, what she contends it to have been, a good and valid marriage: so that upon this, independent of other considerations, London appears to me to have been sufficiently the residence, or domicile, of the defendant, to found the jurisdiction of the Consistory Court of London in a suit of this description. Add to this, that the parties were married in London—it is therefore the "forum contractus"—also, that the validity of the marriage is to be pronounced upon by the law matrimonial of this country, not of Ireland; a country to which our marriage act does not extend; and the law of which, we all know, to be materially different from that of England, as to what is, and what constitutes, a valid marriage—a consideration upon which alone to have instituted this proceeding in Ireland, the only other alternative, would have savoured strongly of that fraud and collusion, imputations of which are so liberally cast in the act of Court. In every view, therefore, which the Court can take of the subject, it is of opinion that the Judge of the Court appealed from was right in over-ruling the objection taken on behalf of the present appellant.

It still, however, remains to be considered whether he was equally correct in proceeding in the suit, as between the principal parties, notwithstanding, and after, an appeal entered from the first head of [21] grievance—that just disposed of—by the present appellant. Now I take it that in appeals, at least from grievances, the hands of the Court are in no case tied up till the service of the inhibition; (a) and that what, or whether any intermediate steps shall be taken, depends upon the particular circumstances of the case, the Judge of the Court exercising, in that respect, a sound legal discretion. If it be said that the Judge, in this case, had tied up his own hands, by deferring to the appeal, I answer that it rested with this Court, and not with him, to determine whether the matter in fact appealed from was, or was not, in its nature, an appealable grievance; (b) and, consequently, that he was bound to defer to the appeal, so far as the mere assigning of a term to prosecute can be construed a deference to it.(c)

Maranta, for instance, limits this, it is true, to cases in which appeals are not prohibited by law; and in the number of appeals which are prohibited by law, he reckons, by a reference to a former passage [ib. 335, 336], "appellationes frivolæ," that is, "vanæ et inanes, et sine justa causâ interpositæ, quæ nullum poterint sortiri juris effectum," so that in these "non tenetur judex appellationi deferre."* But it is apprehended

* "Quando autem," says Lancellott [2 pars. c. 12, lim. 6, n. 27, 28], "appellatio quæ de jure tanquam frivola non fuisset admittenda, fuisset de facto admittenda, facit attentata, &c.;" and to the same purport Maranta [ubi sup. n. 171] and others. But it not only seems highly unreasonable in itself, except in extreme cases, and hardly accordant with what is laid down, for instance, by Lancellott [ubi sup. Amp. 5, n. 11, 12], with respect to the admission of appeals [namely, "quod semper in dubio, est appellationi deferendum, ut dicunt omnes;" and that "etiamsi judex admiserit appellationem non admittendam, sit a pœnâ excusandus, &c."], that what-

[22] The several acts, had and done, in supposed prejudice of the original appeal, and which are charged in the libel of appeal as attentats,(a)[1] were so had and done, either on the Court day on which the appeal was entered, or subsequent thereto, but prior to the issue of the inhibition, or, again, after the issue and service of the inhibition. Now, as to the first of these, it has been constantly held that all the several acts of one Court day constitute, as [23] with reference to this head of attentats, but one act, notwithstanding an appeal intermediate, or between those acts, accompanied with the several formalities of depositing money for the stamp, and so forth. As for the second, no ulterior step appears to have been taken in the cause till the 15th of August, within which period there was surely time sufficient to have extracted, and served the inhibition; (a)[2] so that, no inhibition having been served, the surrogates admitting certain witnesses to be produced, &c. (the ulterior step taken) on the 15th of August, still amounts to no attentat, in my judgment. On the 17th of September, and not before, the inhibition is extracted, and is served on the 24th. Whatever steps were taken, subsequent to the service of the inhibition, would be nullities of course, provided the appellant had been founded in his first appeal. But that appeal being frivolous and unfounded, he has no right to demand the revocation even of these, as attentats,(b) at the hands of this Court. He [24] is to be considered as having withdrawn from the Consistory Court (a Court having cognizance of the suit) at his

that appeals must be such, very manifestly indeed, to warrant a refusal to defer to them on the part of the Judge à quo, so far as this can be collected from their simple admission. As for assigning the appellant to prosecute them within a given term, this follows upon their admission naturally, not to say necessarily; for, otherwise, it should seem that the suit might remain suspended ad infinitum. To determine whether the appeal be founded or not, except in extreme cases, clearly belongs to the Judge ad quem.

(a)[1] An attentat, in the language of the civil and canon laws, is any thing whatsoever wrongfully innovated or attempted in the suit by the Judge à quo pending an appeal.

(a)[2] It was intimated in this place by the counsel for Mr. Chichester, that the earlier issue of the inhibition had been prevented by a caveat against the issue being entered in the Arches Registry. But to this it was replied by the counsel for Lady Donegal, that a notice in the nature of a caveat against the issue of the inhibition had, indeed, been served upon the Registrar of the Court of Arches, upon the authority of the precedent in Lord Herbert's case [2 Phillimore, 430], but that such notice was not served till the 15th of August, and that it was subducted prior to any application being made, on the part of Mr. Chichester, for the inhibition.

(b) Illa quæ post appellationem interpositam, ante diffinitivam sententiam, innovantur, donec appellationis causam veram esse constiterit, revocari non debent; nisi judex appellationis (postquam sibi constiterit ex causâ probabili fore ad se negotium devolutum) inhibeat, canonice,* judici à quo appellatum extitit, ne procedat; tunc enim, quicquid post inhibitionem hujusmodi* fuerit innovatum, est (licet causa eadem non sit vera) per eundem appellationis judicem, ante omnia in statum pristinum reducendum. Decret. lib. ii. tit. 15, c. 7, in sexto.

It may be proper to observe that the Judge à quo had never, at any time, been so inhibited in this cause, nor had the requisitions of the 97th canon been complied with, on the part of the appellant, before the going out of the inhibition, which actually issued in the cause. In other words, the Judge, ad quem, had not that constat of the truth of the grievance appealed from, prior to its issue, which was necessary to the full validity of the inhibition [vide Marant, vi. 2. 196, 197], and soever is done by the Judge à quo, after the bare admission of an appeal, must, in all cases, and necessarily, be an attentat; but he himself admits [ubi sup. lim. 6, n. 40, 41] a diversity of opinions as to this matter—and that "appellatio frivola, etiamsi per judicem fuerit admissa de facto, non facit attentata," according to some authorities.

* See also Lancellott, De Attent., 2 pars. c. 12, lim. 6, s. 16, 17, who lays down "quod inhibitio vigore frustratoriæ appellationis non potest operari effectum, ex quo non potest dici canonica," and that "inhibitio tunc tantum operetur effectum attentatorum quando est canonica."

own risk, and is to be remitted there; leaving it to the Judge of that Court to proceed upon the whole question, and between all the parties, as the justice of the case may appear to require.(a)

[25] This whole proceeding to be considered as one of a peculiar character. There are circumstances, as between all the parties, which tend to excite the vigilance of the Court, and to claim no inconsiderable share of its strictest attention. As between the original parties, the Court is bound to pronounce, [26] according to the existing law applicable to the facts in issue, substantiated by evidence; without suffering its judgment to be biassed by any consideration of the hardship, real or supposed, with which possibly that law may bear upon their particular case. For instance, if this marriage shall ultimately prove to be null and void in law, the Court in which the suit is then depending is bound, however painful to itself, so to pronounce it; nay, more, it is bound to look narrowly into the nature and proof of those facts by which a sentence of nullity may be sought to be averted. Here are great interests at stake. Lord and Lady Donegal may very possibly, and very naturally, feel a strong wish to sustain a marriage which has subsisted nearly thirty years; and which has given birth to no fewer than seven male issue, whom a sentence of nullity must, at once, deprive of every legal and hereditary claim. They may also very possibly and naturally wish, and for obvious reasons, that their legal state and condition shall be ascertained, by the sentence of a Court of competent jurisdiction, be that legal state and condition eventually what it may. The proceedings had in the cause certainly tend to shew that the suit, as between the principal parties, is amicably conducted. But this mere circumstance of amicable conduct in the suit does not warrant an imputation that the parties are fraudulently colluding to procure a sentence contrary to the truth of the facts and to the law applicable to those facts. One strong pre-without which the above passage from the decretals plainly implies, that steps taken by the Judge à quo, though in fact inhibited, are not, necessarily, revocable as attentats. See also upon this head Gaill. lib. i. Obs. 144, n. 4, and Ayliffe, par. 297, 298.

(a) It was thrown out by the Judge, in the progress of the argument, that the regular course for procuring the revocation of attentats was by a separate proceeding, civil or criminal, as against the Judge à quo, and that it was not by charging the supposed attentats, accumulatively, in a mere ordinary libel of appeal.

The latter of these (the criminal) was the course adopted in the case of Luke and Fisher, which was a proceeding by articles in the Consistory Court of Exeter, promoted by Luke against Fisher, surrogate of the archdeacon of Cornwall, for (an attentat in that) having decreed Luke, the promovent, to be certified for a contempt, in a cause of subtraction of tithes, &c. (then depending in the Archidiaconal Court of Cornwall, between Whitaker, rector of Ruanlanihorne, and the said Luke, one of his parishioners), under the statute of 27 Hen. 8, c. 20, he, Fisher, issued, or caused to issue, a certificate of such contempt under seal of the archdeacon of Cornwall, to certain justices of the peace for the county of Cornwall, after an appeal to the Consistory Court of Exeter from the said decree, made on the part of Luke, and admitted by Fisher, in contempt, &c. of the said appeal. The Judge at Exeter dismissed this proceeding, generally, with costs, from which sentence an appeal, on the part of Luke, was prosecuted to the Court of Arches. The dean of the Arches (Dr. Calvert) pronounced (Trinity Term, 1786, 4th Session) for the appeal, and retained the principal cause, and therein revoked the pretended certificate (the attentat, a step not taken by the Judge à quo), but affirmed so much of the decree appealed from as dismissed the respondent from the original citation with costs,† and gave no costs of the appeal. Luke, the appellant, in the Arches Court, again appealed from this sentence to the Delegates.

This appeal came on to be heard at Serjeants' Inn, on the 26th of May, 1789; when the Judges Delegates, Sir Henry Gould, Knt.; Sir William Henry Ashhurst, Knt.; Sir Richard Perryn, Knt.; and William Macham and John Fisher, Doctors of Law, pronounced against the appeal—affirmed the sentence of the Judge appealed from, and condemned Luke, the appellant, in the costs of the appeal.

† It appeared by the evidence that the issue of the certificate was owing to the imprudence of the registrar (not a party proceeded against) who put the seal to it, unknown to the surrogate, after the suspension of the decree by the admission of the appeal.

sumption against the existence of such collusion, in the present case, is this very step of citing the parties, one of whom is the present appellant, to see the proceedings. For [27] I think it scarcely possible that, considering the known privileges of intervention, a final sentence can be had in a suit of this description by collusion, but in the absence of all parties who are interested to detect and defeat it.

Still, however, the Court appealed from was bound to be on its guard, and to look into proceedings had between the parties principal in the cause with a jealous eye. Nor did it behove it to be less careful in watching over the conduct of this third party, especially in the article of delay—since he too had great interests at stake, and was placed in a situation which, as with reference to those interests, obviously suggested to him the policy of delay. If the birth of Lady Donegal really occurred half a century back, direct evidence of that fact could only be had from the mouths of witnesses far advanced in life—and the loss of their testimony might wholly defeat the real justice of the case. This party, too, had an obvious interest in delaying a declaratory sentence even of nullity: for in that event of the suit the plaintiff may try the experiment "convolandi ad alteras nuptias," in the prospect of legitimate issue to inherit his honors and estates—a prospect which, it need not be observed, becomes fainter in proportion as the period for making that experiment recedes. Under these circumstances the Court below was called upon, in point of justice, not to suffer, on the eve of a long vacation, the cause to be tied up, as between the principal parties, by the appeal of this third party—and, consequently, I am of opinion that neither on the one nor the other head of grievance can the ap-[28]-peal and complaint preferred to this Court be sustained.

I pronounce, therefore, against this appeal, and remit the cause; (a) and, although the appellant [29] ought not to be abridged of any fair means of fully investigating the case set up by one of the respondents, yet in prevention of future delays in that quarter whence too many have already proceeded, and by which, as I have already

(a) This cause was remitted accordingly to the Consistory Court of London, the Judge of which Court [Sir Christopher Robinson], proceeding according to the tenor of the former acts, "over-ruled (1st Session, Easter Term, 1822) the protest entered on behalf of Arthur Chichester, Esq.," but did not assign him to appear absolutely. A proctor then, however, did appear absolutely for the said Arthur Chichester, and prayed to be heard on the admission of the allegation thentofore admitted on the part of the Marchioness of Donegal [vide page 8, ante]; which prayer the Judge was pleased (2d Session, Easter Term, 1822) to reject. At the same time, by consent of the counsel for the Marquess and Marchioness of Donegal, he decreed a monition to issue against the witnesses already produced and examined upon the said allegation to attend for the purpose of being examined upon interrogatories, to be administered on behalf of the said Arthur Chichester.

But now by 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 1, so much of 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, as provides "that all marriages solemnized by licence after the 25th of March, 1754, where either of the parties (not being a widower or a widow) shall be under the age of twenty-one years, which shall be had without the consent of the father of such of the parties so under age (if then living), first had and obtained; or if dead, of the guardian or guardians of the person of the party so under age, lawfully appointed, or one of them; and in case there shall be no such guardian or guardians, then of the mother (if living and unmarried); or if there shall be no mother living and unmarried, then of a guardian or guardians of the person appointed by the Court of Chancery, shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatever;" is repealed, so far as relates to any marriage to be subsequently solemnized.

And the second section of the same act provides, "That in all cases of marriage had and solemnized before the passing of that act, without any such consent as is required by that part of 26 Geo. 2, c. 33 (the old marriage act), recited in, and repealed, by the first section: and where the parties shall have continued to live together as husband and wife, till the death of one of them, or till the passing of the act; or shall only have discontinued their cohabitation for the purpose, or during the pending of any proceedings touching the validity of such marriage, such marriage shall be deemed good and valid to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

It is to be presumed that, in consequence of these enactments, the above suit has virtually determined.

said, the real justice of this case may be defeated, I think that I am bound to accompany this sentence with a decree for costs.

[30] ROGERS AND BROWNING v. PITTIS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—A codicil operates as the re-publication of that will to which it applies; and, consequently, as the revocation of any intermediate will.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. James Stephens, the testator in this cause, died on the 11th of June, 1820. His first testamentary paper before the Court, in point of time, is a duly executed will, which is dated on the 30th of July, 1814. The substance of it is a bequest of a certain cottage at Brook Green, of his household goods, plate, and other articles, and of a life annuity of 50l. to his housekeeper Elizabeth Vesey. The rest and residue of his property, real and personal, are bequeathed by it to his three nieces, namely, Mrs. Rogers, Mrs. Pittis, and Mrs. Browning—and Mr. How and Mr. New are appointed executors.

On the 4th of June, 1817, the deceased is alleged to have executed another will: the substance of this will is to give the whole of his property, real and personal, to his niece, Mrs. Pittis, subject only to the life annuity of 50l. to Elizabeth Vesey; and this will appoints Mr. Pittis, the husband of the principal legatee, and Mr. New, executors, to the exclusion of Mr. How.

There is also a third instrument before the Court, which is a codicil dated the 5th of June, 1820. By that codicil the deceased gives certain provisions, which were in the house, and a furze-house, described as standing near the yard gate, to his house-[31]-keeper Vesey, the same person mentioned in both the former instruments. This codicil is written on the lower part of the third side, or page, of the will of 1814, just below the deceased's signature and the subscriptions of the attesting witnesses.

The will of 1814, together with this codicil, is set up on the part of the two nieces, Mrs. Rogers and Mrs. Browning; the will of 1817 is propounded by the husband of the third niece, Mrs. Pittis; and the questions in the cause for the Court to determine are, 1st, whether the factum of this last instrument, the codicil of June, 1820, is sufficiently proved: 2d, with which of the wills, being proved, is it to be taken in conjunction.

Now, to prove this codicil, two witnesses have been examined, the one, Robert Rayner, the attesting witness, the other, Mr. James How, the writer of the codicil, who has renounced the executorship of the will of 1814 in order to become competent as a witness in the cause.

The account of the transaction given by Rayner, a neighbour of the deceased, and employed by the deceased in his trade, which was that of a shoemaker, is to this effect: He says that he well remembers being sent for one morning to Farmer Stephens, whom he found sitting up in his bed, with Mr. How, also a neighbour and intimate acquaintance of the deceased, seated near the bedside, at a table, on which were pens and ink, and a written paper—Vesey, the deceased's housekeeper, was also present. On being introduced into the bed-room the deceased, after the usual salutations, said to the deponent, "I have been adding to my will, in order to give Betty all the provisions and [32] cured meats," of which there was a great abundance at that time in the house. He also said, that he should give her one of the furze-houses, "to be taken over the way," meaning, as the deponent understood, to a cottage on the green, opposite his house. He then observed that this addition to his will had been written by Mr. How, and that he, the deceased, wished the deponent to attest the execution of it. How, at the same time, observed, that he had read over the codicil, which he had just been preparing, to the deceased, and that the deceased approved of it. The deceased then executed the codicil, by putting his mark to it, declining the offered assistance of Mr. How, and said, "It was all quite right—it was all very well," and that "he would never make any other alteration in his will." The codicil was then subscribed by the deponent as a witness to the execution of it; after which he retired, being desired by the deceased to take some refreshment down stairs. He adds that the deceased appeared in pretty good spirits, and much better than he expected to find him, and was of perfectly sound mind, memory, and understanding. I may just observe by the way that the deceased's capacity at, and during, the premises, is admitted in all hands. There is nothing in fact to impeach it; for although he is described as sitting up in bed, supported by bolsters, and extremely feeble in bodily health at the time in question—yet there was nothing in the nature of his disease, or otherwise, to occasion mental incapacity. Nor was the deceased in extremis, for he survived this transaction of the codicil upwards of six days.

[33] Now, the circumstances deposed to by this witness—the manner in which the deceased received him on his first introduction—his declared knowledge of the contents of the instruments—his expressed desire that the witness should attest its execution—his mode of executing the instrument—his declaring himself perfectly satisfied with the contents of it, and that he would make no other or further additions to his will; all these circumstances bring up this case, completely, within the rules of evidence of intention. This witness's account, if true, proves every thing that is necessary to establish the factum of the codicil; and, as to the truth of the account, the credibility of this witness has suffered no attack, either in plea or argument, nor is it liable, that I am aware of, to the slightest imputation.

If, however, it were necessary that the deposition of this witness should be, it is corroborated very fully by that of Mr. How, the other party present at the transaction—for his account of that part of the transaction which occurred after Rayner came into the room, is precisely similar to Rayner's own account—so that there are two witnesses deposing together, and contesting, to the making of this codicil; and supposing Mr. How to be shaken in credit as a witness, still, upon his deposition in conjunction with that of Rayner, by his evidence as corroborating, or corroborated by, that of Rayner, the codicil must be held sufficiently proved.

Upon the question, however, of the credit due to Mr. How, as a witness, I can by no means persuade myself to think it materially affected. He is described as a yeoman, of considerable property, [34] and great respectability—he is an individual, in short, against whose general character, there is no impeachment. He was the deceased's confidential friend, and the principal manager of his affairs after his brother's death, about ten years preceding his own—and he is perfectly disinterested, as taking no benefit to himself, either under the will, or the codicil. It is true, indeed, with all this, that he has deposed, positively, to a fact in the case, as to which the preponderance of evidence satisfies me that his deposition is erroneous. But the question, in its bearing upon that of his general credibility, is whether he has so sworn falsely and corruptly, or whether he has so deposed, though in error, still honestly and sincerely. I have no hesitation whatever in acquitting him of having so sworn corruptly. It is a mere collateral and immaterial fact, upon which the contradiction arises, namely, whether the will, bearing date on the 30th of July, 1814, was executed upon that day, or whether it was executed three or four months after, on a day in the month of October.(a) The instrument is equally valid in either case, and the time [35] of execution has no bearing whatever upon the question of its re-publication by the codicil. He has certainly deposed, in this particular, with a degree of blameable confidence in the face of the instrument itself, and the attesting witnesses; but that very confidence tends to shew his sincerity—for he must have been aware that the three attesting witnesses, supported by the instrument itself, might, and probably would be, as they have, in fact, been, brought to contradict him.

But it has been contended that, at all events, this witness is so inaccurate and so defective, in point of memory, that the Court ought to place no reliance upon him, even though it should acquit him of intentional falsehood. This, however, is not a sound argument, to that extent at least, in my judgment. It by no means follows, that because a witness is inaccurate as to the date of a transaction which occurred six years before his examination, no reliance can be placed upon his memory as to facts and circumstances that passed only as many months before; and which facts and circumstances must have early become fixed in his mind, by his attention being called to them in consequence of proceedings to which they almost immediately gave rise.

(a) On which day the deceased executed the conveyance of an estate which he had previously sold, for 1000l. to Mr. Basset, of Newport. The witness (How) insisted that the will was executed on the same day (the 19th of October), and not in July. He accounted for the "date" by stating that the instructions were given, and the will was prepared in July; and that it was so dated by Mr. Worsley, in expectation that the deceased would have attended at Newport to execute it upon the 30th of that month; that not having done so, the matter stood over till the 19th of October—when the will was actually executed by the deceased; but without the date, inserted as above, having first been altered.

I think, therefore, that I cannot reject the evidence of this witness altogether, on the score of inaccuracy or deficiency of memory.

The other circumstance objected to this witness is, his having written receipts on the back of his own bond for 1000l. lent to him by the deceased, acknowledging the payment of interest, and having signed those receipts himself. But this only proves to me that neither of these parties were in habits [36] of business, and that they were acting towards each other with that want of circumspection, proceeding from their mutual confidence in each other, which is by no means unusual in persons of their class and occupation. The deceased is proved to have been a person of very great indolence—and this witness signing the last of these receipts with the deceased's name, which has been much insisted upon, could hardly, by possibility, have been for any purpose of fraud. There appears to me no attempt whatever to imitate the deceased's hand-writing, such as it was. The bond, too, was to remain in the deceased's own possession—so that this witness should have forged his signature at the back of it—that is, should have placed it there for any purpose of fraud—is quite out of the question. The occurrence at first sight may be startling to those who are accustomed to transact business in a more orderly and methodical manner—but it is an occurrence of no uncommon sort between country farmers—something very similar to it would have passed between two persons of this class, no long time back, under my own eye, but for my intervention. I think, therefore, that this objection does not materially detract from the credit due to Mr. How, any more than the preceding objections—and, giving him credit—he not only corroborates, and is corroborated, by the attesting witness—but he speaks to the history of the making and preparing of this codicil in a manner which does not leave a doubt in my mind that it was legally prepared and executed, and is, in itself, a valid instrument.

[37] The codicil then being, in the judgment of the Court, proved, and valid, the next consideration is, with which of the two wills is it to operate in conjunction—the will of 1814, or the will of 1817?

Now this I take solely to depend upon the result of a necessary previous inquiry, which is, to which of these two wills is the instrument in question to be taken as a codicil: for I apprehend the law to be settled, 1st, that making a codicil to a will re-publishes that will; 2d, that the re-publication of a former will supersedes one of a later date, and re-establishes the first. If, therefore, this codicil is to be taken as a codicil to the will of 1814, I shall have no hesitation in pronouncing for it in conjunction with that will, notwithstanding the intermediate will of 1817.

1. First, then, I apprehend it to be clearly settled that making a codicil to a will, republishes that will—that a codicil even of personalty, if executed so as to act on the subject, that is, if attested by three witnesses, republishes a will of lands; so that a will of personalty à fortiori, or a mixed will so far as respects personalty, is republished by a codicil, whether so attested or not. No evidence of intention to republish is requisite in either case; the very act of making the codicil, primâ facie at least, infers the intention. It is true, indeed, that this primâ facie inference may be rebutted by proof, that the act was done by the deceased, in error, or obtained from him by fraud. So the cancellation of a will may be shewn to have taken place in error, or the execution of a new will to have been procured by fraud. Primâ facie at least, however, the making of a codicil to a will, as [38] much republishes that will as a will is revoked, primâ facie, by its cancellation, and as a new will, primâ facie, annuls and makes void any will of a prior date.

2. Secondly, the republication of a will is tantamount to the making of that will de novo; it brings down the will to its own date, and makes it speak, as it were, at that time. In short, the will so republished is, to all intents and purposes, a new will.(a) Consequently, upon the ordinary and universal principle, that of any number of wills, the last and newest is that in force, it revokes any will of a date prior to that of the republication.

(a) So far as this principle has been carried, that where a testator had made his will in December, 1734, before the statute of Mortmain, 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and devised all the residue of his personal estate to be laid out in land, and settled to certain charitable uses, and had confirmed that will by a codicil made in July, 1739, after the statute, the codicil, by making the will a new will, was held to bring the devise within the statute; and so much of the will as related to the residue of the testator's personal estate was, consequently, held to be void. Vide Attorney-General v. Heartwell, Amb. 451.

By the cases quoted of The Attorney-General v. Downing (see Amb. 571, and the cases there cited), of Barnes v. Crowe (1 Ves. jun. 486), of Walpole v. Cholmondeley (7 Durnford & East, 138), and the rest, both these points seem to be clearly established in the judgments of other Courts. It may be satisfactory to shew that, in a case where the same points fell under the consideration of this Court, they were viewed in the same light, and determined upon the same principle.

I allude to the case of Jansen and Field v. Jan-[39]-sen, which occurred here in Trinity Term, 1797, in which case I was of counsel. The deceased in that case had executed a will dated on the 21st of July, 1792; he had made another will dated on the 18th of July, 1796; lastly, there was a codicil dated in March, 1797, referring, in terms, to his will (not of the twenty-first, but) of the first of July, 1792. The Court (a) said, "If the codicil of 1797 refer to the former will and not to the latter, it revives the former. In the case of Lords Walpole and Cholmondeley, it was held that parol evidence was inadmissible to shew that the testator intended by his codicil, in which he referred to his last will of 1752, not to republish that will, but to confirm his real last will of 1756; there being no latent ambiguity (b) as to which of the wills it referred to in the codicil itself. In the present case, however, there is some ambiguity in the codicil itself as to this point; for it refers in terms to a will of the 21st of July, 1792, and there is no will of that precise date extant. But here, in the first place, I must observe it is much more probable that the deceased should have written the '1st of July, 1792,' in [40] error for the '21st of July, 1792,' than that he should have written the '1st of July, 1792,' in error for the '18th July, 1796.' The codicil is written somewhat inaccurately, and bears date only a short time before the deceased's death. It agrees with either will in its contents, but it was formed in conjunction with neither of the two; it is possible, therefore, and indeed to be presumed, that the deceased had neither of the two wills before him when he drew up this codicil." The Court then went on to state and examine the circumstances of the case, as disclosed in the evidence, for the purpose of determining to which will it was most probable that the codicil should refer; and having arrived at a conclusion that it was to be referred, with much greater probability, to the will of 1792, than to that of 1796, it proceeded finally to pronounce for the will of 1792, in conjunction with this codicil, and against the intermediate will.

Here, then, is a case directly in point, and under the authority of that case I proceed to consider whether this codicil is to be taken as a codicil to the will of 1814, or to that of 1817; and I shall have no hesitation in pronouncing for it in conjunction with that will of which it is to be taken as a codicil, although this should be the prior will in point of date, or the will of 1814, not that of 1817.

Now, upon a full review of the case, what possible doubt can exist of the intentional, as well as actual, annexation of this codicil by the deceased, to the will of 1814, and not to the will of 1817? And, first, as upon the face of the several instruments, and without having recourse to extrinsic evidence.

[41] And here, in the first place, is the circumstance of actual annexation—it is annexed to the will of 1814, in point of fact; it is written on the very instrument itself. Why this circumstance, as observed by the First Commissioner Eyre, in the case of Barnes v. Crow, is powerful to shew that it was intended as a codicil to the will of 1814, and to no other will. It is headed, "A codicil added to my will;" and begins, "Furthermore it is my will," &c. Could this be meant of any other will than that upon which it was written? A casual inspection, even of the two instruments, will render it evident that any mistaking of the one will for the other

(a) Sir William Wynne.

(b) It was contended (in error) and successfully, that any supposed ambiguity could only arise from the fallacy of considering a "last will" to be a "will made last, in point of time;" whereas "wills" and "last wills" are synonimous, and the general meaning of term "last will" is, that will which is to be operative at the testator's death. It was said, "Suppose the devisor had referred to his 'will,' dated in 1752, without adding 'last' to it, there could have been no ambiguity. And the addition of the word 'last' does not create any, because 'will' and 'last will,' are synonimous." See 7 Durnford & East, 138.

by the deceased at the execution of the codicil was hardly possible. The codicil is written towards the bottom of the third side or sheet of the one instrument, the will of 1814. On the upper part of that sheet were, fairly and legibly, written, not only his own signature, but the subscriptions of the three attesting witnesses; at the head of them, that of his confidential solicitor, Mr. Worsley, written in a large character. Why the deceased, when about to execute this codicil, could hardly fail to perceive that he was going to execute a codicil written upon Mr. Worsley's will, namely, the will of 1814, and not written upon the other will, that of 1817, which has no external resemblance to the former—as being written on one side of paper only, and with much darker ink, and which was subscribed by three persons, with whose names the deceased could not be familiar, as it does not appear that he ever saw either of them, but upon the single occasion of their attesting his will. Added to this, I may just observe that it is an admitted fact in the [42] cause that the will of 1814 was constantly in the deceased's possession; that the will of 1817 was taken, and kept possession of, by Pittis, and was never in the deceased's custody, or under his controul, for a single day. Lastly, the contents of the codicil agree with those of the first will, and those of the first will only; for the furze-house, bequeathed to Vesey by it, is plainly an adjunct to the cottage, opposite the deceased's house, on Brook Green; the bequest of which cottage to Vesey, by the will of 1814, is revoked by the will of 1817.

Now, I very strongly incline to hold what has been forcibly argued by one of the counsel, that nothing in the shape of what he has termed mere inferential evidence could avail, to counterweigh these strong presumptions, growing out of the instruments themselves, that the deceased meant this as a codicil to the will of 1814, and not as a codicil to the will of 1817. But mere inferential evidence is all that has been attempted to be adduced by way of countervailing those presumptions. For what in substance is the case set up by Mr. Pittis, the party upon whom, I must observe, the burthen of proof is clearly imposed by the circumstances of the case. It is this: the deceased's augmented regard and affection for him and his family; his diminished regards, and alienated affections, to, and from, his other nieces. Upon this shewing, this Court is asked to infer that the deceased could not mean to revoke a will by which he had given the whole of his property to Pittis, and to revive one in which it stood bequeathed equally to Pittis and the other nieces, and upon this inference it is further asked to pronounce for the will of 1817.

[43] I entertain, I repeat, strong doubts whether this inference, if ever so fairly raised, could enable me to arrive at any such conclusion as that which is prayed; and, in this view of the subject, it is perhaps unnecessary to travel further into the circumstances of the case. But I am unwilling to pass them over altogether, as being of opinion that, upon the result of the whole evidence, no such inference as that contended for on the part of Mr. Pittis is fairly raised.

Stephens, the deceased, was an opulent farmer, living at Brook Green in the Isle of Wight; he was about sixty years of age and of reserved habits, and suffered much from illness, being severely afflicted with rheumatism. During his brother's life he principally managed the deceased's concerns; but on the death of his brother, which preceded his own about ten or eleven years, the management of the deceased's business and property fell considerably into the hands of Mr. How, a neighbouring yeoman, and much in his confidence, who appears to have served parochial offices for him, and, in brief, to have done him a variety of kindnesses. The deceased himself was so indolent as, during his brother's lifetime, hardly ever to have gone to Newport, the nearest market town; and it seems that he had not been there for the last four or five years of his own life.

The deceased had made a will in the month of November, 1813, disposing of the bulk of his property in a manner precisely similar to that in which it was disposed of by the subsequent will of 1814, before the Court, namely, to, and equally between, his three nieces. He bequeathed, by that will, an [44] annuity of 50l., as well as his household goods and plate, to his old servant Vesey, and appointed a Mr. New and Pittis his executors.

In July, 1814, the deceased made a new will, being the one of that date propounded in this cause. His sole object in making it, as spoken to by Mr. Worsley, his solicitor, was to leave, in addition to his former bequests, the cottage on Brook Green, already mentioned, to Vesey, and to substitute Mr. How for an executor in the room of Pittis.

Now from these alterations two inferences necessarily arise; the one, that the deceased's regard for Vesey was increasing at this time; the other, that his confidence in Pittis was diminishing, for Pittis is displaced from the executorship, and How, as I have already said, is substituted in his room. In these testamentary intentions, however, the deceased appears to have persisted for nearly three years, till the 4th of June, 1817; when he is alleged to have signed the will propounded by Pittis; a transaction to the brief consideration of which I now proceed to apply myself.

On the 4th, then, of June, in the year 1817, Mr. Pittis applies (not to the gentleman whom the deceased had constantly employed in that capacity, but) to his own solicitor, and instructs him to prepare a will as for the deceased to execute; the purport of that will being to appoint himself an executor, and his wife the sole legatee of the deceased's property, real and personal, with the single exception of a life annuity of 50l. to Vesey; a bequest, which it is open to conjecture, was inserted purely for colour and by way of saving appearances. No time is lost in complying with Pittis's [45] instructions, which are reduced into a will on that very morning; and Pittis himself is the person who conveys it to the deceased for execution. The attesting witnesses are neither friends or neighbours of the deceased, nor any persons casually at hand; but Pittis sends into the country, a distance of ten miles, for two of his own labourers and his brother's shopman for the express purpose of attesting the execution. Vesey, the deceased's old confidential servant, his faithful housekeeper, is left wholly in the dark as to the nature of this transaction—whether it is a will, or a bond, or what it is that her master is to execute in the presence of these witnesses, she is kept in utter ignorance of. The will itself is not read over to the deceased in the presence of any one of these witnesses. Pittis is the person all along closeted with the deceased—and how he represented the matter to him—what he said or did not say, what he did or omitted to do—is matter of mere conjecture. He might have read over the will to the deceased, but there is no proof that he did. The witnesses are then introduced: one of them speaks to hearing the deceased desire them to come in and "witness the execution of his will:" one other says that he "appeared to be reading over the instrument (not specifying its nature) which he subsequently executed," and that "he put it down and said he was satisfied with it." Other than this there is no proof that the deceased knew that the instrument which he was about to execute was a will; still less is there any proof that he knew what were its contents. The formal execution then takes place.

Observations undoubtedly might be made upon [46] the face of that execution; it might be fairly questioned whether it was, or was not, such an execution as would amount to a revocation of the will of 1814, under the statute of Frauds. But I conceive that they are wholly uncalled for, and consequently that they would be out of their place upon the present occasion. It is quite sufficient for any purpose with which I am considering the transaction in question to state that it is one, in my judgment, of a very unsatisfactory and of a very unexplained character. True it is that agents of unimpeached capacity are presumed to be aware of the contents of instruments which they execute de facto; and the agent's capacity, in the present instance, is unimpeached; so that the proof of the factum of this instrument might probably be deemed sufficient. Still the circumstances which I have already stated (aided by others to which I shall presently advert) must, I think, be admitted to throw much of suspicion and doubt upon the transaction, although, perhaps, they do not operate to the extent of invalidating it.(a)

It is first, however, the duty of the Court to notice a part of the history of this transaction, which it does not see without regret. I allude to the conduct, as deposed to, of the solicitor who prepared this will, which the Court must not pass over in [47] silence, painful as it always is to express itself dissatisfied with the conduct of any professional gentleman, in whose office a will has been prepared, to which its attention is judicially called. The solicitor who drew up this will took the instructions for it from the party whom it purported principally, if not solely, to benefit—of the deceased's testamentary intentions he had no constat but from these instructions, and of his state and condition, either of mind or body, he could know nothing but from the representation of the same interested party. He himself had never seen the deceased but once, and that five years before. Surely all this was enough to excite a feeling of caution on his part. So far, however, from having been actuated, apparently at least, by any such feeling, his conduct was precisely that which, if this transaction was fraudulent, afforded it every imaginable facility. He not only prepares the will without any communication with the testator, through Pittis's sole agency, but, when prepared, he delivers it to Pittis for execution, without proposing to satisfy himself as to the testator's capacity and volition, either in person, or by an agent even, in whom he reposed trust and confidence. So ignorant, however, are the parties likely to be present, considered of the proper mode of conducting a business of this description, that I can still trace, written in pencil on the instrument, so written, I must presume, in the solicitor's office, a direction to this effect—"Write name against the seal." Now the Court is willing to, and does hope and believe, that all this has proceeded from a mere want of due caution and consideration on the part of the solicitor—from a too blind confidence in the [48] integrity of his client Mr. Pittis. That confidence may have been perfectly well-founded—the whole transaction may have been fair throughout, in all its parts—still this does not exonerate from blame the solicitor with whose conduct in the business I must express myself dissatisfied, not, most undoubtedly, for the sake of giving pain to this individual, but for that of admonishing professional gentlemen generally, that where instructions for a will are given by a party not being the proposed testator—à fortiori where by an interested party—it is their bounden duty to satisfy themselves thoroughly, either in person or by the instrumentality of some confidential agent, as to the proposed testator's volition and capacity—or, in other words, that the instrument expresses the real testamentary intentions of a capable testator—prior to its being executed, de facto, as a will at all.

(a) It remains, however, to be stated that a jury, on the trial of an ejectment, at the Summer Assizes (for Hampshire), 1822, found against this will. It was necessary, on the part of Mrs. Rogers and Mrs. Browning, to submit the validity of that will to a jury, as the codicil of 1820, being executed in the presence of only two witnesses, neither revived the will of 1814, nor consequently revoked that of 1817, so far as respected the deceased's real estate.

Assuming, then, that, for some or other inscrutable reasons, the will of 1817 was approved of by the deceased—that it was executed by him as a will, with a full knowledge of its contents, and with a perfect intention to give it effect—still it is a most remarkable circumstance that the sole trace of any abandonment of the will of 1814 is to be found in the insulated act of the will of 1817. I call it an insulated act; for, abstract the transactions of a single day, the 4th of June, 1817, out of the history of this case, and there is not a vestige of any dissatisfaction conceived by the deceased with the bequests of the former will, of any intention expressed by him to adopt the provisions of the latter one. The transaction rests wholly upon itself for support; it derives none from any thing that preceded; it de-[49]-rives none from any thing that ensued upon it. There is no previous declaration as of intention to make the will of 1817—there is no subsequent reference to, or recognition of, that will, when it is made—there is not a vestige in the evidence of any diminished affection for the other nieces—of any increased regard for Mrs. Pittis—of any disgust at the conduct of Vesey, towards whom I have always said his esteem was increasing in the interval between 1813 and 1814—of any restored confidence in Pittis himself—his confidence in whom, as I have also said, was decreasing during the same interval. The change of disposition is wholly unaccounted for; consisting, not only in displacing the other nieces, and giving all to Mrs. Pittis, but in the re-substitution of Pittis for How as an executor; and in the withdrawing of a part of his testamentary bounty from Vesey, to benefit whom, in a greater degree, was the deceased's principal object in substituting the will of 1814 for that of 1813; whereas, this will of 1817 purports to place her in a worse situation than that in which she stood under the will of 1813 itself. Subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and its delivery to Pittis, not only no allusion to its existence, for aught that appears, is ever made by the deceased; but there is nothing in the conduct, either of the deceased, or (which, perhaps, under the circumstances, is full as remarkable) of Pittis, from which its existence can be fairly inferred. Pittis's condition was that of a man going down, as it is called, in the world; his circumstances were declining, not possibly from any fault of his own, but from the burthen of a large family, and the pressure of various untoward incidents, which finally, [50] in the year 1819, produced his emigration to America. It is in evidence that the deceased neither advised nor approved of this measure. Is it in evidence that he endeavoured to prevail with Pittis to abandon it, by reminding him of this will? Was Pittis's voyage to America retarded (prevented it certainly was not) by any anticipation of the great benefit which he was likely to derive under this will at the death of the deceased? There is not a tittle in the evidence from which any thing of the sort can be conjectured. Subsequent, therefore, I repeat, to its delivery to Pittis on the day of its execution, there is nothing to shew that either the one or the other party, either in word or in deed, ever alluded to, or acted as upon, this will of 1817 in any shape.

Now, under all these circumstances, where is the improbability (for to determine this alone has been my object in considering the transaction)? What is there to render it incredible? That the deceased should revert to his old testamentary dispositions expressed in the will of 1814, and abandon those expressed in the will of 1817, giving these last credit, that is, for having once been his testamentary intentions. As for the deceased's silence with respect to this will of 1817, and every thing connected with it, when about to execute the codicil of 1820, this, I think, may be accounted for in various ways. Possibly, as conjectured, he had forgot the transaction of this intermediate will altogether; possibly, as also conjectured, he supposed that will revoked by Pittis's emigration to America; possibly, a third conjecture is nearer the mark; namely, that he was unwilling to disclose to How that he had ever made a will, displacing him (How) from his executorship—[51] disinheriting two of his three nieces—and revoking a part of the benefit conferred by two prior wills on his housekeeper Vesey. The whole of this however is mere conjecture, in which it is useless for the Court to indulge itself. But the intire history of this case, as disclosed in the evidence, is so far from evincing to my mind the improbability of the deceased doing what, probable or not, the law determines him to have actually done, that I conceive it the most natural and the most likely step for the deceased to have taken, when his attention was definitively called to the subject of his final testamentary arrangements.

Lastly, the parol evidence connected with the immediate factum of the codicil removes any doubts upon this head, could any be entertained upon other grounds. Rayner alone (without How) proves that the will of 1814 alone, not that of 1817, was in the deceased's mind at the time of his executing the codicil. He expressly mentions the deceased's saying that "it was to give Vesey the fuel-house, to be taken over to the cottage." The deceased must in this, as I have already said, have referred to the will of 1814. But Mr. How speaks to having actually read over the will of 1814 to the deceased before he wrote the codicil; so that this gentleman's deposition (if he is not utterly unworthy of credit) renders it as manifest upon the parol evidence as upon the acts done, that the testator meant this codicil to apply to the will of 1814.

I pronounce therefore for that will in conjunction with the codicil as prayed by Mrs. Rogers and Mrs. Browning; but I am not of opinion that this is a case which calls for the condemnation of Mr. Pittis in costs.

[52] LORD JOHN THYNNE v. STANHOPE. IN THE GOODS OF THE RIGHT HONORABLE LADY ELIZABETH STANHOPE. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1822.—If a testamentary paper be cancelled, law infers the revocation of it, unless it can be clearly shewn, 1st, that it once existed as a finished will; 2d, that the testator adhered to it throughout in mind and intention, notwithstanding its cancellation.

(On the admission of the allegation.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an allegation on the part of Lord John Thynne, the executor, propounding the will of Lady Elizabeth Stanhope, the party deceased in the cause. I am of opinion that the facts alleged, if proved to the utmost feasible extent, would not justify the Court in pronouncing for the instrument set up.

The paper propounded, on the face of it, is clearly invalid. It concludes, "And all that remains of my fortune, after the payment of the above legacies, I leave to Georgiana Stanhope, my beloved sister, making it however my particular request, that a jewel, having belonged to me, be presented to these following persons, as a remembrance or token of my affection for them, viz." Here the paper ends—so that either it never existed in a finished state, or, if it did, the finishing part, contained in a second sheet (for the concluding words, it is to be observed, occupy the bottom line of the fourth side of a sheet of paper), has been withdrawn, and is presumed to have been destroyed. Now,

As an unfinished paper, and one in its progress to completion, it is quite evident that this paper can never be pronounced for; for the paper bears [53] date on the 22d day of November, 1818, and the testatrix only departed this life on the 30th of October, 1821, nearly three years after it was written: and no ground whatever is laid in the plea for its completion having been so long postponed by the testatrix, had she been disposed to put it into the shape, and to invest it with the character, of a finished instrument at all. Added to this, it is stated to have been found in an open drawer, thrown aside among loose papers; a situation in which, when a testamentary paper is found, it carries with it, primâ facie at least, a presumption of abandonment.

It is not attempted however to set up this as an unfinished paper, and one in its progress to completion; but as a finished paper, which has been cancelled, sine animo revocandi, by the testatrix under an erroneous impression that the law did not permit her, as a minor, to dispose of her property by will.

Now it is perfectly true that, in legal consideration, a will may be cancelled without being revoked. The cancelling, itself, is an equivocal act, and, in order to operate as a revocation, must be done animo revocandi. A will, therefore, cancelled through accident, or by mistake (as in the instances put by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Burtenshaw v. Gilbert,(a) and similar ones), is not revoked. On the same principle it was held, by Lord Chancellor Cowper, in the case of Onions v. Tyrer,(b) that [54] cancelling a former will, on a presumption that a latter, devising the same lands to the same uses, was effective, which latter will however proved to be void, was no revocation of the former, so as to let in the heir.

I assent therefore to the general legal position that the cancellation of a will does not, necessarily, infer any intentional abandonment of the dispositions contained in, or, consequently, any revocation of it. At the same time it is obvious that this is the ordinary inference, deducible from every act of cancelling. And I may venture to lay down that, in order to bar its application to any particular case of cancelling, two things at least are requisite: first, it must be proved by indisputable evidence that the cancelled paper once existed as a finished will; secondly, it must be shewn, by evidence equally indisputable, that the testator adhered to it, throughout, in mind and intention, notwithstanding its cancellation. In the absence of either of these indispensable requisites, the ordinary presumption is that upon which a Court of Probate is bound to act.

It remains therefore only to consider whether the matter of this allegation is such as to afford any reasonable ground of belief that evidence of the kind described, upon these two points, could be furnished in the present case, should the Court suffer it to proceed by admitting the allegation.

Now, what are the facts stated in the allegation, as applicable to the case in this view of it? The four first articles of the allegation plead, in substance, only the finding of the instrument, in the hand-writing of the deceased, after her death, at the [55] house of her grandmother, Lady Bath, with whom the deceased had been principally resident, in Lower Grosvenor Street. There is no averment even of formal execution; and the actual execution of the instrument is so pleaded as negatives the supposition that any attempt will, or can, be made to produce other evidence in support of it, than what results from a declaration of the deceased, pleaded in the fifth article of the allegation, upon which I proceed to advert.

The fifth article pleads (in substance) that in the month of January, 1821, the deceased, whilst on a visit in Derbyshire, declared to her ex-governess, Madam de Montmollin, "that she had made her will; and that the same would be found in her writing-box, which box the said testatrix then had with her." And upon proof of this declaration the Court is to be asked to infer the factum of the will.

Now, supposing this declaration to be proved, in the very words of the plea, it furnishes no proof whatever, to my mind, that this paper ever existed as a finished will. In the first place, the expression put into the mouth of the deceased, that "she had made her will," is extremely vague and equivocal; and is just as likely to have been applied by the deceased, a young lady of rank in her minority, to an unfinished, as to a finished, instrument. But what I should be glad to know is, how the declaration, be its import what it may, could be pinned down to this particular paper. I mean, what proof could be furnished that the deceased, in referring to her will upon the occasion in question, referred to this identical will. The deceased, between the years 1818 and 1821, might have made another [56] will; nay, the probability is, that she had actually done so; for Lord John Thynne states, in his affidavit of scripts, that "he (the appearer) has been informed, since the death of the deceased, and which information he believes to be true, that she, the said deceased, subsequent to the making and writing her said will" (i.e. the paper propounded in the cause), "made some further or other will, or wrote some paper of a testamentary nature; but of the contents, or of the date, of such paper the appearer has no knowledge or information." But to proceed,

The article goes on to plead, that in a subsequent conversation with the same Madam de Montmollin, on the subject of her will, in the month of September in the same year, when the testatrix was again upon a visit in Derbyshire, she the testatrix declared that, being nearly of age, and "having a doubt whether her will, if made previous to her attaining her age of twenty-one years, would be valid, she had destroyed it;" and added that, "upon attaining her age of twenty-one years, she would make another will." And it is upon the evidence of this further declaration, that the Court is to be required to infer that adherence of the testatrix to the cancelled paper, in mind and intention, which will authorize the Court to give it the sanction of its probate.

I could certainly comply with no such requisition. In the first place, I could have no proof that this, any more than the former, declaration referred to this identical paper. But, secondly, and principally, admitting that it referred to it, I could by no means collect from the declaration that perfect adherence of the testatrix to the paper, throughout, [57] to every part of it, which alone could justify me in departing from the ordinary presumption of abandonment furnished by the act of cancellation. The reason which the deceased is made to assign for having destroyed the paper—namely, her doubt as to its validity—is rather a singular reason—admitting it however to have been her reason, non constat, that it was her only one. She had given away, in legacies, more than the amount of her property; and that might have operated with her as a reason for destroying it. Allowing it, ex hypothesi, to be fully proved that the deceased intended "to make a new will"—non constat, that it was to be a will of precisely the same tenor and effect as this, presuming this to have been that will referred to by the deceased, as the one which she had destroyed. Any person, much more a young lady, at the deceased's time of life, may be supposed to have varied, or departed altogether from testamentary intentions once held, in the course of three years, without any stretch of probability.

With this impression of the case I consult the interests of all parties, in staying these proceedings in limine, by rejecting the allegation; holding the facts pleaded insufficient to sustain this paper, as they will neither shew that this very instrument ever was a finished will, nor that it was cancelled by the deceased, sine animo revocandi.

Allegation rejected.

[58] STEADMAN v. POWELL. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1822.—Probate of a will refused to the executor as being the will of a married woman, and consequently invalid in law. Administration of her effects committed to her husband, whose interest as such had been denied by the executor. A marriage in Ireland, between the parties, held to be proved by circumstantial evidence. Its alleged nullity, on account of its celebration by a Popish priest, held to be not proved.

Margaret Steadman, otherwise Powell, died on the 22d of March, 1820, having been for nearly forty years preceding, with the exception of the last fifteen months, in the service of her Grace the Duchess Dowager of Rutland. At the time of her death she was in possession of personal property to the value of about 1500l., accumulated by savings from monies of her own acquirement, in the Duchess of Rutland's service; which monies, as she acquired them, the deceased had been in the habit of investing in the purchase of stock in the public funds, in the name of her brother, Mr. George Steadman (party in this cause).

The deceased left behind her a regularly executed will, bearing date the 2d of October, 1819, in which will she described herself as "Margaret Steadman (otherwise Powell), spinster;" and the will is so signed. She had passed, however, for the last five-and-thirty years of her life, by the name and title of Mrs. Powell; and appears to have considered herself, and was universally reputed, the lawful wife of James Powell (the other party in the cause), until within about two years of her death. From that time it is to be inferred that the deceased considered herself as a feme sole, in consequence of having obtained something in the shape of a legal opinion, against the validity in law of a marriage, had under the circumstances then stated by her to have accompanied her marriage, in fact, with her reputed [59] husband. Under this impression, believing herself at liberty to dispose of her property by will, she made and executed two wills successively; the first bearing date the 4th of May, 1818; the second on the 2d of February, 1819, being the will already mentioned.

Some months after the death of the deceased, on probate of that will being applied for by Steadman, as one of her executors, a caveat against the same passing was found to have been entered on behalf of Powell, alleging him to be the lawful husband of the deceased. His interest, as such, being denied by the executor, was propounded in an allegation, which pleaded (in substance) that the parties had been duly and lawfully married in Dublin, some time in the latter end of the year 1786, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of Ireland, as by law established; together with cohabitation, the birth of issue, and the general reputation of their being husband and wife from that time. A responsive allegation on the part of the executor pleaded merely, first, the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 13, Irish, enacting, "That every marriage celebrated after the 1st of May, 1746, between a Papist and any person who hath been, or hath professed himself to be, a Protestant, at any time within twelve months before such celebration of marriage, or between two Protestants, if celebrated by a Popish priest, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes, without any process, judgment, or sentence of law whatsoever;" 2dly, that Powell and the deceased respectively professed themselves to be, and were respectively, at the time in question, Protestants; [60] 3dly, that their pretended marriage in question was celebrated by a Popish priest.

This cause was argued, and stood for sentence, upon the evidence taken in support of the facts stated in these several allegations.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This, in substance, is an issue purely matrimonial, although it occurs in a testamentary suit. The point in issue is simply whether the party deceased, who is described, and who describes herself as Margaret Steadman, otherwise Powell, died a feme sole, or the lawful wife of James Wakeford Powell. In the former event, the deceased has died testate, and probate of her will is to be granted to George Steadman, the brother of the deceased, and an executor named in her will, the one party in this cause. As a married woman, it is not suggested that the deceased had any authority to make a will—consequently, in the latter event, her will, so styled, is a mere nullity, and the administration of her effects is to be committed and granted to Powell, her husband, the other party in the cause.

The interest of Powell, the alleged husband, has been denied generally by the executor, and is propounded in an allegation which has been given on his behalf pleading him to have been "duly and lawfully married to the deceased in Dublin, sometime in the latter end of the year 1786, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of Ireland"—together with cohabitation, birth of issue, and general reputation from that time downward. An allegation has also been given on the part of the executor, which pleads, first, that marriages in Ire-[61]-land between Papists and Protestants, or between two Protestants, are absolutely null and void, if celebrated by a Popish priest, under an Irish act of parliament—secondly, that Powell and the deceased were Protestants respectively when married, as pretended, and were married by a Popish priest; and, consequently, that such their pretended marriage was and is null and void to all intents and purposes.

Upon the face of the pleas and proceedings, two questions present themselves, first, whether these parties were married at all; secondly, whether being so, they were lawfully married—a point, indeed, to which the executors' general negation of the interest of the alleged husband, as contained in the proceedings, is somewhat narrowed by the shape of his plea. An attentive investigation, however, of both questions is due to the justice of the cause, and may be convenient for a reason which will presently appear, that the Court should address itself to these questions separately; and first, as to the former.

The facts and circumstances of the case as pleaded and proved, which are applicable to the first of these questions, are briefly as follows:—Margaret Steadman, the deceased, was an attendant upon the present Duchess Dowager of Rutland, and accompanied her Grace to Ireland, whither she proceeded, in the summer of 1784, to join her husband the late Duke of Rutland, then in Ireland, of which kingdom he had been recently appointed Lord Lieutenant. Powell, the party in this cause, was at that time in the service of General Finch, one of his Grace's aide-de-camps, and living as such at Dublin Castle, or the Phœnix Lodge, near [62] Dublin, the official residences of the Irish Vice-Roy; so that Powell and the deceased, on the arrival of the latter in Ireland, were members, in a manner, of one family. In the summer of 1786 the deceased became pregnant, as she said, and as it was "rumoured" by Powell—on becoming acquainted with which pregnancy, her mistress, the duchess, refused to continue her in her service, unless as the wife of Powell. It further appears that Dr. Preston (then or soon after bishop of Ferns), at that time private secretary to the duke, interested himself to procure a marriage between the deceased and Powell, at the request of the duchess—and caused it to be intimated to the latter through Emerson, a fellow servant, that his marriage with Steadman was necessary to either of the two keeping their places. A fact of marriage between the parties, to say the least, was asserted by themselves, and was generally understood by others, to have taken place accordingly. Nor was this permitted by the duchess to rest upon the report of the parties, or upon general rumour merely—an instrument purporting to be a certificate of the marriage was produced to the Duchess of Rutland, and was shewn by her to the duke, her husband; who, being satisfied (as it should seem, by inspection of this certificate) that the parties were really married, suffered the deceased to retain her situation in his wife's service. This certificate is pleaded to have been lost or mislaid—it is said by the Duchess of Rutland to have been torn or destroyed, as she understood, on the occasion of some quarrel between the parties. It is further proved that, from and after that time, the deceased was constantly addressed by the name, and treated [63] as the wife of Powell—that she was permitted by the duke and duchess to lie in at the Phœnix Lodge, where she gave birth to a son, who was baptized as her lawful issue by Powell—that, on the return of the duchess from Ireland, the deceased accompanied her, still as her attendant—and continued in her service, uninterruptedly, until compelled to relinquish it by bodily infirmity, in the month of January, 1819—that during this whole interval, Powell and the deceased acknowledged each other as husband and wife, and were so reputed, and taken by all who knew them—that Powell was under the necessity of living much apart from the deceased, both whilst he continued in the service of General Finch, and when, upon quitting it, he became a king's messenger, in which capacity he was occasionally absent in foreign parts; but that he frequently did, and was permitted at all times to, cohabit with the deceased, as well at the several residences of the Duchess of Rutland specified in the plea as elsewhere—lastly, that the deceased had two other children, the issue of her connection with Powell, born in this country—one (a daughter) in the house of the Duchess of Rutland, in Arlington Street—both of whom were constantly owned and acknowledged by the parties themselves, to be their lawful issue; were maintained and educated as such at their joint expence; and were constantly reputed, and taken for such, by their friends, relations, and acquaintances.

Now it appears to me that this evidence does sufficiently establish a fact of marriage between the parties. Its foundation is not the mere assertion of the parties, together with the contemporary rumour or [64] report, although these alone possibly, under the circumstances, might justify the Court in inferring a fact of marriage; but a certificate of marriage is at the time produced, plainly satisfactory to the parties who suggested the marriage—one, at least, of whom is to be presumed no incompetent judge of its authenticity—to omit any mention of the bishop of Ferns, who is to be deemed, in some sort, privy to the transaction, and to have lent it throughout the sanction of his countenance. That the certificate in question was satisfactory to the duke and duchess is plainly to be collected, as well from the positive testimony of the latter, as from their suffering the deceased to continue in their service, and even to give birth to her issue under their roof—circumstances which can only be ascribed to their perfect confidence in the genuineness, at least, of the certificate, not to say in the validity of the marriage purported to be certified.

The absence of stricter proof of a fact of marriage in the suit is, in my judgment, fairly accounted for, by the time and place, taken conjunctively, when and where the marriage was had. The locus contractus shews that such stricter proof may be dispensed with—the lapse of time suggests to the Court the peculiar propriety of dispensing with it in the present instance.

And, first, as in Ireland marriages may be had without any celebration in facie ecclesiæ, or in the presence of witnesses, it would be unreasonable to deny that a marriage had, in Ireland, may be proved by slenderer evidence than is requisite to the proof of a marriage celebrated in this country. With us, too, in England, subsequent to the mar-[65]-riage act, the proper, not to say the sole, evidence in this matter is the register-book—a medium of proof which, of course, is excluded where the question respects the factum of an Irish marriage, at least of this description. The general matrimonial law of Ireland is what that of this country was prior to the marriage act; and as marriages in England were proveable by circumstantial evidence prior to the marriage act, marriages in Ireland, I apprehend, are proveable by the same species of evidence at this day. If this be so, a marriage of some sort is proved in the present case to all intents and purposes—for I can scarcely figure to myself stronger proof of a fact of marriage (at this distant period from the time of its celebration), by circumstantial evidence, than is to be collected from the depositions taken on the husband's plea.

Upon the whole, then, I incline to think that sufficient proof is furnished of a fact of marriage—in furnishing which, the party whose interest is denied has discharged himself of the obligation which the law imposes upon him. The next question is whether sufficient proof is also adduced of the alleged nullity, the burthen of proving which, I am of opinion, rests with the adverse party—the party setting it up in plea.

I must observe, however, in the first place, that all presumption is in favor of the validity of the marriage, the marriage itself being once held to be proved. And, first, the presumption of law is clearly in its favour—"semper præsumitur pro matrimonio," being the constant legal maxim upon these occasions. It has been said, indeed, that this being, at best, a secret or clandestine marriage, is not [66] entitled to that presumption in its favour; and that the maxim upon which it is claimed for it, only operates upon marriages regularly celebrated. To this position I cannot exactly accede. The circumstances under which the marriage was had suggested privacy as to the time of celebration—and the marriage, so far as respected the mere time of celebration, certainly was a secret marriage. But though a secret marriage, it was tainted by no character of fraud—it was not a marriage which the policy of the law discountenanced, or one which it either would or could have interfered to prohibit—it was the very contrary of all this. I am of opinion, therefore, that the general legal presumption in favor of this marriage is not at all rebutted by the mere circumstance of its being kept intentionally secret, to answer a special purpose, as to the precise time at which it was solemnized.

Nor is the general presumption of law the only presumption in favor of the validity of this marriage. A strong presumption in its favor arises from the circumstances under which it was had. All parties must have been anxious that it should be validly solemnized: nor can any ground be suggested why, when a marriage between Powell and the deceased was once determined upon, a mode of effecting it should have been resorted to, in which its own nullity was internally involved.

Such, however, it is asserted to have actually been upon the ground of its celebration by a Popish priest; so that it becomes necessary to state and examine the evidence upon which that assertion rests.

The party who has pleaded, and who, as I have [67] just said, is bound to prove that the marriage was celebrated by a Popish priest, has produced not a single witness in support of that part of his plea. The proof is attempted to be drawn from the mouths of the witnesses examined on the adverse allegation, who are argued to have disproved their own case—with what success it remains to enquire.

The only witnesses from whose depositions this inference can be attempted to be drawn are Mr. Hamilton, the deceased's solicitor, and her Grace the Duchess of Rutland.

Mr. Hamilton deposes to having been sent for in the month of April, 1819, to prepare a will for the deceased, who had then recently quitted the service of the Duchess of Rutland, and was in lodgings in Baker Street. In the course of giving instructions for this will the deceased consulted Mr. Hamilton how she was to be named, or described, and then stated "that she considered her name Steadman, and that she ought to be described as Margaret Steadman—that she had been married to Mr. Powell in a way that she conceived illegal—and consequently that she deemed such her marriage a mere nullity." On this gentleman, with a view to the guidance of his conduct in the premises, inquiring how she was married, the deceased replied "that she was married in a private room, by an old man, whom she was told was a Catholic priest, and whom she supposed to be dead—and that he had given her a certificate, but which Mr. Powell had taken from her, and destroyed." This witness deposes precisely to the same effect, in answer to an interrogatory administered by the executor—adding only, that the deceased, on the said occasion, further in-[68]-formed him that "no one was present at the ceremony of marriage," and that "the duchess, with whom she resided (meaning the Duchess of Rutland, but whose name the witness had forgot), wished them (that is, the deceased and Powell) to be married again in a Protestant church."

The parts of the Duchess of Rutland's evidence relied on by the counsel for the executor are, briefly, the following:—

To the 2d interrogatory the respondent answers (nearly in the language of every other witness interrogated) that she "cannot take upon herelf to depose, from her own knowledge, that any marriage was ever actually solemnized between Steadman and Powell, but that she believes such to have taken place." This respondent states her own particular grounds of belief to be, "The deceased having produced a certificate that such marriage had been solemnized, which she, the respondent, had in her possession, and shewed to the duke her husband; at the same time she cannot undertake to depose when or where the said marriage was had, nor who was or were present, nor what was the name of the person by whom such marriage was solemnized; nor can she say whether he were a minister, in holy orders, of the Church of Ireland, or a Roman Catholic priest;" but she adds that, "From everything told her by Steadman, at and about the time of the said marriage, she believes that it was celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest."

To the 3d and 4th interrogatories the respondent's answers are precisely similar.

To the 5th she deposes, "That she thinks Dr. Preston (who was private secretary to the duke, [69] and who appears from her Grace's deposition in chief, and that of several of the other witnesses, to have interested himself in procuring a marriage between these parties) did advise the said parties to be re-married in England." It is only from her so thinking that the respondent can account for a belief, which she admits herself to have entertained, "That the said parties were subsequently re-married in this country, on their return from Ireland."

To the 6th interrogatory she says, that "the certificate of marriage was, as she believes, given by a Roman Catholic priest, being, as she apprehends, the same person who married the parties."

Now this being, as it is, the only evidence against the validity of the marriage, it does not appear to me sufficient, either in kind or degree, either in nature or amount, to establish the nullity contended for.

And first as to its nature, and the source from which it is derived. And here, in the first place, it is evident that the whole, be it what it may, is founded upon the mere averment of the deceased herself; whose doubts (entertained or expressed) of the validity of her marriage, after an acquiescence of five and thirty years, are so intimately connected with her wishes to dispose of her property by will, that it is next to impossible not to suspect that the latter may alone have suggested the former. It should even seem that these scruples were scarcely indulged, in earnest, until certain schemes of the deceased for procuring, from Powell, a release of his claims upon her acquisitions in the Rutland family, had failed. In a letter which is exhibited in the cause from Smith, a sister of the deceased, evidently [70] written with the concurrence of the deceased, to Powell, she writes, "She (the deceased) further requested me to ask you if you would execute a deed of settlement on herself of the property she possesses, so that she may be enabled to dispose of it in any way which will be most advantageous to her present interest, as a married woman is very unpleasantly fettered in that respect." This letter is dated on the 9th of January, 1819. The same is to be collected from the following expressions in a letter, also exhibited in the cause, from the Duchess of Rutland to the deceased, in answer, it should seem, to one from her, requesting her Grace's interference with Powell on the subject of his leaving her the uninterrupted enjoyment and disposal of her property. She says, "I don't know what to say about writing to Mr. Powell, and indeed I don't clearly understand what you wish me to say to him. I certainly think he has no right to take your money; but fear that if he was to refer it to the law he would have a right; and I do not know how he could be told that your marriage would not hold good here." Again, "I think your brother has mentioned to me that Powell had torn the certificate; if so, we might venture to tell him that he could not claim your property; but then your daughter would be illegitimate; therefore, I think that you had better consult your brother before I write to Powell. Powell's answer probably would be, that as you have refused his offer to live with him, he thinks he has a right to your money. I hope and trust it is not so; but fear much, that whatever a wife has is her husband's." Again, "I really quite dislike writing to him (Powell), as I could use no argument [71] of any weight, unless it is by urging that, as all your little property was acquired by your own exertions in my service, he ought to permit you to enjoy it in peace; the more especially, as you had never been any expence to him. Perhaps that may be what you wish me to say; let me know; but consult your brother about it, &c." All this is perfectly just and reasonable; but how is it compatible with the writer's firm conviction, or even sincere belief, at that time, that the marriage was a nullity? Must not she, in that case, almost necessarily, have taken higher ground? This letter, I should observe, appears to have been written in the October of 1819. It is certainly true that expressions occur in this very letter from which an inference may be drawn of her Grace having entertained a belief, all along, that the ceremony of marriage was performed, and the certificate granted, by a Popish priest. It is also true that she has deposed, in her answers to the 2d interrogatory, already recited, to her having entertained that belief in consequence of what was told her by the deceased, recenti facto, or at the time of the marriage. But is it quite impossible that this witness, deposing, most unquestionably, according to her then present impression and belief, but after a considerable interval, may have confounded what was communicated to her by the deceased, at and about the time of the marriage, with other suggestions from the same quarter, at a much later period? when it should seem that the enjoyment of her property, with all its incidents, and the jus disponendi, as one of them, was so paramount an object with the deceased, that provided she attained the end, she was not very scrupulous about the means. This, at [72] least, is the only way in which I can account for some apparent discrepancies in the evidence of this witness. The hypothesis to which I have ventured to resort solves the whole difficulty.

So much as to the kind of evidence adduced, and the source from which it is derived; next, as to its scantiness in point of amount. For what, in truth, does it amount to? Why, to little more than evidence of the deceased having assured Mr. Hamilton (not that she had been married by a Popish priest—for she did not venture to go that length—but merely) that she, the deceased, had been told that she was married by a Popish priest—without any specification of when, where, and by whom told; without one, in brief, of the numerous requisites to stamp upon the communication a character of authenticity. She might be so told, and yet, very possibly, the fact be otherwise; at all events, it is not to be contended that her being told so is proof that it was the fact. In limiting the evidence in favour of the executor to the deposition of Mr. Hamilton, I must not be supposed to have forgotten that of the Duchess of Rutland. I do so, as being of opinion that her Grace's deposition, taken as a whole, furnishes no inference whatever against the force and effect of this marriage.

Lastly, the improbability that a Popish priest would have married these parties in the face of a sentence of capital felony (a) is a circumstance not wholly to be left out of the account. Is it likely, at any rate, that a priest of that communion would have risked incurring that sentence for any requital [73] which these parties can be supposed to have had either the inclination or the means to offer? Something was said in the argument, indeed, as to the statute imposing this penalty being obsolete, or a dead letter, and never acted upon. But I really do not know how the Court can presume all this; certainly not, how it can venture to found its judgment on any such presumption. Obsolete the statute (stat. 12 Geo. 1, Ir. c. 3, s. 1) could hardly be; for little more than sixty years had then elapsed from the time of its enactment. It was urged again, however, that ministers of the Church of Ireland are punishable for celebrating irregular marriages; so that a penalty was incurred by a priest of whichever communion this marriage was celebrated, it being at best an irregular marriage, though a valid one, if celebrated by any other than a Popish priest. This is a specious answer to the objection of improbability; but the vast disparity of penalty in the two cases—in the one a sentence of capital felony, in the other a mere subjection to ecclesiastical censures—deprives it of any great weight in my judgment. Ministers in this country were liable both to ecclesiastical censures (canon 62) and to pecuniary forfeitures (6 & 7 W. c. 6. 7 & 8 W. c. 35. 10 Ann. c. 19) for celebrating clandestine marriages prior to, and independent of, the marriage act; yet it is well known that parties here, who were desirous of being married clandestinely anterior to that act, were seldom put to any difficulty for lack of a minister, in spite of these penalties and forfeitures. It is probable that equal facilities [74] in this kind are afforded to parties in Ireland at the present day.

Upon all these several considerations I pronounce for Mr. Powell's interest; and, consequently, that he is entitled to the administration of the deceased's effects as a husband, whose wife, the deceased, is dead intestate in law.

SCRUBY AND FINCH v. FORDHAM AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-day, 1822.—1. A will partially defaced by a testator, whilst of unsound mind, is to be pronounced for, as it existed in its integral state, that being ascertainable. 2. If a testator of impeached sanity do some act with relation to his will, whose state of mind, at the time of doing which, there is nothing to evidence, aliunde; his rationality at such time, or the contrary, is to be inferred from that of his act.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The party deceased in this cause is John Trigg, late of Melburn Bury, in the county of Cambridge, who died on the 6th May, 1821. He died a bachelor, without father, leaving behind him a mother, a sister by the whole blood, and two sisters and a brother by the half blood; and was possessed of property, amounting, at the time of his death, to between sixteen and twenty thousand pounds.

The testamentary papers before the Court are paper B, the original draft of a will; and paper A, a will or testament itself. This latter instrument is pleaded, and proved to have been drawn up from the former, and was executed by the deceased, in the presence of three witnesses, with the usual formalities, on the 6th day of June, 1818. He appoints in it seven executors, amongst whom are Thomas Scruby and Charles Finch, the parties now propounding the instrument, as it existed in its original state, and at the time of its execution. [75] For its present plight and condition (in which it was left by the deceased) are as follows:—A part of the last line of the fourth sheet, and a part of the first line of the fifth sheet, is obliterated with ink; and the upper part of this same fifth sheet, down to the tenth line, is also torn, or gnawn, or otherwise defaced. It is pleaded, and proved, that the passage obliterated with ink ran as follows:—"Unto Mr. Thomas Scruby, of Melbourn, the sum of 500l.;" and that the several bequests in the upper part of the fifth sheet, down to the tenth line, were—"Unto William Mortlock, Esq. of Meldreth, the sum of 500l.; unto Mr. William Scruby, of Malton, the sum of 500l.; unto Mr. William Wedd, of Foulmire, the sum of 500l.; unto Mr. William Nash, of Royston, the sum of 500l.; unto Mr. Charles Finch, sen. of Cambridge, the sum of 500l.; unto Mr. Thomas Newbury, of Melbourn, the sum of 200l.; unto Mr. Richard Beaumont, of Whaddon, the sum of 100l.; and unto Mr. Joseph Dickson, of Littington, the sum of 100l."

The execution of the will itself, and the capacity of the deceased at the time of execution, are admitted on all hands. It is proved to have been prepared with great deliberation: the bequests contained in it were canvassed, in repeated interviews, between the deceased and his solicitor, Mr. Wedd, of Royston, who drew it up; and the draft was settled by counsel prior to its engrossment for execution. In substance it provides for the sister by the whole blood, and her family, the more liberally, it should seem, through Mr. Wedd's good offices; it bequeaths legacies to several friends and relations, eleven in number; and it disposes of the rest, and [76] residue, comprising a large proportion of the whole property, to charitable uses.

To this disposition of his affairs the deceased adhered for nearly three years, and up to the time of his death; unless any thing to the contrary is to be collected from the present plight and condition of his will. It is contended, however, that nothing to the contrary is to be so collected. For the case set up is that the instrument was so, in part, at least, apparently, cancelled by the testator, whilst he was of unsound mind, memory, and understanding. And the Court is prayed to decree probate of the instrument, as it originally stood; supplying the blanks caused by these apparent cancellations from paper B, the admitted draft of the instrument.

It appears that the deceased and his family were not upon the most amicable terms. His father died when he was an infant; his mother married again, and had a second family. The mother, as administratrix of the father, took possession of a leasehold estate, of considerable value, for herself and her children, which was occupied and farmed, for a series of years, by her second husband. On the deceased becoming of age, in the month of March, 1812, differences arose as respecting that estate; which, being referred to arbitration, produced an award, giving the deceased possession of the estate upon certain conditions. A bill in Chancery was filed by the one party to set aside this award; and steps were taken in the Court of King's Bench, by the other, to enforce submission to it. It is true that, in this stage of the business, a compromise was effected, through the interference of mutual friends [77] to the parties, but it is in evidence that the deceased, from this period, never cordially forgave "the Fordhams;" and that his father and brother-in-law (the husband of his sister by the whole blood), both named Fordham, were the objects of his particular disaffection. I have already said that this sister was indebted to Mr. Wedd's interposition for partaking so largely of the deceased's testamentary bounty. She it is, and her husband, who oppose the will, as propounded, it being their interest, under the will, that it shall be pronounced for in its present plight, rather than in its original state. An appearance has also been given, indeed, for the next of kin, praying an intestacy; but their opposition may be taken as virtually abandoned.

At the time when this will was made and executed there is no reason to suspect the testator of any intention to marry. But it seems that, for some months prior to his decease, he had paid his addresses to the daughter of a friend and neighbour, who had consented to be married to him, with the perfect sanction and approbation of her family. Now this circumstance has been taken hold of by the counsel against the will, as propounded, as laying a foundation for those mutilations apparent on the face of it, for the validity of which they would contend. But in order to determine the force of this argument it is requisite to consider what these mutilations in themselves import; or, in other words, what would be their effect, supposing the Court should incline to pronounce for them, as being of opinion that the testator was perfectly sane and rational at the time of their being made. For, if it should appear that these cancellations, at most, could [78] operate merely as revocations of particular legacies, and not as a revocation of the whole will, it disposes at once of the argument for the probability, à priori, of the deceased's being induced to make them, from this circumstance of his contemplated marriage. By the result of this enquiry will also be determined the propriety, on the contrary, of the parties in distribution ceasing to contend for an intestacy.

Now, as with respect to this part of the case, I am of opinion that, on the face of the instrument itself, this obliteration and tearing could, at most, effect a partial only, and not a total, revocation of the instrument. Questions of revocation are mere questions of intention—all which rests with the Court, in respect of them, is to put a rational construction upon the act of revocation. If a testator tear off or efface his seal and signature, at the end of a will, the Court will infer an intention to revoke the whole will; this being the ordinary mode of performing that operation. If a testator, on the other hand, obliterates a particular clause, this, on the same principle, operates only as a revocation pro tanto or of that particular clause.(a) So, again, if part of one sheet of a will, consisting of several sheets, be torn off or cut through, the other sheets, together with the signature, attestation, and so forth, remaining in their original state, this would [79] only revoke the part actually so cut or torn; and would not enure to a revocation of the whole will. Whether, indeed, any person in his senses, under ordinary circumstances, would resort to this mode of partial revocation is another question: but if he did, or must be presumed so to have done, I am of opinion that the effect could be only that last described. Now these considerations, I apprehend, dispose of the whole argument against the will, as propounded, built upon the deceased's intention to have been married. His intention to marry might be ground for revoking his whole will, as preparatory to a new disposition of his property altogether; but it could be no reason for cancelling particular legacies; the whole effect of this last operation being to swell the residue, which, as well as specific sums to a large amount, stands bequeathed, as I have already said, to charitable uses. The same considerations, by the way, also evince that the parties in distribution could not have contended effectually for an intestacy.

The history of the deceased, as spoken to by the witnesses, is peculiar and affecting. He is described as "a very clever, sensible, young man, quick and keen in business, of a lively and cheerful disposition, but rather irritable." This is said to have been his "general character," and it continued to be, for any thing that appears in evidence to the contrary, till within a few days of his decease. On the Monday (30th April) preceding that event he is described by Mr. Wedd, upon whom he had called at Royston, as "transacting business correctly;" but as evidently labouring under "a great dejection of spirits;" and, in par-[80]-ticular, as impressed with a notion, for which there does not seem to have been the slightest foundation, that his intended match with Miss H. was "off," as he expressed it; or would never take place. On Wednesday, the 2d of May, the deceased was visited by Mr. Mortlock; and on Thursday, the 3d of May, at his own express desire, by Mr. Wedd; and the depositions of these gentlemen render it obvious that his disorder in this interval was still gaining ground. They represent him, on those days, as buried in gloom and despondency, and visited with a number of fancies, the mere offspring of that malady, with the seeds of which he was obviously impregnated on the preceding Monday. He still insisted that his match with Miss H. was "off," assigning as the reason for it, when urged, one which could not be true; he complained that "all his friends turned their backs upon him, and could have nothing to say to him;" he said that a mere common place letter which he had received in answer to one enquiring the character of a bailiff was "ironical," and meant to "banter him;" and that he had been betrayed by the parishioners of Melbourn, at a parish meeting, into "signing a paper, by which he was ruined." These and similar notions, which haunted the deceased's imagination, had no foundation whatever but in his own distempered fancy.

It is not my intention to pursue this melancholy history in detail. It is sufficient to state that the deceased became rapidly worse—and that during the last three days, at least, of his existence, he was decidedly lunatic. In the course of Sunday, the 6th of May, towards midnight, he escaped from [81] the persons about him, by leaping from a window of some height into the garden of his house; and was suffocated in a pool or pond of shallow water, contiguous to the garden, into which he either threw himself, or accidentally fell; possibly, in making his way towards some deeper water a little further off, for the purpose of self-destruction. Mr. Haines, his medical attendant, speaks to his belief that he was "meditating suicide" on the Saturday, the day preceding.

I shall now briefly advert to those parts of the evidence which respect the deceased's operations upon his will, on the particular subject of which it will be seen that the deceased, although constantly harping upon it, was not a bit more rational than in his general conduct.

Mr. Mortlock, an intimate friend and neighbour of the deceased, deposes that just as he was about to leave the deceased's house on the morning of Wednesday, the 2d of May, after the visit to which I have just alluded, the deceased followed him, and stopt him, saying, "I want you to take care of a paper which Joseph Wedd has given me for you." The deponent having asked "what paper Mr. Wedd could have given him for the deponent," the deceased told him "it was his (the deceased's) will; and that he wished the deponent to take care of it for him." The deceased looked for it in the parlour where they were, but could not find it. The deponent told him that "he could not stop then, but that he would be with him again in the afternoon, and would then take it." In the afternoon, however, of that day the deceased rode over to Mr. Mortlock's, and remained alone with him [82] nearly three hours. Mr. Mortlock represents him as buried in gloom and despondency, which he now ascribes to mental derangement, though he did not so consider it at that time. In the course of conversation he repeated his wish that "Mr. Mortlock should take charge of his will," which, however, he had not brought with him, for the purpose of depositing in his custody, as might have been expected.

In the morning of Friday, the 4th of May, the deceased had a good deal of irrational conversation with his housekeeper, Taylor, on the subject of his will. He repeatedly expressed his fears that "the Fordhams would get at it," in which case, as he expressed it, "Melbourn" would be ruined.(a) He wished her to convey it to Mr. Thomas Jarmain's, a neighbour, which she refused. He then persuaded her to take charge of it herself, to which at length she consented, and folded it up in one of her gowns, by the express desire of the deceased, where it remained till the evening of that day. She deposes that "about eight o'clock in the evening the deceased, who had gone out on horseback, and who, it appears, had dined with Mr. William Scruby, of Malton, his uncle by marriage, returned home, and after being alone some little time in the parlour, rang for the deponent and desired her to fetch him that parcel which he had given her in the morning, and added, 'I want to put some writing into it,' or 'I have got more writing to put into it,' or to that effect: she went and fetched [83] it to him, and left it with him; he said nothing that she recollects when she gave it to him: he remained in the parlour alone after that for some time, she cannot say how long; from half an hour to an hour it might be: he then rang for, or called her, and again wished her to take the will, but she did not like to have it again: he kept worrying her about it as he had done in the morning, either to take it herself, or to send for her husband and let him take it, to Mr. Jarmain's." This continued till the deceased was diverted from his importunity by the arrival of Mr. Scruby.

Mr. Scruby, who had followed the deceased home, in some alarm, deposes that "on hearing his voice, as he believes, the deceased came out from the parlour, and said, 'He was glad the deponent was come, that he was just setting off to the deponent's house;' he then took the deponent into the parlour, a parcel was lying on the table, the deceased said, 'Here is what I was telling you about, what I was going to send to Jarmain's.' He then broke open an envelope, and gave the enclosure to the deponent, saying, 'There, do you take this home with you;' the outer cover which he so took off was addressed, in the hand-writing of the deceased, to Mr. Jarmain; the inner cover which the deceased did not break, but in which he gave the parcel to the deponent, was addressed, also in the hand-writing of the deceased, to the deponent, or Mr. Mortlock; and the deponent put it in his pocket." After some further incoherent conversation the "deceased ordered his horse, and accompanied the witness home, where he agreed to take a bed. The witness, after supper, attended the deceased to his bed-room, [84] where he left him; and, shortly afterwards, retired to his own bed-room, immediately over that in which the deceased was to sleep; appointing a female servant to sit up in a room adjoining the deceased's, and to call him up if she heard the deceased moving. Accordingly, he had scarcely retired to bed when he was summoned to the deceased's apartment, whom he found extremely agitated, and insisting on the re-delivery of the 'paper which he had given the witness.'" The witness deposes that "on giving it him, he broke open the seal, and kept turning the sheets over and over; he said, 'I scratched my pen over Tom Scruby when I was a little angry with him about the small tithes, but I wish that to be as it was—he has been a very kind friend to me'—nothing would satisfy the deceased but he would have the will from the deponent, and he had it, as he has deposed; and then, when he had done with it, the deponent had to get him wax to seal it up again, and he was very particular in sealing it up again." The deponent says that "while the deceased was turning over the sheets of his will, he stood by the side of the bed, and noticed him—his manner was quite insane—he turned over a sheet, looked at the next, and did not attempt to read it, or any part of it." After the deceased had sealed up his will again he gave it to the witness, who locked it up in a drawer in the room, and took out the key, and determined on continuing with the deceased during the rest of the night, in the course of which he fell asleep, and slept till awakened by the deceased. He goes on to depose that "he left the deceased about six o'clock, and returned about eight, when he found him still in bed." On the [85] deponent asking him how he did, the deceased answered, "How am I? I am a wretch not fit to live, I am a devil—what have I been doing? I have been tearing my will." The deponent, not believing this, having locked it up, and not seeing it about, said, "Oh, no!—you have not"—he said, "I have"—the deponent said "No, no"—upon which the deceased took it from under the bed cloathes, and casting it before the deponent on the bed, said, "There it is"—the deponent turned over the pages, and not, at first, seeing the torn part, said, "Oh, no!—I don't think you have torn it." The deceased rose up in the bed, and reaching a coat that lay by the side of the bed, put his hand in the pocket, and pulled out some torn pieces of paper, which he gave to the deponent, saying, "There it is; I have been gnawing it like a dog—Oh! what a wretch am I, I have been trying to injure my best friends—can it be repaired?" The deponent, to pacify him, told him he had no doubt but it could; the deceased added, "Only think that I should go to the drawer, and that one of my keys (of which he had several with him) should undo it." The deponent then gathered the pieces of paper which the deceased had given him, and folded them into the will, which he again put into the drawer.

On the Saturday morning the deceased, still continuing at Mr. William Scruby's, consented to be bled; after which he was apparently quiet, and possibly enjoyed something of a lucid interval for several hours. He soon, however, relapsed, and reverted to the subject of his will, insisting on having "that paper again." The deponent, not thinking it right that the deceased should have it, [86] told him that he had given it to Mr. Mortlock, who had been at the deponent's house in the course of the morning—the deceased at first suspected the truth of this assertion, but, on being satisfied by the deponent's assurances, he said "he would go to Mr. Mortlock for it, for have it he would;" the deponent, who "saw the storm rising," as he expresses it, took an opportunity of fetching the will, and dispatching it by Mr. Haines to Mr. Mortlock; and then, seeing that nothing would satisfy the deceased, agreed to ride with him to Mr. Mortlock. The deceased was very impatient—"They set out together, but the deceased very quickly broke away from the deponent, and rode off at speed."

Mr. Mortlock deposes that, In the afternoon of Saturday, between three and four o'clock, as he best recollects, Mr. Haines came to the deponent's house in great haste, and brought with him the deceased's will—but there was hardly time for him to tell the deponent the occasion of his visit, or for the deponent to put the will in his secretary, when the deponent, looking round on hearing an exclamation from his wife, saw the deceased himself, riding, at speed, to the house; the deceased leaped a chain, came through a narrow way between two posts, where there was scarcely room for a horse to pass, into the garden—jumped from the horse, rushed into the hall, and, knocking down two of the children of the deponent, and pushing aside his wife, came up to the deponent, in a state of the greatest agitation, insisting on having his will. The witness endeavoured to persuade the deceased to leave it in his (the witness's) custody, but the deceased betrayed [87] such increasing agitation about it, that the witness, by the advice of Mr. Haines, and in order to calm the deceased, at length suffered him to have it. He still, however, pressed the deceased to leave it in his keeping, which the deceased at last said that he would, provided the deponent would let him have some paper and wax to seal it up. The deponent accordingly lighted a candle, and having supplied him with some writing paper, and a stick of sealing-wax, the deceased proceeded to enclose the will in an envelope, and seal it up; this he did with considerable industry, for he sealed it in many places, but in a very few minutes afterwards the deponent heard him tearing something behind him; the deponent getting round him, and seeing what he was about, suddenly withdrew the will itself from the cover, which the deceased had torn open, trying, as it seemed to the deponent to tear the will itself, but without having actually done so. The deceased then tore the cover (which it seems not unlikely that he mistook for the will itself) in pieces, and held them over the candle, burning them as if he was at play with them; the whole action being one of decided derangement. The deponent (who appears to have used considerable dexterity in recovering possession of the will) then withdrew with it up stairs. The deceased remained at Mr. Mortlock's house till about nine o'clock that evening; between eight and nine Mr. Mortlock proposed that the deceased should go home, to which he assented, but when the gig came, he could not be prevailed upon to get into it—he put his foot on the step five or six times, and then withdrew it, and returned into the parlour, each time beckoning or calling to the de-[88]-ponent, who had taken his seat in the gig, to follow him, telling him that he wanted to speak with him alone. On each occasion when the deponent was alone with him, he told him what he wished principally to say was about his will—he asked where it was—the deponent, considering him to be in an unfit state to have it in his possession, told him that he had burnt it—"Well then," said the deceased, "can't I make another?" the deponent told him that he might—that a man might make a will at any time, &c.—"Could not he then make another?" he said—"Might not he make another?" and in this way he continued, calling the deponent back, and asking what had become of his will, and when told that he had burnt it, asking, over and over again, "whether he could not make another?" At length, however, the deceased was persuaded to get into the gig, and was driven home by Mr. Mortlock to his house at Melbourn. As for the will itself, that remained in Mr. Mortlock's custody, till he delivered up the possession of it to Mr. Wedd, after the melancholy catastrophe of the following evening already alluded to.

Now, in the face of this evidence, it would be idle to contend that the deceased was sane at the time of reducing this fifth sheet of his will (whether by tearing or gnawing it, non constat) to the plight in which it now appears; and I have no hesitation whatever in pronouncing for those legacies, as part of that will, which are proved to have stood at the top of this fifth sheet, when in its integral state.

To the obliteration with ink, of the legacy of 500l. to Mr. Thomas Scruby, in the bottom line of the fourth, and top line of the fifth, sheet of the [89] will, different considerations apply; and this, indeed, is the only part of the case upon which the Court has felt, all along, any sort of difficulty. The ground of distinction between this and the other part of the case is, that it is impossible to ascertain the precise time at which the obliteration was made. It might have been made at any time within ten or eleven months before the deceased's death—for the deceased, as I shall presently observe, is proved to have had the will so long in his possession or custody, though for nearly the two years next after its execution it had remained in the hands of Mr. Wedd. But, on the other hand, the high probability is that it was effected on the Friday evening preceding his decease, at which time he was, decidedly, insane. On that evening it is proved, by Taylor's evidence, to which I have already adverted, that the deceased was alone, with the instrument before him, for from half an hour to an hour, for the express purpose, as he assured the witness, of "putting some writing, or putting some more writing into it." It should seem from the deposition of the same witness, that the deceased had an equally apposite occasion of performing the operation on the same Friday morning, for he, probably, had been busy with his will, prior to his dispatching Taylor for a candle and sealing wax for the purpose of securing it in an envelope, as she speaks to his having done, on the morning of that day. Be this, however, as it may, to the morning, or the evening, of that Friday, I am clearly of opinion that this obliteration is, with far the greater probability, to be referred.

Still, however, it must be admitted, that the [90] Court has no direct evidence of the time, or, consequently, of the deceased's state of mind at the time, of the act done. It must have recourse, therefore, to the usual mode of ascertaining it in such cases—which is, by looking at the act itself—for this I take to be the general rule, where a will is traced into the hands of a testator, whose sanity is once fairly impeached, but of whose sanity or insanity at the time of doing or performing some act with relation to that will there is no direct constat. In other words, the agent is to be inferred rational, or the contrary, in such cases, from the character, broadly taken, of his act.

Applying, therefore, this test to the present question, I am led to consider whether the obliteration of this legacy of 500l. to Mr. Thomas Scruby, under all the circumstances, were a rational act in itself—and whether it were rationally done, and performed, as to the mode of obliteration resorted to by the deceased. Now I own that I can bring myself, exactly, to neither of these conclusions.

And, first, how was the act done or performed? If a person of sound mind was about to revoke a legacy, he would probably erase it, or strike his pen through, or draw lines across it; and, if a person of only ordinary caution, he would note the revocation in the margin, accompanied with its date, and authenticated by his signature, or the initials of his name. Has any thing of the sort occurred in this instance? The mode of obliteration appears to have been this: The testator appears to have let drops of ink fall on the passage from the quill part of a pen, and then to have smeared it over with the feather end; and that so incautiously, as in part to [91] efface, at the same time, his own signature at the bottom of the fourth sheet. Now this is hardly a sane mode of obliteration. It is observable, too, that the testator has suffered the phrase, "my eleven last mentioned legatees," to stand at the very foot of this obliteration, though, if valid, it reduces the number to ten; and that the name of Mr. Thomas Scruby is left as an executor, though it is purported to be struck out as a legatee.

Nor, secondly, can I quite be of opinion that the act itself, independent of the mode of action, is perfectly rational: it is so far, at least, irrational as to be capable of no assignable reason, which, perhaps, under the circumstances, is all that is required. It has, however, been attempted to be shewn that something of a reason did exist for the testator altering his mind as to Mr. Thomas Scruby's legacy; and to this end interrogatories have been addressed to, I believe, all the witnesses, as to a misunderstanding which is supposed to have occurred between the deceased and Mr. Thomas Scruby, subsequent to the making of the will. Now, in the first place, it is not quite clear whether this misunderstanding did not occur prior to the execution of the will; but, be that as it may, this at least is certain, that any coolness which it might have occasioned between the parties had subsided long before the deceased ever had this will in his possession. For it appears by the evidence of nearly all the witnesses that the difference in question (as to the origin of which, too, the deceased had the candour to admit himself in the wrong) occurred in the spring of the year 1818, and that it lasted, as one of the witnesses expresses it, "a very little while." And it is mani-[92]-fest by the deposition of Mr. Wedd, that the will was in his custody from the time of its execution till the month of May or June, 1820, when it was delivered to the deceased by Mr. Wedd (of his own mere motion, and not at the request of the deceased, as for any purpose of alteration or cancellation) only ten or eleven months prior to the death of the deceased.

And this last piece of evidence, by the way, nearly disposes of the argument, derived from what has been termed the deceased's "recognition" of the obliteration, contained in his declaration, already stated, to Mr. William Scruby, that he had "scratched his pen over Tom Scruby when he was a little angry with him about the small tithes." Supposing, however, that the deceased's averment on this head had not been erroneous on the face of it, as it plainly was, still the Court could scarcely have ventured to build any superstructure on the foundation of what fell from a man, in the state of derangement which the deceased is proved to have been in at the time of making this supposed "recognition."

Upon the whole, then, the Court has reason to be satisfied that the testator was of unsound mind, memory, and understanding at the time, as well of cancelling this legacy to Mr. Thomas Scruby, as of defacing the bequests at the top of the fifth sheet of his will; and I have no hesitation in pronouncing for the will, as it originally stood, in both respects.

[93] STANHOPE v. BALDWIN, OTHERWISE GOSSTER, FALSELY CALLED STANHOPE. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1822.—A marriage annulled by reason of an undue publication of banns, under 26 Geo. 2, c. 33.

Augustus Henry Edward Stanhope, the natural and lawful son of the Earl and Countess of Harrington, was born on the 25th of March, 1794, and was baptized, on the 14th of May following, by the aforesaid names of Augustus Henry Edward. On the 8th of May, 1813, at the age of little more than nineteen, he was married to Jane Baldwin, otherwise Gosster, in the parish church of St. John, Hampstead, by virtue of banns, in which he was described as "Edward Stanhope" only. This was a suit instituted by Mr. Stanhope, to annul his marriage with his said wife, by reason of such (undue) publication of banns.

On the part of Mr. Stanhope it was pleaded and proved that at all times, from his baptism, he was called and known by the name of Augustus, to the entire exclusion of the names of Henry and Edward. These last, indeed, were so completely dormant that even his nearest relatives, and most intimate friends, were ignorant that he had any other Christian name than that of Augustus. It was further pleaded and proved that the said marriage was had without the consent or knowledge of Lord Harrington; and that, in order to conceal it the more effectually from Mr. Stanhope's friends, the parties [94] had been married in disguise—Mr. Stanhope having assumed, on that occasion, the dress of a groom, or labouring man, and the lady that of a maid servant. It was also in evidence that Lord Harrington did not become acquainted with his son's marriage for more than two years afterwards; at which time his said son had attained his majority—that Mr. Stanhope had been resident abroad nearly ever since his marriage—and that he had only recently ascertained that proceedings could be instituted, with a prospect of having the marriage declared null and void.

The Judge (Sir Christopher Robinson) was of opinion that the ground of nullity charged was fully sustained; and that, even if the variation did not go intirely to disguise the identity, which he was inclined to hold, still that he was bound, under the circumstances, to pronounce a sentence dissolving the marriage.(a)

[96] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE, PROMOTED BY CLINTON v. HATCHARD. In the Commissary Court of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, Hilary Term, 1822. —"Chiding and brawling in a church," penalty of, under 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4.—No person can be a lecturer, although elected by the parishioners, without the rector's consent—unless there be an immemorial custom to elect without his consent.

This was a proceeding by articles against Henry Hatchard, of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, at the promotion of the Rev. Dr. Charles Fynes Clinton, prebendary of the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster, and incumbent curate of the said parish. The articles, after pleading, first, the general law touching the orderly demeanour of persons who repair to their parish churches; and, secondly, that part of 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4, which respects quarrelling, chiding, or brawling, in any church, went on to charge that the said Henry Hatchard did, in the afternoon of Sunday the 10th of December, 1820, whilst at the church of St. Margaret, Westminster, and during the celebration of divine service therein, behave in an irreverent and disorderly manner, and annoy and interrupt the Rev. William Johnson Rodber, assistant curate of the said parish, whilst he was passing from the vestry-room to the pulpit, and endeavour to prevent him from preaching a sermon therein—that he, the said Henry Hatchard, in order to effect his said purpose, had caused, or induced a number of persons to collect about the vestry door, by shouting, in a loud tone, "We want some friends about the [97] vestry-room door;" so that the said Rev. William Johnson Rodber could, with difficulty, effect a passage from the said vestry-room to the pulpit—that, during the said Rev. William Johnson Rodber's passage from the said vestry-room towards the pulpit, the said Henry Hatchard took hold of his gown, and, addressing himself to him, said, "Here is Mr. Saunders, ready to do his duty; why won't you let him preach?" that upon the said Rev. William Johnson Rodber's disengaging his gown, and still proceeding towards the pulpit, he, the said Henry Hatchard, followed him, repeating the word "Shame;" and adding, in an angry, chiding, and reproachful manner, "For shame, Mr. Rodber; Mr. Saunders was regularly elected—why not let him preach? For shame"—and that, by such (a) See the principles which governed the decision of this case laid down in the case of Pouget v. Tomkins, 1 Phill. 499.

It is to be observed that the statute 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, commonly called the New Marriage Act, does not render good and valid, marriages had by banns, prior to the passing of the act, such marriages being, in themselves, null and void by reason of undue publication of banns—but only such as, being had by licence prior to that period, were, in themselves, null and void by reason of minority and want of legal consent. A marriage therefore prior to the 1st of September, 1822 [vide s. 21 of the act], had in virtue of banns unduly published, is still a nullity; and must be so pronounced, upon proof made in a suit instituted for that purpose. But it is provided by the act [s. 19 & 21] that no marriage had by banns, from and after the 1st of September, 1822, "shall be avoided, on account of the true name, or names, of either party not being used in the publica-[95]-tion of such banns; but it shall be lawful, in support of such marriage, to give evidence that the persons, who were actually married by the names specified in such publication of banns, were so married; and such marriage shall be deemed good and valid, to all intents and purposes, notwithstanding false names, or a false name, assumed by both, or either of the said parties, in the publication of such banns, or at the time of the solemnization of such marriage."

irreverent and improper conduct, he, the said Henry Hatchard, greatly annoyed and disturbed, as well the said Rev. William Johnson Rodber in the performance of his duty, as the congregation then assembled in the said church, for the purpose of divine worship.

A responsive allegation was given, and admitted on the part of the said Henry Hatchard, which pleaded, in substance, that in the autumn of the year 1820 the afternoon parochial and unendowed lectureship of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, having become vacant, the Rev. Isaac Saunders, rector of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, was chosen lecturer against several competitors, by a majority of parishioners at a poll taken by the churchwardens on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of December in that year—that it being doubted during the said election whether Dr. Clinton, the incumbent, would grant Mr. Saunders the use of the pulpit, if elected, much [98] curiosity was excited among the parishioners to know the result, which led to the assemblage of an unusual number of persons at the afternoon service at St. Margaret's on the ensuing Sunday, being the 10th of December—that, among others, the said Henry Hatchard went, and arrived there towards the conclusion of prayers; and having learnt upon his arrival that the said Mr. Saunders was in the vestry, he went thither to inquire whether he was, or was not, allowed to preach—that being answered by that gentleman in the negative, he withdrew from the vestry into one of the aisles of the church, where, having learnt soon afterwards from one of the beadles that the said Mr. Saunders had retired into the church-yard, upon the vestry being cleared, he also went there and found him in conversation with a friend, who suggested that it would be proper to give formal notice to Mr. Rodber, the officiating curate, that Mr. Saunders was in attendance as a matter of curtesy; and that the said Henry Hatchard, as a supporter of the said Mr. Saunders, was a proper person to communicate such notice to Mr. Rodber—that the said Henry Hatchard thereupon proceeded towards the vestry for the purpose so suggested; but that, encountering Mr. Rodber in his way from the said vestry, which he had just left, to the pulpit steps, he said to him in a very low tone of voice, and in a mild and respectful manner, "Mr. Rodber, sir, the Rev. Isaac Saunders is here to perform the duty to which he has been elected"—that the said Rev. William Johnson Rodber taking no notice thereof, the said Henry Hatchard immediately turned away and left the said church, which he did not re-enter during [99] that afternoon—that, on the said Henry Hatchard so turning away, several persons cried out "Shame, shame," and "For shame, Mr. Rodber," or to that effect; and there was a noise, and a hissing, and a considerable tumult, in the said church; but that the said Henry Hatchard took no part in the same—that he had not previously shouted or said in a loud tone of voice, or otherwise, "We want some friends at the vestry-room door;" and that he did not subsequently accompany the said William Johnson Rodber towards the pulpit steps, exclaiming, "For shame, Mr. Rodber," or to that effect; or address him in any other words than those before pleaded.

No evidence was adduced in support of this allegation; but three witnesses were produced and examined upon the articles.

Frederick Price, one of the bearers of the parish, deposed (in substance)—that he was at the parish church of St. Margaret, Westminster, on the afternoon in question, and that, just after the evening prayers were finished, he observed Mr. Hatchard (whom he had never seen at the said church before, but at a funeral, he being an undertaker) standing very near the vestry door, by the deponent whose office it was to attend the officiating clergyman from the vestry to the pulpit—that he distinctly heard him say to a person who stood close to him, "We want a few friends near the vestry-room door"—that, as Mr. Rodber was passing from the vestry towards the pulpit, he was closely followed by Mr. Hatchard, who said to him in the deponent's hearing, plainly and distinctly, "Shame, Mr. Rodber, Mr. Saunders is regularly elected—why not let him preach?—for shame of you"—that immediately [100] upon Mr. Rodber's ascending the pulpit, a number of persons began to hiss and shout, and call out "shame"—whereby so great a tumult was excited that a very few of the congregation could possibly distinguish Mr. Rodber's sermon, although preached in his loudest tone, and that after the service was over the crowd, which was greater than ever the deponent had seen there either before or since, would not quit the church till a magistrate was sent for and arrived, from the Queen Square Police Office, accompanied by several constables—and that it was between five and six o'clock before the church was cleared. This witness further deposed that, "Although there was some talking and a kind of murmuring noise before Mr. Hatchard addressed Mr. Rodber as above—yet there was nothing violent or outrageous until after he had so addressed him."

The Rev. William Johnson Rodber (in substance) deposed, that on Sunday the 10th of December, 1820, he attended the afternoon prayers at the parish church of St. Margaret, Westminster, as assistant curate of the parish—that as soon as the clergyman who read the prayers had finished he left his pew and retired to the vestry —that, on leaving the vestry for the pulpit where the deponent was about to preach, his progress was impeded by a great number of people about the vestry-door, among whom was Henry Hatchard, the party proceeded against, so that the deponent had great difficulty in effecting a passage towards the pulpit—that he had proceeded but a short way from the vestry, when he felt the left sleeve of his gown pulled and heard his own name called out; where-[101]-upon he turned round, and saw the said Henry Hatchard, who immediately said, "Mr. Rodber, here is Mr. Saunders ready to do his duty, will you choose to let him preach?" [The deponent says that he had observed the said Rev. Mr. Saunders in the said church during the afternoon prayers, and knew him to have been elected afternoon preacher by the parishioners, although he had been denied the use of the pulpit even for a probationary sermon, and had been told that it would still be denied to him in the event of his being elected]—that the deponent did not make any reply to the said Henry Hatchard, but passed on—that the said Henry Hatchard kept close to the deponent, and as he was passing near the rail of the altar, again addressed him, saying angrily, "Mr. Rodber, why won't you let Mr. Saunders preach?—he has been regularly elected—for shame"—that deponent still not answering, but forcing his way through the crowd, a most violent outcry and noise immediately took place—that in his passage through the crowd to the pulpit steps, which the deponent with difficulty effected, by aid of two of the church beadles, he was kicked till both his legs were black and blue, and hissed at, and spit upon—whilst there were many persons crying out, "Mr. Rodber, come back, don't disgrace yourself" —that the deponent delivered his sermon in the midst of an uproar, which continued during the whole service, and was loud enough at times to drown the sound of the organ and the voices of the congregation and the charity children—that this uproar was such as the deponent had never upon any occasion before witnessed, and that after the service the crowd [102] was obliged to be dispersed by constables—that it was evidently the intention of the persons who hustled the deponent in his way to the pulpit to prevent him from reaching it—and that the said Henry Hatchard was principally instrumental in this attempt, and in exciting the tumult and disorder which otherwise existed in the said church.

The evidence of John Woodward, also one of the bearers of the parish, was precisely corroborative of that of Price, the first witness, and that of Mr. Rodber.

Judgment—Dr. Swabey [after stating the charge, and recapitulating the evidence]. Upon this view of the case I conceive it impossible to deny that the offence imputed to this defendant, and which, as appears, may be one of great consequence, is brought home to him by the clearest and most indisputable evidence. In particular, no language can be a "chiding and brawling" within the statute of Edw. 6, in a truer sense of the words than the defendant's expostulations or remonstrances with Mr. Rodber, as spoken to by the several witnesses, upon the occasion in question. The attempted justification set up (in plea) can be regarded in no other light than that of a mere pretext. Not only was a "formal notice" to Mr. Rodber that Mr. Saunders was in attendance purely superfluous, but its delivery can scarcely, I think, under the circumstances, be ascribed by any stretch of charity to a laudable motive. But be that as it may, it is certain that the scene of tumult and disorder which ensued was the actual, if it was not the designed, consequence of the delivery of this [103] "notice" by the defendant; who therefore has been selected, in my judgment, with great propriety, as the person against whom these proceedings have been instituted. A very little inquiry, which it was his duty to have made, if inclined to meddle in this matter at all, would have instructed him, that in the case of every, at least unendowed, lectureship no choice, by the parish, of a lecturer is effective without the consent or approval of the rector; (a) whose undoubted right it is, in every such case, to grant to, or

(a) No person can be a lecturer, endowed or unendowed, without the rector's consent, unless there be an immemorial custom to elect without his consent—where withhold from, the lecturer so chosen the use of his pulpit. At all events, however, he could not be ignorant that if Mr. Saunders had a legal right to the pulpit in the instance in question, there must be a legal mode of enforcing it—that any other mode of attempting to enforce it was as unjustifiable as it must eventually prove unavailing; and that an appeal to private judgment, or rather to popular feeling, upon such a subject (which this defendant's conduct amounted to, in my apprehen-[104]-sion of it), was illegal, as well as, in the highest degree, indecorous.

It remains only to pronounce the sentence of the law, which assigns to this species of offence, the offender being a layman, the penalty of suspension ab ingressu ecclesiæ, for a discretionary period. I am induced to limit that period to one month only (to be computed from Wednesday next) in the present instance, from the circumstance of this defendant being an undertaker. I trust that he will be sensible of the lenity of the Court in this respect—and that, in future, he will be led to his parish church by better motives, and conduct himself in it with greater caution and propriety.

I accompany this sentence of suspension with a decree for costs against Mr. Hatchard, as a matter of course.

[105] SCHULTES v. HODGSON. Arches Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1822.—1. The admissibility of articles is not debateable, in an appeal Court, upon an appeal entered more than fifteen days after their admission by the Court à quo. 2. In criminal suits the defendant's answers, upon oath, are not to be required, even to those heads or positions which are not, in themselves, criminatory.

(An appeal from the Consistory Court of Sarum.)

This was an appeal from the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Sarum, promoted and brought by the Rev. John Schultes, vicar of the vicarage and parish church of Hagbourn, in the county of Berks, diocese of Sarum, and province of Canterbury, against Christopher Hodgson of Parliament Street, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, and province aforesaid, from two certain orders or decrees, made, and interposed, in a certain cause, or business, of the office of the Judge, promoted by the said Christopher Hodgson, against the said Rev. John Schultes, "touching and concerning his soul's health, and the reformation of his manners, and correction of his excesses, and more especially touching and concerning the crimes of fornication, adultery and incontinency, committed by him, and the fame thereof." By the first of such orders or decrees, bearing date the 22d of November, 1821, the Judge appealed from "admitted the articles tendered by the promovent" only upon that same Court day, notwithstanding the defendant dissented to their admission, and prayed to be assigned a term, to the next Court, [106] in order to consult upon their admissibility; by the second, bearing date the 19th of December, he, the said Judge, further decreed that "the defendant should take the usual oath for his personal answers to the said articles." The other proceedings had in the Court below are stated in the judgment.

On the part of the appellant various objections were taken by counsel to the articles admitted as above, in point both of form and of substance—in particular, it was submitted that the time had gone by when Ecclesiastical Courts would, or ought to, proceed upon common fame. They also contended that it was not competent to the Court appealed from to require the defendant's answers, on oath, to articles exhibited against him, under the stat. 13 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 4,(a)—and that this was a grievance which the Court must, at once, pronounce for, whatever became of the other alleged matter of grievance, the admission of the articles.

Even after the rector's consent is obtained the bishop's license is also necessary—if not as forming part of the title of the lecturer, still, at least, to exempt him from the penalties of 13 & 14 Car. 2, vide s. 19, and Canons of 1603. Canon xxxvi. c. 4. Vide 1 T. R. 331.

On the other hand, it was contended, by counsel for the respondent, 1st, that no exceptions could now be taken to the articles—their admission having been acquiesced in for a longer term than that prescribed by law for an appeal; and, 2dly, on the authority of Oughton (vide tit. 66, 141, 142), that the defendant, [107] being himself present in Court, was bound to take the oath, and to answer to such positions or articles as were not criminatory (as to the first, for instance, pleading that the defendant was a clerk in holy orders, and vicar of Hagbourn; to the 11th, pleading the jurisdiction of the bishop of his diocese, &c.) though not to answer to such parts of the articles as conveyed any criminal imputation. They admitted, indeed, that the practice was otherwise in the superior Ecclesiastical Courts—but they protested against the judges of the diocesan and inferior Courts, which were slower in their changes, being liable to be appealed against for grievances, in adhering to the more ancient, and as they insisted, the correcter (or, at least, in many respects the more convenient) practice.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from two orders or decrees made by the Consistory Court of Sarum, in a cause of office, originally promoted there against a clerk of that diocese, for adultery, fornication, or incontinency.

The proceedings had in the Court appealed from seem to have occupied, in all, but three Court days. On the first of these, the 31st of October, being the day of the return of the citation, the party cited, not appearing, was pronounced contumacious. No writ,(a)[1] however, appears to have issued: and on the 2d Court day, the 22d of November, the defendant having appeared voluntarily, and taken the usual oath, &c. was absolved from his contumacy. The articles were then brought in, [108] and were admitted, instanter, notwithstanding the dissent of the defendant's proctor; and the defendant was monished to answer immediately: whereupon, the articles being first read over, the defendant gave, in person, a negative issue, and the proctor for the promovent was assigned a term probatory, till the next Court. On the 3d, and next following, Court day, the 19th of December, the Judge, at the the petition of the proctor for the promovent, decreed that the defendant should "take the usual oath for his personal answers"—when his proctor, for the first time, protested of a grievance, with intent to appeal. That appeal was entered accordingly, and has since been prosecuted, and the Court has now to determine on the matter, or matters, of alleged grievance.

The grievances (for they are to be spoken of in the plural number) purported to be appealed from, in special, seem to be, 1st, the admission to proof instanter of the articles, nothwitstanding the dissent of the proctor for the defendant, on the 22d of November; and, 2dly, the order or decree of Court, for the defendant's personal answers upon oath, of the 19th December.

Now, as with respect to the first alleged grievance—that of the 22d of November—it is observable that this appeal is only entered on the 24th of December, clearly after the fifteen days allowed by the statute.(a)[2] No appeal is protested of, even, till the 19th of December—and the protest is then only of appeal from steps taken by the Court on [109] that day, and not of appeal from the admission of the articles on the Court day preceding. The defendant too had acquiesced (a)[3] in the admission of the articles, by complying with the assignation of the Court in giving a negative issue, of course subsequent to their admission.

Upon these grounds I am of opinion that, however harsh and precipitate the proceedings in the Court below may have been, and however at variance, not merely with formal, but, in some respects, with substantial justice (for instance, as well in pronouncing the party contumacious on the very day of the return of the citation, which is still not complained of as a grievance; as in admitting the articles without affording the defendant time, or opportunity, to consult upon their admissibility, which now is, still), I am opinion that the admission of the articles had been too long, and too far, acquiesced in, to be duly appealed from; and, consequently, that the articles must stand admitted in their present form, however objectionable that form may be; the question of their admissibility being one of which the Court has no authority to dispose. Whether, if substantial justice require it, the Court, in the progress of the suit, may not devise some means of putting these articles into a more regular shape, if irregular in their subsisting form, is a point as to which it would be useless to enter into any present speculation. Mean time I may suggest to the counsel for the promovent, the propriety of considering [110] whether, and how far, it would be advisable to proceed to examine upon articles which were substantially faulty in their original frame and construction; without at all committing myself to any opinion that the articles in question are such.

The other matter of grievance, the order or decree for the personal answers of the defendant, is duly appealed from: so that the only question in respect of this is, was it, or was it not, in its own nature, an appealable grievance? Nor is it a question which imposes on the Court any sort of difficulty. This is a criminal suit; and I am clear that, in a criminal suit, under the statute of Car. 2, the answers on oath of the defendant are not to be required.(a)[1] An issue negative, or affirmative, is the only answer, and the calling for any other certainly is an appealable grievance.

The Court was aware indeed, prior to the argument, that the contrary was asserted by Oughton, whose authority upon points of this nature, generally, is not lightly to be questioned. But the practice (if such were the practice) of Oughton's time has been varied in all modern instances, and I conceive correctly, according to the very wording of the statute. For the statute provides that no ecclesiastical Judge shall tender any person whatsoever, any oath, whereby such person shall be charged to purge him or herself of any criminal matter or thing: it not simply justifies the party to whom the oath in question is tendered, in refusing to take it; [111] but it prohibits the very tender of it, by any person exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

It is argued, however, that this statute only goes to protect parties from being forced to answer criminal charges; and that it contains nothing which prevents the usual oath for answers from being administered to defendants in criminal suits, so as to oblige them to answer those articles objected to them, which are not criminal charges. To this interpretation of the statute I can by no means assent; it being neither consonant to practice, nor to those general principles, which govern, in this country, the administration of criminal justice.

And first, as to practice, the contrary has been laid down by this Court in such repeated instances, that it would be mere idle pedantry to refer to particular cases. It may, indeed, be the modified practice in civil suits, founded on criminal imputations; it is clearly not the practice at all, in suits directly criminal. For instance, if adultery be proceeded against by libel, quoad petendum divortium; the defendant's answers may be (though seldom are (a))[2] taken to such parts of the libel as involve no direct or implied charge of adultery. But if adultery be prosecuted by articles, quoad pœnam legalem; the defendant's answers may not be taken, not even (that is to such parts of the articles as involve no charge of adultery, either direct or implied. The same [112] holds, mutatis mutandis, in proceedings for incest, and in other cases. It is the not attending to this settled distinction which may have given rise to the erroneous notion that answers may be called for in criminal suits.

Nor, secondly, do I conceive that calling for answers in suits of this description, is more at variance with the correct practice, than it is objectionable upon sound principle. On principle parties are neither compellable to render themselves, nor to furnish their accusers means of rendering them, obnoxious to censure or punishment: they are neither to be forced to implicate, nor to do anything which has a tendency to implicate, themselves. The guilt of parties under prosecution is to be sifted out

(a)[1] It should seem that if the Ecclesiastical Court proceeded to enforce answers in a criminal suit, prohibition would lie. See Goulson v. Wainwright, 1 Sid. 374.

(a)[2] An issue, if confessing the marriage, though otherwise contesting suit negatively, is all that is required. Answers are seldom, if ever, called for in cases of this description; unless as to the fact of marriage, where the defendant's proctor has given a negative issue to the libel, generally, a step which is rarely taken.

by the depositions of witnesses and other "due proofs and evictions," from the number of which the parties own answers are excluded, as well by natural justice as, I conceive, under the statute of Car. 2, by positive law. In criminal suits the maxim is, "Actore non probante, reus absolvitur." And it is obvious how much of the burthen of proof may be shifted from the "actor"—the promovent—by the defendant's answers, even to such heads or positions objected to him as are not in themselves, and directly, criminatory. Admissions from the defendant of those parts of the articles which are not of this kind may be the means (perhaps the only means) of helping the promovent to the proof of those parts of them which are. Add to this that the popular, at least, though not the just and legal, inference deducible from the defendant's answering articles in part, and declining to answer the criminal charges, is an admission of his guilt. And it is contrary to [113] natural justice that a defendant, even if guilty, should be put to the alternative of perjury, or any thing in the nature of confession; the more especially as the same defendant, swearing himself innocent (as the fact might be) of the offence imputed to him, could hope to obtain but little credence, and expect to derive but little benefit.

As to the single other point insisted upon in the argument, the hardship of sustaining appeals from inferior Courts for pursuing the ancient, in preference to the modern and, it is to be presumed, the correcter practice; the general answer to arguments from topics of this nature is simple and obvious. Where those Courts have deviated into mere formal irregularities, the visiting of these with any thing of strictness by this Court may justly be deprecated as harsh. But where their course of procedure violates either the rules of positive law or the dictates of natural justice, or both these together, this Court is bound to administer a correction to them which it can only apply, by sustaining appeals from those orders, or decrees, to which that course of procedure may have led.

Upon these considerations I reverse the order for the defendant's personal answers, and retain the cause. The observations which I have made, hypothetically, upon the articles, are in the recollection of the respondent's counsel, and will, I have no doubt, be attended with due effect.

[114] DURANT v. DURANT. Arches Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1822.—Whatever is to be done personally by the party principal in the cause requires, in strictness, a personal service of the notice, or decree, for doing it, upon the party principal. Hence, the service of a decree for answers upon the proctor will not justify the Court in putting the principal in contempt, if those answers are not brought in.

[See further, 2 Add. 267.]

(An appeal from the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Lichfield and Coventry.)

This, in the first instance, was a cause of divorce, or separation à mensâ et thoro, by reason of adultery, promoted and brought by Mary Ann Durant, wife of George Durant, Esq., of the parish of Tong Castle, county of Salop, in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and province of Canterbury, against the said George Durant, Esq., in the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Lichfield and Coventry. The present appeal was entered, on the part of the original defendant, from a sentence or order of that Consistory Court, pronouncing him in contempt, and decreeing him to be signified, pursuant to the statute (stat. 53 Geo. 3, c. 127).

The proceedings had in the Court below are stated in the judgment.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The course which the present appeal has taken relieves me from the obligation of determining on the merits of it; for it appears, if I may so say, to have determined itself. But it involves a question of some nicety in practice; upon which it may be convenient that I should embrace the opportunity, thus afforded me, of delivering my opinion.

[115] This in an appeal from the Consistory Court of Coventry and Lichfield, where the suit originally depended, being a suit of separation à mensâ et thoro, promoted by the wife against the husband for adultery. The citation was returned, personally served on the 18th of January, 1820; but no appearance was given for the party cited till the 8th of May, 1821; and then only, it should seem, in consequence of a notice served upon the party on the 17th of April preceding, that he would be put in contempt and signified, failing to appear upon that day. A libel and allegation of faculties were brought in on the 22d of May, and were admitted on the 3d of July, when a general negative issue to the libel was given for the defendant, and a decree for answers, both to the libel and allegation of faculties was prayed for the plaintiff. The decree was subsequently extracted, and was returned on the 9th of October, personally served upon the defendant's proctor, who appeared to the decree, and was assigned to bring in his client's answers by the next Court. This assignation was continued from Court day to Court day, till the 15th of January, 1822, when the Judge (having already previously directed a notice to be served on the party, and which was actually so served on the 8th of November, that he would be put in contempt if his answers were not filed as on the 20th of November preceding, his proctor then appearing, and still appearing from Court day to Court day, and praying further time) pronounced the defendant in contempt, from which supposed grievance this appeal has been duly prosecuted to its present stage.

[116] Now, on the face of these proceedings, there are strong grounds to suspect that the defendant has been, vexatiously, endeavouring to obstruct the course of justice to the plaintiff. No appearance even was given till more than a year and a quarter after the return of the citation; and though something has been said of compromise, and of proposed arrangement, which partly relieves from the impression produced by that fact, still, it is to be remembered that this appearance, at last, is only obtained by threats from the Court of resorting to its compulsory process. A general negative issue is then given to the libel (quite out of the usual course), not even confessing the marriage; so that the Court, with no constat before it of a fact of marriage, could allot the wife nothing on the account, or in the nature, of alimony. Lastly, an interval of nearly six months occurs between the decree for answers and the step appealed from—the answers to the libel, though said to be ready, being then unfiled, and the answers to the allegation of faculties not even being asserted to be in a state of forwardness.(a)[1]

It is not to be denied that the proceedings here stated compose a case of great, I may even say of extreme, hardship upon the wife. Still, however, the Court would have been put to some difficulty to pronounce against the present appeal, in the absence of "a personal service, upon the party, of the decree for answers;" in which absence I should [117] hardly have been led to decide that the present appellant was duly and lawfully put in contempt. And this is a question which the Court might have had to determine judicially, with reference to the merits of the present appeal, had it been made a point of, and insisted upon, by the counsel for the appellant, and had not the appeal been pronounced for, less upon the merits than under a sort of arrangement between the parties.(a)[2] As with any [118] immediate reference therefore to the

(a)[1] The appellant's proctor merely prayed "further time," upon a statement that his client's "answers to the libel, settled by counsel, had been just left with him," but that his answers to the allegation of faculties "had not yet come to his hands."

(a)[2] The following is the minute of the judgment entered by consent. "Bedford (proctor for the appellant) prayed the Judge to pronounce for the appeal, and complaint made and interposed in this behalf, and for his jurisdiction, and that the Judge, from whom this cause is appealed, hath proceeded wrongfully, nully, and unjustly—to reverse the order or decree appealed from—to retain the principal cause—and therein to allow time for him the said Bedford to give in his client's answers. Box (proctor for the respondent) prayed the Judge to pronounce against the appeal, and complaint made, and interposed in this behalf, and that the Judge, from whom the same is appealed, hath proceeded rightly, justly, and lawfully—to affirm the order or decree appealed from, and to retain the principal cause—and therein to decree the said Bedford's party in contempt, and his contempt to be signified according to the act of parliament, in that case made and provided, for not having obeyed the order or decree of the Judge from whom this cause is appealed, and to condemn the appellant in costs. The Judge having heard the proofs read, and advocates and proctors on both sides thereon, by interlocutory decree, having the force and effect of a definitive sentence in writing, pronounced for the appeal and complaint made and interposed in the said cause, and for his jurisdiction, and that the Judge, from whom this cause is appealed, hath proceeded wrongfully, nully, and unjustly, reversed the order or decree appealed from—retained the principal cause—and therein assigned Bedford to give in his client's answers the next Court day."

A new decree for answers was also further directed to issue at petition of Box.

present appeal, the question, in a manner, merges, still however it may be convenient, I repeat, as a guide to practitioners, in these and similar cases, that I should state and examine, somewhat indeed extra judicially, and without the point having been argued, what the correct practice in this matter of personal answers is.

And here, in the first place, it may save time to inquire what was the old practice in the matter inquired of; for if that be consonant to reason and analogy, and has undergone no authoritative alteration, it is, or ought to be, the practice of the Court at the present day.

From the old practice then as laid down by Oughton, Clerk, and Consett, it is to be collected that personal answers were twofold—being to be had, in certain causes, on special application, from the proctor in the cause, as well as from the principal. This is distinctly laid down by Oughton; for instance, in the 16th sec. of his 61st title,(a)[1] "De litis contestatione," and in the subsequent section [119] [s. 17 of the same title (a)[2]], the suits, in special, where the proctor's answers may be had, are pointed out, and the uses to which they are capable of being made subservient in these suits are ascertained. Now this being so, I apprehend that notices or decrees for personal answers were always served accordingly; that is, notices for such answers from the proctor, upon the proctor; and decrees for such answers from the party, upon the party.

It is true indeed that Oughton, in his 62d title, refers to a note on title xxi. [obs. 9] by which it seems that a decree for the answers of the party principal in the cause may be served on his proctor. But this can only be, he observes,(b) under the special authority of the Court, in virtue of a special clause inserted in the decree itself; and consequently it forms no exception to the rule that in [120] ordinary cases the decree for the personal answers of the party principal must be personally served upon the party principal. Oughton's whole 62d title represents, under ordinary circumstances, the decree for the personal answers of the party principal, as a formal process, under seal of the Court, against the party principal, and required to be served personally upon the party, as contradistinguished from any mere assignation or notice to be served upon the proctor. And this, I conceive, to have been, invariably, the old practice, except as excepted in the 9th obs. on Oughton's 21st title—an exception not at all applicable to the case of present appeal, or in ordinary instances.

So stood the old practice, a practice, I must also remark, both perfectly reasonable in itself, and perfectly consonant with the practice of the Court in analogous cases. For the reasonableness of the practice, it is too obvious to be insisted upon; and for its consonance with analogy we all know that whatever is to be done personally by the party

(a)[1] Nota etiam, quod procurator actoris, postquam lis sit contestata, si crediderit se in aliquo [videlicet in aliquâ positione materiali libelli, præsertim positione aliquâ libelli matrimonialis] posse relevari ex responsis procuratoris partis adversæ, potest primò [scilicet ante decretum pro parte principali] jurare, pro parte suâ, quod credat se fideliter posuisse* contenta in libello, et petere juramentum a procuratore partis adversæ præstari, de fideliter respondendo positionibus ejusdem libelli in proximo die juridico: quod est concedendum. absolutely requires in strictness a personal service of the notice or decree for doing it upon the party. Where steps are to be taken by the proctor merely, a mere assignation upon the proctor suffices—he, quoad hæc, being "dominus litis." But where the personal intervention of the principal is requisite to the act to be done, as it is, for instance, where costs are taxed against him, or where sums are decreed to be paid by him on account of alimony, the practice is to take out a monition against the party, not merely to serve a notice on the proctor, which monition must be personally served upon the party; in all cases, that is, where it is requisite that the [121] proceedings should be conducted with any semblance of regularity.

It must be conceded, however, in this matter of personal answers, that the modern practice has been to serve the decree on the proctor only and not on the principal. This may have arisen partly, perhaps, from the two species of personal answers already alluded to (the latter, for obvious reasons, now obsolete) being confounded in modern practice; and partly because persons seldom hang back in this matter of answers, which are to be obtained, in most cases, without any sort of difficulty. Being the practice, however, I should be disposed to admit that a service of the decree for answers, though merely upon the proctor, might be a sufficient service of the decree for very many purposes. For instance, if, after such service, the party's answer to an allegation of faculties were not brought in within a fit and reasonable time, it might justify the Court in allotting sums on account of alimony (the marriage, that is, being proved or confessed) in proportion to the full extent of the faculties alleged; and so on. But it is a very different question whether such a service would justify the Court in putting the party in contempt, and proceeding to signify him, in order to his imprisonment, under the statute; a measure which I conceive Ecclesiastical Courts to be only warranted in adopting where the prior proceedings have been conducted with the strictest regularity.

Nor would it vary the case, in this view of it, to my apprehension, that notice of the decree should have been served on the principal, or that the proctor should have appeared to the decree, and prayed [122] further time, and so forth; both which circumstances occurred in this very suit. As for the notice, that was a mere notice from the adverse proctor; the only notice which the party was bound (under this penalty at least) to obey, being the decree of the Court, under seal of the Court, duly, i.e. personally, served upon him, the party. As for the proctor's appearing to, and acting upon the decree, I can by no means think the act of the proctor so binding on the principal—unless, indeed, in virtue of some special clause to the effect of enabling him to accept services of decrees, &c. upon the principal, inserted in the proxy—for I cannot concede that a party may be put in contempt and signified so as to become liable to all the penalties of contumacy, merely from his proctor doing that for doing which he has no strict legal authority.

Such, then, being the old practice, and being so, as it is, consonant both to reason and analogy, it remains only to inquire whether it has undergone any authoritative alteration in later times. Nor do I conceive that the inquiry can be attended with any sort of difficulty. Is there any adjudged case producible where this Court has proceeded to enforce decrees of this nature by its compulsory process, in the absence of a personal service? I am confident there are none. Can it even be shewn that such decrees have been so enforced, unless after a personal service, the whole matter passing sub silentio? I am nearly as confident that this has not occurred; for the Court is always (or means to be) satisfied that there has been a personal service before issuing its compulsory process in this description of cases. The result, therefore, of the whole inquiry, which is [123] almost too obvious to be stated in terms, is that the old practice in this matter of personal answers, being both perfectly reasonable and perfectly analogous to the correct practice in similar cases, should and must, in all cases, stricti juris, be the practice of Ecclesiastical Courts at this very day.

For the present appeal I have only to pronounce for it, upon the understanding and under the terms arranged between the parties; and I direct that the Judge of the Court below shall be apprized at once of this decree and of the grounds upon which it has proceeded.

[124] CLIFFORD v. MABEY. In the Peculiars Court of Canterbury, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—Quære, whether a party can be entitled to sue or defend as a pauper in a defamation cause? A party's swearing himself not worth 5l. gives him no indefeasible right to be admitted a pauper; that fact, if denied, must be specifically proved. Nor will even proof of that fact be sufficient, if the party can be fixed with the receipt of a competent income.

The present question arose upon the right of a party to be admitted a pauper in a suit for defamation.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a cause of defamation promoted by Martha Mizzlebrook Clifford against Henry Mabey. The citation was returned on the 1st Session of Michaelmas Term, 1821, when the party cited appeared personally and prayed a libel, which was brought in and admitted. A negative issue being given to the libel, witnesses were examined and publication was prayed—when the defendant, still appearing personally, asserted an allegation.

On the 1st Session of Hilary Term, 1822, the defendant, still only giving a personal appearance, prayed to be admitted a pauper. This was objected to on the part of the plaintiff, who has stated his grounds of objection in an act of Court, to which the defendant has also written in support of his prayer. Affidavits are brought in on both sides; and the question for the Court to determine is whether the petitioner is, or is not, entitled to be admitted to defend this suit in formâ pauperis. It is denied that he is so entitled, on the part of the original plaintiff, as well, 1st, from the nature of the suit, as, 2dly, from the state of the petitioner's circumstances. In determining this question, I [125] shall endeavour to keep these two heads of objection distinct and separate; only premising that, as the privilege claimed, that of appearing in formâ pauperis, is a great privilege in law, on several accounts, the claim must be clearly made out before the privilege itself can be conceded.

1. First, then I entertain considerable doubts whether a party can be admitted, either to sue or defend, as a pauper, especially the latter, in a cause of defamation. A defamation cause is in the nature, at least, of a criminal suit—it is styled by Oughton causa mixta [hoc est—partim criminalis, partim civilis]—and again, with greater precision, causa criminalis, civiliter intentata—and I strongly question whether in reason and upon principle it is competent to a party, under any circumstances, to appear as a pauper in a suit of this description.(a)[1] Of any precedent for the present application I am wholly unaware—nor would the Court be induced, by acceding to the prayer of this petitioner, to furnish a precedent which might be nearly tantamount to licensing persons of a low condition to defame their neighbours with impunity, unless it felt itself deprived of any discretion on this head, by some [126] paramount authority. On the contrary, however, the single authority in point with which I am acquainted, or to which I have been referred, is express that parties are not admissible to sue or defend as paupers in defamation suits.(a)[2] It occurs in Oughton's 8th tit. "De admissione in formâ pauperis," or rather in a note on that title; but it is to be observed that Oughton's notes, generally speaking, are of at least equal authority with his text—the notes being explanatory of the practice in Oughton's time; the text of the older and commonly less correct practice in the time of Clerk.

2. But, secondly, I am of opinion that the facts disclosed in this act of Court, and upon the affidavits, would not justify the Court in conceding to the petitioner this great legal privilege—if the law were otherwise, or if the petitioner were defendant in a mere civil suit. From the petitioner's own affidavit it results that at the time when the defamatory words are charged to have been uttered, and at the commencement, and long subsequent to the commencement, of this suit, he was a master shoemaker, employing two journeymen, and occupying a house at Walworth, at the annual rent of 18l., including the taxes, indeed. It appears, too, that he only finally withdrew from this house on the 21st of January in the present year—the very day upon which he prayed to be admitted a pauper—a circumstance which justifies a suspicion

(a)[1] The statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 12, clearly relates only to civil suits. It should seem, however, a defendant in some kinds of misdemeanor may be admitted to defend in formâ pauperis—but the reason there is said to be that the prosecutor, who can have no costs, is not prejudiced—a reason observed by the Court not to apply in this case. Vide Rex v. Wright, 2 Stra. 1041. The provision in 2 Geo. 2, c. 28, only applies to defendants in actions brought relating to the customs.

It was held in Rex v. Pierson, 2 Burr. 1039, that a defendant could not be admitted pauper upon an attachment for a contempt. But the decision there proceeded upon a quite distinct principle.

(a)[2] In causa diffamationis non est omninò admittenda pars in formâ pauperis. Oughton, tit. 8, n. (b).

that he only withdrew from it for the express purpose of that prayer. The petitioner has deposed, indeed, to the diminished state of his business and income, [127] for the last twelvemonth, which he ascribes to circumstances into which it is not necessary for me to enter—yet I observe that even during this period, he admits the average amount of his weekly income at 20s. Add to this, that he has still a shop in which he carries on his business, and "furniture, goods, and effects"—which, though he swears them not to be worth 5l., he has not specified, as he ought to have done; so that neither the adverse party, nor the Court, has any means of forming an estimate of their probable value. So, again, the petitioner has sworn himself unable to pay up the arrears of rent due for his late dwelling-house, as also to discharge his debts—but neither the amount of these arrears, nor that of his debts, nor how these last were incurred, is stated in any manner. As for the petitioner swearing himself not to be worth 5l., after payment of all just demands upon him—this gives him no indefeasible right to be admitted a pauper, where that step is objected to—the fact of his not being worth 5l., if denied by the other litigant, must be specifically proved. Nor will even proof of that fact be sufficient, if the petitioner, notwithstanding such actual insolvency upon the balance, can be fixed with the enjoyment of a competent income. Were this otherwise, many persons of large expenditure, and living in splendour and luxury, might entitle themselves to the gratuitous labors of others, as well as place their legal adversaries under very undue disadvantages, without any risk of a prosecution for perjury. This was explicitly stated by the Court in the case of Lovekin v. Edwards (1 Phillimore, 179), a case [128] in which this question was much canvassed, and fully entered into—from the general principles laid down in which case I see no reason whatever to swerve or depart.

Upon these considerations I am satisfied that I cannot, in justice to the other party, admit this defendant (if a defendant in any such suit) a pauper; and I pronounce accordingly.

[129] ROOSE v. MOULSDALE. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1822.—A testamentary paper, which is neither a finished will in itself, nor proved to have been such in the deceased's apprehension of it, is of no effect; where the deceased had full time and opportunity, if he had thought proper, to have rendered it a finished will.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Stephen Roose, late of Bryntirion Amlwch, in the Island of Anglesea, died on the 6th of October, 1821, a widower, leaving behind him three sons and four daughters.

Within a few days after the deceased's death the following testamentary paper, all of his own hand-writing, was found between the leaves of a ledger-book, locked up in the deceased's bureau.

"Bryntirion,
"May 24th, 1821."

The present question arose upon the admissibility of an allegation, propounding the above testamentary paper, as the last will of the deceased, on behalf of Stephen Roose, the sole executor purported to be named in the same. Of the seven children of the deceased, five were before the Court, consenting that probate should pass as prayed. This was opposed, however, by a married daughter, Mrs. Moulsdale, party in the cause; and the proceedings were had in pain of another married daughter, who gave no appearance. The deceased, at the time of his death, was seised of real estates, of the value of about 60l. per annum, and of personalty to the amount in value of about 10,000l.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The several considerations which appear to me to apply to the paper propounded in this allegation, and consequently to the allegation propounding it, are briefly the following:—

1st. Is the paper in itself, and upon the face of it, to be deemed a finished and complete will? or, if not to be so deemed,

2dly. Would it, nevertheless, be established by the circumstances propounded in the allegation that [131] it was a finished and complete will, in the deceased's view and apprehension of it—in other words, would it result from the facts pleaded, that the deceased regarded it as a will, and meant it to operate as such in its present shape, and without doing any further act in order to give it testamentary effect?

In the latter of these events this instrument may be, as in the former it clearly is, entitled to probate. But if both these questions are to be answered negatively, there is an end of the case. If the paper were "a finished will" in neither of the above respects it is wholly invalid—it not being pretended that the deceased had not full time and opportunity, to have rendered it a "finished will." He survived the writing of this paper upwards of four months—and is pleaded to have been "gradually declining in health for the last two years of his life, so as to have required the visits of a medical attendant during the greater part of that period"—and yet, not to have been "confined to his bed until within about three days of his death." Under these circumstances—in this total absence of any "act of God," technically so termed, to prevent or obstruct its completion—this instrument can, I repeat, only be entitled to probate, either as being in itself, or as proved to have been, in the deceased's apprehension of it, a finished and complete instrument—in point of effect, that is—in its present shape.

1. Now, as to the first of these questions—the paper, upon the face of it, and taken by itself, is not in my judgment, to be considered as finished and complete. It begins, "What I purpose to be my will"—that is, as I understand it, "what I [132] intend to make my will in futuro;" or "the manner in which I mean to dispose of my property, when I make my will"—not "what I constitute to be my will in presenti, and by this very instrument." It signifies the same thing, to my apprehension, with "outlines of, or memoranda for, a will." With this interpretation of the heading of the paper the wording of it throughout corresponds. It is not dispositive—it is not in the ordinary terms, "I give or bequeath"—it suggests to my mind, in every part, the notion of heads of a will to be drawn up at some future period, not the notion of a will itself. The interlineations and erasures, apparent in the body of the paper, and the want of subscription at the end, all confirm this notion of it.

2d. But, secondly, are the circumstances pleaded sufficient to shew that this was a complete and operative instrument, in the deceased's view of it? for in this case I have already said that it will be equally entitled to probate, as in the former one. In answer to this question, it becomes necessary to state and examine the several circumstances from which this inference is sought to be drawn.

The second article of this allegation enters into a long and particular history of various advances made by the deceased to his several children; and the next following article pleads the exhibit annexed to the allegation, being a paper book in the deceased's hand-writing, in which those several advances are set out to the account separately of each child. It should seem that the deceased contemplated making a provision for each of his children, to the amount of from a thousand to twelve or thirteen hundred pounds—and the advances ac-[133]-tually made to four of the seven during his life, together with the sums purported to be bequeathed them in this testamentary paper, make up something near that amount. For instance, the advances to the deceased's son, George Bradley Roose, are stated in the account-book at 750l. and 500l. is supposed to be bequeathed in the will—making up, together, 1250l. The advance to the deceased's daughter Hester Owen, namely, upon her marriage, is stated at 200l., and the will purports to bequeath her 800l. in the whole 1000l. The advance to Mrs. Moulsdale on her marriage is stated at 1000l. accompanied with the following notice :—"N.B.—This is all I purpose (a) giving to Ellen"—and accordingly this daughter is not benefited by, or even mentioned in, the supposed will, though it bequeaths a legacy of 100l. to her daughter, the granddaughter of the deceased. The deceased's son John Roose again is in no sort benefited by the will—but the advances set out to his account in the paper book amount together to 1230l. The deceased's daughter Margaret (who, together with Stephen Roose, the party in the cause, are pleaded to be the only children of the deceased not settled in the world) is bequeathed 1100l., she having received no advance in her father's life-time. The several sums, indeed, carried to the account of Stephen Roose, amount to nearly 700l., and the operation of the present paper is to give him almost as many thousands, to say nothing of the real es-[134]-tate—all the several supposed bequests, amounting to only 3050l., and the deceased's personalty being pleaded to have amounted in value to nearly 10,000l. But the deceased's superior love and affection for this son is expressly pleaded, and must be taken as proved—and there are plain indications of his floating intentions not to benefit his other children beyond the amount of, from 1000l. to 12 or 1300l. as already stated.

Now the obvious inference from the facts alleged in these articles of the plea, and from the annexed exhibit, upon which so much stress has been laid by the counsel for its admission, unquestionably is, that the dispositions contained in the paper propounded, under the circumstances, are not improbable—that they are conformable with the deceased's expressed intentions, and being so are not unlikely ones for the deceased to have actually made. But to what does all this amount, as bearing upon the real question before the Court? that question, it is to be remembered all along, being not the probability of what the deceased would do, but the fact of what he has actually done. In my judgment it amounts to but very little. It is good in proof of the deceased's intention to make a will, so disposing of his property—of the fact of his having finally made such a will it is no proof. It is good in bar to any argument of improbability that might be urged against the paper, from the apparently unequal distribution of the deceased's property between his several children—but upon the real point in issue, namely, whether the deceased intended this paper to operate in its present form, and meant to do nothing more to give it effect—it bears very remotely.

[135] 2. The next circumstance relied on by the counsel for the paper is pleaded in the seventh article of the allegation, in the following terms :—

"That the deceased had been gradually declining in health for the last two years of his life, and was attended by Mr. Robert Williams, a surgeon in the neighbourhood, during the greater part of that period, but he was not confined to his bed until about three days before his death : that on the day after the said deceased had been confined to his bed by his said illness, and when he was in perfect possession of his mental faculties, the said Robert Williams, at the request of some of the family of the said deceased, asked him, the said deceased, 'if he had made his will,' and the said deceased said 'that he had done it,' or words to that or the like effect. And the party proponent doth allege and propound that the said deceased then alluded and referred to the paper propounded in this cause as his last will and testament."

Now admitting, for argument's sake, what I conceive to be incapable of proof, that the deceased, on the occasion pleaded, referred to this identical paper ; still, I am of opinion that the reference itself will by no means produce the effect ascribed to it—that of converting this (apparently) unfinished, into a finished paper this imperfect into a perfect instrument—and that, on general principles, it would be extremely unsafe to ascribe this effect to it. Parties enfeebled by long illness, and on the verge of dissolution, often answer at random, and merely to avoid disturbance and importunity. By what I collect from the plea, the whole of what fell from the deceased on the occasion (in answer, too, to a [136] query put by his medical attendant) was a mere general declaration in the affirmative. I presume, of course, that all which passed on the occasion, in substance at least, has been embodied in the plea.

(a) The Court observed that there was no constat as to the time at which this purpose was expressed—it might have been many years before ; in short, at any time subsequent to Mrs. Moulsdale's marriage in February, 1811.

The sole remaining circumstance insisted upon is, the place of finding, to which, however, I can attach no greater importance than to those preceding it. It is pleaded to have been found "within a ledger-book, in which the deceased kept his accounts, and had written entries very shortly before his death," such ledger-book being, together with other books and papers, locked up in a bureau, of which the deceased always kept the key.

Now this place of finding, to my mind, furnishes rather a contrary inference to that which has been contended for. It is found between the leaves of a ledger-book, which the deceased must be presumed, and is pleaded, to have been in the constant habit of turning over for making entries, and similar purposes. Surely it can't be contended that this is the natural repository of a will, even though the ledger-book itself were locked in the deceased's bureau. It is just, indeed, the place where a man of business would dispose of a paper of the deliberative kind, such as I conceive this to have been. It is one of the last places which any man would have deposited a will for safe custody, which had received its final shape, and was an operative and effective instrument, in his view and apprehension of it, without any further act done, in its subsisting form.

That this instrument was such, is rendered, to my judgment, further improbable by the circumstance of the deceased having died seised of real [137] estate. I consider it to have been the deceased's intention that his son Stephen should have this, as well as the residue of his personalty; for I cannot accede to the supposition of one of the learned counsel, that the deceased, by the term "estates," might mean his personal estates only, leaving his real estate to go, by regular descent, to his heir at law. I entertain no doubt whatever, looking at the whole context of the paper, and all the circumstances, that it was the deceased's intention (his floating and deliberative intention) at the time of writing this paper, that Stephen Roose, subject to the conditions named, should take his realty as well as personalty. Now if this be so, it is nearly conclusive against the supposition that the deceased meant and intended that this should operate as a final will; for though the deceased, as it has been observed, and as indeed it is to be collected from this very paper, was not a man of letters or of much education, yet, as a man of business and the world, one probably raised, ex humili, to a respectable rank in life by his own efforts and exertions, I can hardly suppose him to have been ignorant that the law renders the attestation of three witnesses necessary to every devise of real estate.

Upon the whole, I feel warranted in concluding, both that the paper propounded is, in itself, an unfinished paper, and that proof of the facts pleaded would be insufficient to justify me in deciding that it was any other than an unfinished paper in the deceased's own apprehension of it. Taking the paper to be unfinished in both respects, I have already said that it could not be pronounced for; the deceased having survived the writing of it up-[138]-wards of four months, without any steps taken on his part to finish or complete it. I at once, therefore, adhere to the practice of the Court, and spare the parties useless expence and anxiety, by rejecting this allegation. As for the consent of five of the seven next of kin to probate of the paper passing as prayed, of which something has been said in the argument, I need scarcely observe that this is wholly immaterial to the case, in a legal point of view. Had the next of kin been much more numerous, any one of the number would still have had a perfect right to submit the validity of this paper to the consideration of the Court; and having been so submitted, it instantly became subject to those rules which Courts of Probate are bound to follow in determining cases of this description; and it was by the operation of those rules alone that its fate could be ultimately decided.

Allegation rejected.

EVANS v. KNIGHT AND MOORE. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1822.—The admission of an exceptive allegation may be suspended till the hearing of the principal cause; when the Court will permit evidence to be taken upon, or will finally reject it, according as it then appears that the credit due to the witness attacked is, or is not, essential to a right decision upon the merits of the principal cause.

[See further, p. 229, post.]

(On the admission of an exceptive allegation.)

This question arose upon the admissibility of an allegation exceptive to the testimony of Edward Manwaring, a witness examined upon an allegation propounding certain "instructions," as containing the last will and testament of John Moore, the party deceased in the cause.

[139] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. As the admission of this allegation must unavoidably, tend to increased delay and expence, I shall be ill disposed to admit it if I can see reason to believe that it may be dispensed with, in all probability, without detriment to either party. For the allegation, if admitted, provokes a counter allegation; and leads, consequently, to the introduction of several new issues, quite foreign to the real issue, and equally so to the real merits of the cause, which is before the Court.

The deceased in this cause died on the 24th of April, 1812, and probate of his will—that is, of certain instructions as containing his will—was granted to the executors on the 23d of the following month. That probate is called in, eight years after, in the month of April, 1820, and the executors are put on proof of the will in solemn form of law.

The plea propounding the will was admitted to proof in July, 1820. In the November following an allegation was admitted on behalf of the next of kin—as a further allegation has since been, on the same behalf, exceptive to the character of Edward Manwaring, a witness examined upon the executor's plea. The allegation now tendered to the Court is exceptive to the testimony of the same witness, who is charged to have deposed falsely in his answers to the 23d interrogatory. (a)

[140] The instructions of which probate was granted, as containing the deceased's last will, bear date on the 21st of April, 1812. The drift of the adverse allegation is, that the deceased, at this period, was of unsound mind. It pleads in the 6th article,

(a) That interrogatory was as follows:—

Let Edward Manwaring be asked, Did not you, some years ago, and when, live in the capacity of waiter at the Jamaica Coffee-house, kept by Mr. Grubb? Were you not discharged by the said Mr. Grubb, in consequence of his having detected you in the fact of stealing the wine from his cellar, or in consequence of his having accused you of so doing? Did you not afterwards obtain a situation as waiter at the Virginia Coffee-house, in Cornhill, kept by Mr. Strout? Were you not living in such situation at the period of the death of the deceased in this cause? For what reason were you discharged from such situation? Did you not, at or about the time when you were so discharged therefrom, offer for sale, or to pledge to ——— Underhill, who resided in , some table cloths? Did not the said Underhill retain them, and carry them to Mr. Strout? Did you not, after you had been discharged from the Virginia Coffee-house, make proposals in the way of marriage to ——— Royle, who is a pastry-cook, and who resides near the Town Hall in the borough of Southwark? Was not such intended marriage broken off in consequence of impropriety of conduct on your part towards the said Royle? Did not the said Royle, in consequence of such your conduct, cause you to be arrested and imprisoned in the Fleet Prison How long did you remain in such prison, and by what means were you liberated therefrom? By what means did you procure a livelihood after you had procured your release from such prison? Were you not soon, and how long afterwards, again imprisoned at the instance of the parish officers of some and what parish, for the expences occasioned by two natural children of yours, whom you were unable to maintain, or for some other reason, and what? When and by what means did you obtain your release from such imprisonment? Let the witness be reminded of the pains and penalties of perjury, and be further asked—Upon your oath have you not frequently, since your last liberation from prison, solicited and received alms? Have you not even received halfpence given to you in the way of charity?

that "the deceased having, in the beginning of the month of April, 1812, been taken ill of the sickness whereof he died, continued daily to get worse, and was, [141] during the latter part thereof, very frequently in a state of delirium—that, on the 19th of April, he was removed from the room which he had till that time occupied, and which was on the first floor of the house in which he resided, to a room on the second floor, in which room he continued to remain till his death—that from the period of such the removal of the deceased into the room on the second floor until his death, he was, from the violence of his disorder, in a state of almost constant delirium, which rendered it, very frequently, necessary for two persons to hold him—that, during the said period, the violence of his delirium occasionally abated for a short period, but his mind was so much weakened and affected that he remained, in such intervals, totally incapable of knowing or understanding what he said or did, or what was said or done in his presence, and was rendered incapable of recognizing those about him; and, during such intervals, he was constantly subject to delusion and mental derangement, and was of unsound mind, memory, and understanding." And the next, the 7th, article recites, that part of the executor's plea, which alleges the factum, &c. of the instructions on the 21st of April, 1812, which it contradicts, and pleads that "the deceased was not, at the time the instructions bear date, nor at the time the same may have been drawn up and reduced into writing, of sound or disposing mind, memory, and understanding; nor did he, at any time, give verbal, or other, instructions, or directions for the drawing up of the same—that if the pretended instructions were, in fact, ever read over to the deceased, he did not know or understand the contents thereof—and that he did not set and subscribe his name thereto in testimony of any good [142] liking or approbation of the same; nor did he, at the time the instructions were drawn up, or at the time the same bear date, know or understand what he said or did, or what was said or done in his presence, neither was he capable of giving instructions or directions for, or of making or executing, a will, or of doing any other serious or rational act, of that or the like nature, requiring thought, judgment, and reflection—that the deceased was, during the whole of the 21st of April, either labouring under violent attacks of delirium, or, in the intervals thereof, in a state of entire mental debility and derangement—so that he was not, during any part of the same, capable of entering into, or holding any rational conversation whatever." The main issue, therefore, between the parties in the cause obviously is the deceased's testamentary capacity on Tuesday, the 21st of April, the day on which the instructions were taken.

The article of the allegation, propounding the will, to which the witness Manwaring was designed, pleads, in effect, that on the day following that on which the instructions were taken, being Wednesday, the 22d of April, he, Manwaring, called upon the deceased, with whom he continued for about half an hour: that the deceased was then of sound mind; and that, in answer to a question put to him by Manwaring, he distinctly recognized the instructions given for his will on the twenty-first.

Now, whether the evidence taken upon this article of the plea, as to what passed on the 22d of April, is material, or the contrary, depends on the sufficiency, or insufficiency, of the evidence as to the deceased's capacity on the preceding day. I think it not improbable that it is quite immaterial. No [143] fewer than nine other witnesses have been examined upon the plea—one of whom is vouched as having been actually present when the instructions were taken; and several are vouched as having seen, and conversed with, the deceased in the course of that, and upon subsequent days. It may possibly be that their evidence renders the case, in favour of these instructions, too clear to require the subsidiary aid of recognitions in support of it: on the contrary, evidence of subsequent recognitions may be most material to the decision of the cause—should the evidence, that is, of the deceased's capacity, at the time when the instructions were taken, leave it questionable how far, resting upon such proof alone, they were entitled to probate. Under these circumstances I am disposed neither to reject, nor to admit, the allegation, but to suspend it till the hearing of the cause. If it should appear to be essential that the question of this witness Manwaring's credibility should be gone into, the Court will then rescind the conclusion of the cause, and suffer evidence to be taken on the allegation now offered. But if the Court can satisfy itself, either one way or the other, without going into further evidence as to the credit due to this witness, from the other proofs in the cause, it will be best for all parties that it should be finally dispensed with. I am the less disposed to the present admission of this allegation, as the general character of the witness has already been excepted to—and although I by no means lay down that the particular testimony of a witness may not be excepted to after an exception taken to his general character, yet I certainly recollect no instance of this double exception to one and the same witness. I may also [144] observe that the interrogatory, in answer to which the witness is charged to have deposed falsely, has been merely put in order to furnish a test of the credit due to him generally; and that it has no relevancy whatever to the question at issue between the parties in this cause.

RITCHIE v. REES AND REES. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—An inventory and account may be dispensed with, if not applied for till after so long a period that, in conjunction with circumstances, it affords a reasonable presumption of the estate's having been fully administered.

Richard Wall died some time in the year 1777. In the month of November in that year administration of the goods of the deceased (with the will annexed) was granted to Richard Rees, a creditor, upon the renunciation of Martha Wall, widow of the deceased, his sole executrix and universal legatee. Martha Wall survived her husband Richard Wall only a few weeks, and died intestate, leaving two children, a son John, and a daughter Martha. John Wall died in the year 1815, having first made his will, and appointed his wife, Mabell Wall, his universal legatee, but no executor. Mabell Wall died in the year 1819, without having taken probate of her husband's will, and appointed Archibald Ritchie her sole executor. Ritchie took probate of the will of Mabell Wall; and, subsequently, obtained letters of administration (with the will annexed) of the goods of John Wall; as also of the goods of Martha Wall, mother of John Wall, and universal legatee of the original testator. Martha Kell (formerly Wall), daughter of Richard and Martha Wall, and sister of John, was still living.

[145] In the month of January in the present year (1822) a decree issued, under seal of the Court, at the suit of Archibald Ritchie, calling upon Richard and Robert Rees, the sons and executors of Richard Rees, who died in the year 1807, to exhibit on oath an inventory and account of the effects of Richard Wall, deceased.

To this decree an appearance was given for the parties cited under protest. It was objected on their parts "that upwards of forty-four years had elapsed since the original grant of administration, with the will annexed, of the effects of Richard Wall, deceased, to their father, Richard Rees:" that "fifteen years had elapsed since the death of the said Richard Rees;" that "John Wall, as a representative of whom the said Archibald Ritchie called for an inventory and account, had lived till within the last seven years without proceeding in that behalf;" and that "Martha Kell was then living, and neither had taken, nor was about to take, any measures to compel such inventory and account to be exhibited." And it was submitted, for the parties cited, that "by reason of the premises, Archibald Ritchie, at whose promotion the citation was taken out, was not entitled to call upon them to the effect of the said decree." On the other side it was alleged that "Ritchie, the party proceeding, was also the legal personal representative of the universal legatee of the original testator;" and that the parties cited, "as the executors named in the will of Richard Rees, whilst living, the administrator (with the will annexed) of the goods of the said Richard Wall, deceased, were bound to exhibit an inventory of the personal estate and effects of the [146] deceased, and to render an account of the administration thereof, to the best of their knowledge and belief, when lawfully called upon so to do;" and that, "by reason of no inventory or account thereof having been thentofore rendered, they were lawfully called upon in this respect by the party proceeding."

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The persons from whom this inventory and account are prayed are the representatives of a creditor administrator (with the will annexed) of the original testator: the person who calls for it is the representative of his widow and universal legatee. He also, as executor of the widow, and universal legatee (there being no executor named in his will) of John Wall, one of the two natural and lawful children of the widow and universal legatee of the original testator, she having died intestate, is interested in a moiety of the surplus, if any, of the original testator's estate; the other moiety belonging to the other of these two natural and lawful children, namely, a daughter, Martha Kell (formerly Wall), who is still living.

The letters of administration in this case were granted to a creditor forty-five years ago; and the creditor to whom they were granted survived the grant thirty years, and has been dead fifteen, without, as it should seem, any demand of this nature having been made, either upon him, whilst living, or upon his representatives, since his decease. Now, although no statute or rule of positive law, with which I am acquainted, has fixed any time certain, within which an inventory and account must be sued; still reason and justice prescribe some limitation to [147] calls of this sort, almost necessarily. If, therefore, this lapse of nearly half a century is not pleadable in bar to the present demand, still it may operate as a bar; provided, that is, it can be taken, in conjunction with circumstances, to afford a reasonably strong presumption that the estate has been fully administered and disposed of; in which case I shall feel no hesitation in dismissing the parties from the effect of this citation.

What, then, are the opposite probabilities as to a plene administravit disclosed upon the face of the present petition? In the first place, the renunciation of the widow and universal legatee raises a presumption that the estate was insolvent; in which case it must be fully administered, quoad this party at least, for he can have no interest, but in the event of a surplus. And this presumption is fortified by the time that has elapsed without any account prayed; and by the circumstance of Mrs. Kell, who is entitled to one moiety of the surplus, if any, of the first testator's estate, still being no party even to this proceeding.

On the other hand, as against the first inference, it may fairly be urged that the widow might be cajoled into suffering the creditor to take administration, by promises of a larger surplus, after payment of the debts, in the event of the estate being left at his disposal—a circumstance not improbable from her sex and condition. She, it appears, survived the deceased only a few weeks; so that she, at least, had no opportunity of taking any further steps in the case. The parties entitled to the surplus, if any, after her death were at that time minors; the one under fourteen and the other under seven years [148] of age. As minors, and in indigent circumstances, it was little to be expected that they should compel the administrator to account for the deceased's effects: and when they attained respectively their majorities the whole was a bye-gone transaction, and one which probably in their opinion it was too late attempting to investigate. For the condition of these parties, and their limited means of obtaining advice upon a subject of this nature, are circumstances not to be lost sight of, in estimating the presumptions and probabilities in this case, on the one side and on the other. It is sworn, too, by Ritchie that "Mabell Wall did several times call upon Richard and Robert Rees, the parties cited, relative to the affairs of the said Richard Wall, and that Robert Rees appointed a time for this appearer (Ritchie) to call upon him, with her; and upon the appearer afterwards calling upon him, he said he had re-considered the matter, and should not give him any information relative thereto." All this very considerably repels the presumption of a full administration, arising from the non-claim of the several parties successively entitled to any surplus.

But, as with respect to the acquiescence of Kell, a circumstance is alleged, which not only furnishes a directly contrary inference, but is absolutely conclusive to the merits of the petition. For it is sworn by Ritchie that "he hath been informed, and verily believes, the said Martha Kell or her husband in her right is now in possession of two houses, situate in Leather Lane, Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, which were a part of the estate of the said Richard Wall, deceased, or were purchased with monies arising therefrom."

[149] Now if this be so, it is conclusive, I repeat, on the merits of the case. For it not only accounts for Kell's non-appearance, but is proof of a surplus in the hands of the administrator or his representatives. For if there were no surplus, she could be entitled to nothing: if there were a surplus, she was entitled to only a moiety; and the other moiety should have been paid to her brother, or his representatives; which as it is not pretended to have been by the representatives of the administrator, I must presume it to be assets of the original testator in their hands. At the same time this statement of Kell's possession of "houses in Leather Lane, which were part of or purchased with monies arising from the deceased's estate," appearing, for the first time in Ritchie's affidavit, without any allusion to it in the act of Court, I shall certainly afford the parties cited an opportunity of explaining or denying that statement in a further affidavit; and I direct this matter to stand over, in order to afford them that opportunity. And as some doubts have been suggested—1. Whether the party proceeding is entitled to call for an inventory and account, not having first taken a de bonis grant of the effects of the original testator; 2. Whether the parties proceeded against are liable so to be called upon; as the mere executors of a deceased administrator, and, therefore, not the personal representatives of the original testator; I shall reserve my opinion upon these points till the whole question comes to be re-considered.

In the mean time the parties cited will do well to consider the propriety, on their parts, of complying with this citation, in the best mode in which they are able, even if they are not bound to comply with [150] it in strictness of law. The Court, in that case, would make every allowance, as to the sort of inventory exhibited—a matter, I apprehend, quite in its discretion. That these parties are not without the means of rendering an account of some kind, I infer from their own affidavit, which states, that "their father, Richard Rees, duly administered the personal estate of the deceased, and fully completed the administration thereof, within two years and a half after the death of the said deceased." The production of the documents (for such there must be) upon which their affidavit is founded would probably be satisfactory, to the Court at least, if not to the party at whose promotion this citation is taken out, and, consequently, might set this question at rest.

The affidavit of the parties cited is not quite satisfactory to my mind in several respects. It is extremely vague, relying much on time and general presumptions, with little or nothing in the shape of specific averment. It does not even aver, specifically, that the estate was insolvent; but merely that "it was fully administered," within a certain time. But if the estate were solvent, which as I have just said is not, specifically, denied, it is clear that it is not "fully administered" at the present day. For there is no suggestion even of the distribution of any surplus to the representatives of the widow and universal legatee, which was essential to the complete administration of the estate, in any other event than that of its insolvency.

[151] On a subsequent day two further affidavits were tendered from the parties cited—one, of the parties themselves—the other, of Martha Kell. The first of these stated, among other things, that "from certain books and papers of Richard Rees, their father, in their possession, they the appearers (Richard and Robert Rees) were enabled to swear that the said Richard Rees fully completed the administration of the effects of Richard Wall, deceased, within two years and a half of his death; and also, that the said Richard Rees satisfied debts due from the estate of the said deceased to a greater amount than the value of his, the said deceased's, estate. And they further made oath that the said Richard Wall, deceased, was not, at his death, so far as they know or believe, possessed of, or entitled to, any house or houses in Leather Lane, Holborn, in the county of Middlesex; and they disbelieve that any such were ever afterwards purchased with monies arising from his estate." The appearers further made oath, in substance, that "they had always manifested a willingness to give every information in their power relative to the affairs of the deceased, to the parties interested; that "they had never made, and subsequently broken, any appointment with Mabell Wall, or Archibald Ritchie, as for the purpose of giving such information;" and that "since the death of Mabell Wall, the said Archibald Ritchie had made no application to them for information relative to the said deceased's estate, otherwise than by the citation issued in this cause."

The affidavit of Martha Kell stated that "she was intimately acquainted with Richard Rees' administrator, with the will annexed, of the goods of [152] her late father, Richard Wall, the party deceased in this cause, and was then, and always had been, perfectly convinced that, as such administrator, he fully and duly administered the said estate and effects, which she verily believes were inadequate to the discharge of the said deceased's debts; and she further made oath that neither she, the appearer, nor her husband, then or ever were in possession of any house whatever, which formed a part of the estate of the said Richard Wall, deceased, or was purchased with monies arising therefrom; and that the only houses which she, the appearer, or her husband, possess in Leather Lane, Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, are two houses which were devised to the appearer, under the will of her uncle, Edward Pryce, late of Red Lion Street, aforesaid, which houses were purchased by the said Edward Pryce, at a public auction, in the year 1780."

Judgment—The further affidavits now exhibited, coupled with the other circumstances of the case, satisfy my mind that this estate has been fully administered.

Consequently, I am disposed to dismiss the parties cited, but without costs; as no inventory or account in any sort, of the administration of the deceased's effects, had been exhibited or rendered at the time of the issuing of this citation. The administrator was bound to exhibit an inventory, even though uncalled for: at least, he should have preserved an account of his administration, with sufficient vouchers; or have obtained releases from the parties entitled to any surplus of the effects, on their attaining, respectively, their majorities. The probability is, that by taking either of these precautions, he would [153] have saved his representatives the trouble and expence of this proceeding.

On the reserved points of the case, I am of opinion, 1, that the party proceeding, having an interest in the effects, was entitled to call for an inventory and account without first taking a de bonis grant of the effects of the original testator. The very object of the proceeding was to discover whether there were any effects to which a de bonis grant could apply. I am also of opinion, 2dly, that the parties cited, as the representatives of the deceased administrator, although not, at the same time, those of the first testator, were liable to be called upon for such inventory and account; upon a reasonable presumption being raised that any part of the effects of the first testator had travelled into their hands.

[154] BEATY v. BEATY. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1822.—The presumption of law is against a testamentary paper, with an attestation clause, not subscribed by witnesses. It is a slight presumption; but must be rebutted by some extrinsic circumstances, in order to the paper being pronounced for.

Francis Beaty died on the 21st of March, 1822, leaving the following testamentary paper:—

"I, Francis Beaty, purser of the Royal Navy, being of sound mind, and in perfect health, do make this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills by me made.

"I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Catherine Beaty, all my furniture, plate, books, linen, and all other property whatever in my house, No. 19, Dorset Street, together with the lease and fixtures thereof. I give also unto my dearly beloved daughter Catherine Beaty, one thousand pounds in the 3 per cent. consols; my wife Catherine Beaty to have the interest of it for her life, unless she wishes to give it up to her sooner; and I give to my wife Catherine as aforesaid, all other monies I may have in the stocks, and all and every sum or sums of money that may be in the hands of Mr. William M'Inerheny, my agent, or that may be due or owing to me by government, and every other property I may be possessed of at my decease, I give unto my wife as aforesaid; and I do hereby appoint my wife, Catherine Beaty, sole executrix of this my last will and testament. In witness whereof [155] I have hereunto set my hand and seal this sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord 1820, and in the first year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Fourth, over Great Britain, &c.

"FRA^{s}. BEATY.

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of"

"It is my particular wish and request, that I may be buried as privately as possible, at seven o'clock in the morning, and without any more expence than is absolutely necessary. "FRA^{s}. BEATY,

"June 6th, 1820."

"(a) Having given my dear boys a liberal education, and done what I could for them during my life, I now leave them with my blessing, to the care of their mother, and have not a doubt but she will (with the kind assistance of her friends) get them provided for and taken care of. May God bless you all. "FRA^{s}. BEATY,

"6th June, 1820."

The above testamentary paper was propounded in an allegation tendered on the part of his widow and relict, upon the admissibility of which the present question arose.

The allegation pleaded in substance,

1. That the deceased died on the 21st of March, 1822, at the age of sixty-eight years, leaving be-[156]-hind him a widow and four children—three sons and one daughter.

(a) This second memorandum was written upon a separate paper, but was found folded up with the other, in the deceased's writing-desk, after his decease.

2. The second article pleaded the factum of the will, on the 6th day of June, 1820.

3. The third pleaded that, subsequent to the making of the said will, to wit, in the months of January, February, March, and July, 1821, the deceased sold out the whole of the 1000l. 3 per cent. stock of which he stood possessed when he made the said will, and which he had given, by the said will, to his daughter, Catherine Beaty, after his wife's decease; and that the sole property of which he died possessed, consisted of the lease of a house in Dorset Street, his household furniture, and sundry articles of plate, not amounting in value, altogether, to more than 500l. or 600l.

4. The fourth article pleaded that "the said Francis Beaty, the deceased, sometime in or about the year 1819, having made a new will, requested Matilda James, a young lady who was on a visit at his house at Rochester, in the county of Kent, where he then resided, to witness his said will, to which the said Matilda James assented: that thereupon the said deceased produced a paper which he said was his will, and, at the same time, observed to her that it had been made a long while, and that he only waited for some one to witness it, or words to that effect: that the said will having been previously signed by the said deceased, he then, in the presence of the said Matilda James, retraced his signature thereto with a dry pen; and the said Matilda James then subscribed her name as a witness thereto: that about eight months before the said deceased's death she, the said Matilda James, being [157] again on a visit at the house of the said deceased in Dorset Street, in the parish of St. Mary-le-bone, to which place he had then removed, he, the said deceased, in the course of conversation with her, and alluding to the will which she had witnessed for him at Rochester, in manner as before pleaded, then observed to her that he had 'destroyed that will and made another will;' and at the same time remarked that 'he usually made a fresh will whenever an alteration took place in his property,' or to that effect: that, on another occasion, happening about the middle of January, 1822, and being only a week before the deceased was confined to his bed by the illness of which he afterwards died, the said Matilda James, having called at the said deceased's house, she found him, the said deceased, writing at his desk, in the parlour, where his wife and family were also sitting, and while the said Matilda James was engaged in conversing with the wife of the said deceased, he, the said deceased, occasionally joined in the conversation; and, alluding to the aforesaid will, which the said Matilda James had witnessed for him at Rochester, again remarked that he had destroyed that will, that the said Matilda James thereupon replied that he had better make another will, to which the deceased replied that 'he had made another will;' or then expressed himself in words to that, or the like, effect."

5 and 6. The fifth and sixth articles of the allegation pleaded the finding of the instrument in the deceased's writing-desk, on the Sunday following his decease, in the same plight and condition that still belonged to it; and that the whole body, series, and contents of the said will, &c. and also the [158] several subscriptions thereto, were of the deceased's own proper hand-writing.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The paper propounded in this allegation would be clearly entitled to probate, but for the attestation clause. It is all in the deceased's hand-writing; it is signed and dated; it appoints an executrix; it is a complete disposition of personal property; and the deceased had no real estate to suggest to him the necessity of executing his will in the presence of witnesses. But if a testamentary paper be imperfect, either in itself, or in the writer's apprehension of it, it can only be entitled to probate, on proof being furnished of his having been prevented by what is technically called the "act of God," from completing it. As, therefore, the natural inference to be drawn from an attestation clause at the foot of a testamentary paper is, that the writer meant to execute it in the presence of witnesses, and that it was incomplete, in his apprehension of it, till that operation was performed—the presumption of law is against a testamentary paper, with an attestation clause not subscribed by witnesses; where the testator is not proved, as he is not suggested even in the present case, to have been prevented by any "act of God" from going on to complete it, had he so intended. The presumption against an instrument, so circumstanced, I admit to be a slight one, where the instrument, like that before the Court, is perfect in all other respects. Slight as it is, however, it must be rebutted by some extrinsic evidence of the testator intending the instrument to operate in its subsisting state; before it can be entitled to [159] probate,(a) consistently with those established principles to which it is the duty of the Court to adhere.

[160] Now the circumstances which are pleaded in this allegation are so far from repelling the legal presumption against the paper propounded, that they go far, in my mind, to fortify and confirm it. For, in the first place, it is pleaded that the deceased, on the occasion of a former will which he had made and signed "a long while before," retraced his signature, with a dry pen, in the presence of a person who subscribed, by his desire, her name as a witness; apparently as if considering the instrument incomplete till that precaution was taken. This, to say the least, does not lessen the probability of his intending to perform a similar operation upon this [161] instrument; and that it was incomplete, in his view of the subject, till that operation was performed.

But it is pleaded, further, to have been the deceased's habit, according to his own

(a) This was the doctrine of Courts of Probate respecting testamentary papers which, though furnished with clauses of attestation, were, in fact, unattested, from an early period, till the decision of the Court of Delegates in the case of Cobbold and Baas (29th Nov., 1781).

The deceased, in that case, James Savage, had given instructions to an attorney to prepare a will. The attorney prepared it with several quæres and abbreviations, and the deceased made several alterations and interlineations in the draft. He afterwards, with his own hand, wrote the said will over fair from the draft, adding a bequest of the residue; and concluded as follows:—

"In witness whereof I have to this my last will and testament, contained in three sheets of paper, to the first two whereof I have set my hand, and the last my hand and seal, this in the 16th year of the reign of our Sovereign George 3rd, &c. A.D. 1777.—Jam[s] Savage.—Signed, sealed, published, declared, and delivered by the testator James Savage, as and for his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who have, at his request, and in presence of each other, set our names as witnesses hereto."

The deceased had subscribed his name to each sheet, and affixed his seal to the last sheet. But the clause of attestation not being subscribed by witnesses, it was considered imperfect for that reason by Dr. Calvert, the then Judge of the Prerogative; and he admitted parol evidence, upon which he set aside the paper. On appeal, however, the Delegates, Sir W. Henry Ashhurst, Sir Beaumont Hotham, and Dr. Macham, were of opinion that, it being a will both of real and personal property, it was, reddendo singula singulis, a perfect disposition of personal estate, and therefore a good will. Accordingly they rejected parol evidence against it, and reversed the sentence of the Court of Prerogative. [See 4 Ves. 200, in notis.]

This judgment of the Court of Delegates in the case of Cobbold and Baas may be considered to have governed, for some time, Courts of Probate with respect to testamentary papers so circumstanced, averse as they were to consider it settled law. But the authority of that case was held to be so shaken, not to say overturned, by inference and deduction from the decision of the Court of Review * (20th Nov., 1799), in the case of Matthews and Warner,† that Courts of Probate reverted, without scruple, to the old doctrine upon this matter, which has been uniformly adhered to in subsequent instances: so that (and the editor considers it important, from the publicity which has been given to that case, to be rightly understood) the judgment of the Court of Delegates in the case of Cobbold and Baas is now held not to be law—the principle which governs this class of cases being that stated in the text.

† See the argument upon the application for a "Commission of Review," in the case of Matthews and Warner, 4 Ves. 186, 211. It may be proper to add that the Court of Review, in that case, reversed the two concurrent sentences of the Prerogative Court and the Court of Delegates.

profession, "to make a new will after every change in his property." Why, this being so, there is a circumstance in the case which lays the strongest ground for concluding this paper designedly abandoned. For it is pleaded that the deceased sold out, at different times in the year 1821, the thousand pounds consols which he possessed at the date of it, and had bequeathed by it, after the death of his wife, to his daughter. The probability therefore is, that he meditated a new will, and had abandoned this instrument; as well from his habit on similar occasions, as from the circumstance of its object being wholly defeated, and its plan wholly deranged, by the sale of his stock. By this paper the deceased's whole property stands bequeathed to the wife; the daughter will take nothing. It is perfectly true that the whole is but little; and that his sons, very contrary possibly to the deceased's intentions, will become entitled to share in that little in the event of his intestacy. But these are circumstances which, in no degree, alter or detract from the principle that governs the case—a principle which it is the first duty of the Court to adhere to, uninfluenced by any such considerations.

The only circumstance which, in my judgment, can have a tendency to repel the legal presumption against the paper is the deceased's declaration to Miss James, pleaded in the 4th article, that "he had destroyed his former will, and had made a new one." But the mere vague declarations of testa-[162]-tors, that "they have made" their wills, are not always to be implicitly relied on; and can never, standing singly, supply proof of due execution, or, consequently, of what is to be taken in lieu of it. In common parlance, a man may well say, and possibly often does, that "he has made" a will, when he has written a testamentary paper, however incomplete or unfinished that paper may be. In the present case, at all events, I cannot accept the declaration pleaded as sufficient to shew that the deceased intended this instrument to operate; when both the presumption in law, and the probability from the facts pleaded are, that he abandoned it.

Allegation rejected.

SAPH v. ATKINSON AND WESTCOTT. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1822.—If a will is before the Court, the validity of which is admitted, the Court will pronounce for it in preference to an alleged subsequent will, of the genuineness of which it entertains serious doubts.—The principles what upon which Courts of Probate proceed, where the inquiry is whether an asserted will was, or was not, the act of an alleged testator.

[Referred to, Robson v. Rocke, 1824, 2 Add. 90.]

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The present question respects the validity of an instrument, set up as the will of William Harcourt, late of the city of New Sarum, the party deceased in the cause, who died on the 22d of March, 1820. This instrument, which purports to bear date on the 4th of June, 1819, is propounded on the part of Sarah Susannah Saph, whom it constitutes the deceased's sole executrix. It is opposed by Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Westcott, the deceased's executors, [163] under a will dated the 24th of October, 1818, the genuineness of which is admitted on all hands.

The validity of the contested will in the present cause (in which, by the way, no fewer than seventy witnesses have been examined to the several allegations admitted upon either side) is not dependent upon the state of the deceased's capacity at the time of its suggested execution, but upon the fact of execution itself; the question being, whether the deceased ever executed it at all. For the case set up by the executors of the former will is that the alleged latter will was not subscribed by, and is not the act of, the alleged testator. The contrary to this is, of course, advanced by the party propounding the instrument, upon whom therefore, as asserting an affirmative, the burthen of proof must be taken to rest. She it is who is bound to satisfy the conscience of the Court that the contested instrument was the supposed testator's own act; the law does not impose upon Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Westcott the burthen of furnishing proof that it was not.

Now, where the inquiry is, whether an asserted will was, or was not, executed by an alleged testator, all such collateral circumstances may be pleaded and proved on either side, as have a tendency to shew, on the one hand, the probability, and on the other, the improbability, that it should have been so executed. I allude to such circumstances as the place in which the alleged will was found—the parties through whose agency it was prepared—its conformity, or the contrary, with the deceased's avowed or presumed testamentary intentions; and so on. A variety of such circumstances are actually pleaded to this intent, on either side, in the present cause; and to the evi-[164]-dence furnished upon the principal of these the Court will direct its attention, in the first instance, before it proceeds to consider the evidence more immediately applicable to the fact of execution, the main point in issue.

And, first, what is the evidence as to the circumstances connected with the finding of this instrument? Now, the circumstances under which a will is found may, as we all know, tend very materially to its authentication. If, for instance, it is found locked up in repositories, to which the deceased only had access, and is produced from such by indifferent and disinterested parties, these are circumstances which, as tending to connect the will with the testator, are strongly confirmatory of its genuineness and authenticity. The disputed will, in this cause, has no advantage of that description: its first production, after the deceased's death, is by Mrs. Saph, the sole executrix, and party principally benefited under it—from where remains to be answered. But the testator's former will (from which this latter was avowedly drawn up by her son, Mr. John Saph) is admitted not to have been in the deceased's possession at the time of his death; but at Mrs. Saph's house, and in Mr. John Saph's custody. Something might be observed as to what passed when inquiry was first made for that former will. Mr. John Saph's answer, to say the least, was by no means explicit. That answer impressed the inquirer with a notion that he asserted the instrument to be destroyed. He explains himself as having meant to assert, not that the instrument itself was destroyed, but that it was revoked, or that its effect was annulled. After admitting, however, the exist-[165]-ence of the instrument, he was somewhat reluctant to produce it; and, at last, only did so in compliance with the recommendation of his solicitor, Mr. Dew. Something might also be said as to the mala fides of the Saphs, in endeavouring to snap a probate, as it is termed, in breach of their engagement to take no step of that nature till after the funeral of the deceased. Both these last, however, are mere out-lying circumstances, and will go little to impeach the credit of this transaction, unless it shall turn out that they are connected with others of the same colour and complexion. At the same time I cannot fail to observe that here, in the very outset of this inquiry, I encounter somewhat of deviation, on the part of those who set up this instrument, from that straight-forward path in which truth and fairness are accustomed to proceed. But,

Secondly, to consider the parties agent in this transaction, namely, Mrs. Saph and her family. For the Court is under no difficulty, in the present case, as to who are the fabricators of this instrument, if it be fabricated; they can be no other than the identical parties, who are vouched to the factum of the instrument as a genuine one. Now, had these parties any inducement to attempt, and did they possess any means to effect, the fabrication of an instrument of this description? As to inducement, there was every inducement of which the nature of the thing is capable; for the will purports to bequeath the intire bulk of the deceased's property to the Saph family. And although the three members of that family, who attest the execution (one of the three being also the writer) of this instrument, take no direct benefit under it, still that circumstance, [166] as I shall have occasion presently to observe, leaves the question pretty much where it stood before, as to this matter of inducement. As to the means again, it must be admitted that these parties were in possession of fully sufficient information to get up an instrument of this description; for, to say nothing of their long personal connection with the deceased, his former will, from which this latter is manifestly drawn up, was avowedly in the possession and custody of the Saphs at the time of his death.

That Mrs. Saph was not altogether indifferent about obtaining a will in her favor is obvious from the evidence of Pleyer, who lived in the deceased's service from Michaelmas, 1817, to the summer of 1818. She deposes to having heard Mrs. Saph speak to the deceased about his will one evening before he had the paralytic stroke. "She wished," she said, "he would do something more for her; and he replied that he should not; for he had done enough for her already." She says that "after the said deceased had had the paralytic stroke, Mrs. Saph used often to rub his hands with mustard, and other things, to recover the use of them again; and that, on such occasions, she used to say to him that she wished she could get him the use of his hands again, so that he could write; for she did believe that then he would do something more for her by his will." Now, the evidence of this witness proves two things; first, that Mrs. Saph was sufficiently alive to her own interests; secondly, she was withheld by no scruples, of delicacy at least, from trying to promote them. Nothing of all this, however, appears to have made any impression upon the de-[167]-ceased; for it is in evidence that he made and executed two subsequent wills, in neither of which he acceded to Mrs. Saph's claims, nor paid the slightest attention to her applications.

Now, if Mrs. Saph was still dissatisfied with the trifling provision, to which only, as I shall presently shew, she stood entitled under the deceased's last (genuine) will, is there any thing, let me inquire, in special, that is, in her station or character, which in any sense negatives the probability of her having been tempted to have recourse to a fabricated one? Mrs. Saph was a married woman living (possibly not through her own fault) separate and apart from her husband, with a large family, and, I presume, in necessitous circumstances; for it seems that, after the discharge of Pleyer, the deceased's last servant, in 1818, she was the deceased's sole attendant, and performed even the menial offices of his house. She is obviously therefore not so elevated as to be above all suspicion of fraud, on the score of wealth or condition. Her character will best disclose itself in the future stages of this inquiry. Is there any thing, again, in the stations or characters of the agents, through whose instrumentality the fraud, if any, was effected, to render this violently improbable? The writer of this will was Mr. John Saph, the son of this Mrs. Saph; and it is attested by him and his brother and sister, strictly a family party. Of these, all that I shall at present say is, that Mr. John Saph's induction into life was through the medium of an attorney's office, which he quitted in consequence of a most disgraceful transaction; and I find no trace in the evidence of his having redeemed his character, at this time, by any part of [168] his subsequent conduct. There is nothing, at least, in his station or character which precludes the probability of fraud. Looking then at the inducement which these parties had to fabricate a will, and at the means which they possessed of fabricating one, especially in connexion with Mrs. Saph's, even avowed, claims upon the deceased's testamentary bounty; I do not mean to say that either her station and character, or those of the writer and attesting witnesses, amount to affirmative proof of this being a fabricated will; but I do say, and I would be understood to mean no more, that there is nothing in these, in special, that is to negative the probability of its being such—nothing to render it either highly incredible or even very unlikely à priori. The instrument propounded, therefore, has indeed the ordinary presumption against fraud in its favor; but that is, strictly, all.

But, thirdly, as to the dispositive part of this will; for, in determining the probability of any will being the act of an alleged testator, the Court is, in all cases, naturally led to consider the disposition made by it. The disposition purported to be made by the will propounded is so important a feature of the present case that the Court will consider it, both generally, and in detail. And the Court, in this case, is not left merely to presume, or conjecture, what the deceased's testamentary intentions might have been—it has the benefit of two prior wills, declaratory of his testamentary intentions, or at least of what these were at a period not much anterior to the date of this instrument, with which to compare the present disposition.

[169] Now, upon a comparison of the deceased's two former testamentary acts with the present instrument in this respect, it will plainly appear that his mind and intention, as to the disposal of his property, had undergone, within a short period, a complete revolution, supposing the present instrument to be, in truth, his will. The two former wills, the one dated in June, the other in October, 1818, are, in substance, as to their dispositive parts, precisely the same. By both, the bulk of the property is bequeathed to Mr. Westcott and his family; some bequests, rather honorary than beneficial, are made to Mr. Atkinson and his family; a considerable sum is devoted to charitable uses. Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Westcott are the trustees and executors in both wills; as the latter of these gentlemen, Mr. Westcott, is the residuary legatee. Mrs. Saph and her family are legatees to more than a trifling amount in neither of the two. By the instrument propounded, these dispositions are nearly reversed—Mrs. Saph and her family are bequeathed the great bulk of the deceased's property; Mr. Westcott and his family are nearly excluded; Mr. Atkinson and his family are wholly so; even the honorary legacies to these last are omitted; so are the charitable bequests; Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Westcott are no longer executors or even trustees; Mrs. Saph, who is also the residuary legatee, is the sole executrix. All this implies a complete revolution of testamentary mind and intention, in order to estimate the probability of which it is necessary to see whether it can be fairly accounted for by extrinsic circumstances.

[170] And here, in the first place, it is not to be accounted for by any caprice or fickleness of the deceased in this respect that can be collected, at least, from the variations between the two instruments of June and October, 1818. They, on the contrary, go to shew the very reverse; for they are trifling in themselves, and satisfactorily explained. By the will of June, a house in Green Croft Street, after a life interest to one Webb and his wife, is given in remainder, together with a legacy of 10l., to a Mrs. Heyley; and a Mrs. Jeboult is bequeathed 100l. In the course of that summer, however, this Mrs. Heyley appears to have set up a demand against the deceased, as entitled to some property under the will of his late wife; which it appears that the deceased borrowed money (in part of Mr. Atkinson) to discharge. In return the deceased, by the will of October, withdraws his testamentary bounty from Mrs. Heyley altogether, and bequeaths the freehold interest, before devised to her, to Mrs. Jeboult, in lieu of her pecuniary legacy. It seems too that there was an erroneous description in the former will of a joint note of hand, given by the deceased and Mr. Westcott to Mr. Atkinson, it being described in that will as due to Mr. Gray—in the latter will that error is corrected, and it is described to be due (as the fact was) to Mr. Atkinson. These are the sole and the trifling variations between the two instruments; by the latter of which, the bulk of the disposition contained in the former is ratified and confirmed: and the two, together, furnish evidence of fixed testamentary intention infinitely beyond that which could be supplied by any single testamentary act. Any single testamentary act might be the result of sudden whim, [171] or temporary impression; but this confirmed act—the will of June, thus ratified by that of October—establishes, on a solid foundation, the deceased's then fixed testamentary intentions, and renders a sudden change in these, as to the bulk and general tenor of the disposition, highly improbable, unless most satisfactorily accounted for.

Nor to pass, for an instant, from the matter to the form, is any inference, in favour of the last will propounded, derived from comparing it in this respect, any more than in the former, with the two prior wills. A particular investigation of the mode and manner in which the contested will is said to have been drawn up and executed, belongs to another place. It will be sufficient, in this place, to observe that these were highly informal, as contrasted with those adopted in the framing and execution of both the other two. In respect of both these, the deceased availed himself of the agency of his confidential solicitor, Mr. Wilmot, who had acted for him, as such, for twenty years before; who had been employed to draw up and attest the will of October, as well as that of June, 1818, though the former varied from the latter only in those trifling particulars to which I have just adverted; who had also prepared and attested the will of his deceased wife in 1808; and who was actually resorted to by the testator himself, upon other business, in August, 1819, subsequent, that is, to the date of the will propounded on the part of Mrs. Saph.

But to proceed to consider the probability of this change in the deceased's testamentary intentions, the first, indeed I may say the only, previous intimation of which is contained in the deposition of [172] Mr. John Saph. For to no other human being can the deceased be shewn to have expressed himself, as dissatisfied with his former testamentary arrangements, made and confirmed so recently, or as intending any alteration in these, than to Mr. John Saph. True it is, indeed, that Mrs. Saph has pleaded that the deceased, intending to revoke his will of October, 1818, and being dissatisfied with his solicitor, Mr. Thomas Wilmot, who had drawn it up, conversed with John Petty, clerk to the said Thomas Wilmot, thereon, and asked him, 'what he would charge for making a new will?'" But when Mr. John Petty, the person so vouched, comes to be examined upon this allegation, he positively and explicitly denies the whole transaction; or that the deceased ever made any such application to, or enquiries of, him. He says that he was a subscribed witness to the deceased's will of June, 1818, by mere accident, being at that time, not a regular clerk, but a sort of extra writer, in the office of Mr. Wilmot during the bustle of a general election only; and that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, he never was in the deceased's company or society upon any other occasion. This total negation of the fact, so alleged by the witness Petty, to say the least, has no tendency to dispel the clouds of suspicion that hang upon Mrs. Saph's case.

Before I proceed to any ulterior consideration of the probability of those alterations it may be advisable to state them somewhat more in detail.

The deceased, however, I should premise, at the period of these transactions, was far advanced in life, nearly, I believe, eighty years of age, but in [173] possession of his full mental faculties, as also of tolerable bodily health; for he was walking about, and at market, within a day or two of his death, nine months posterior to the date of this contested will. He was afflicted, indeed, with erysipelas, and with something of paralysis, especially in the hands; which required to be rubbed, as stated in Pleyer's evidence, with mustard, &c. to give him the free use of them. Hence, he was averse to writing, though not totally disabled from it; and Mr. John Saph, who was sometimes employed to receive his rents, occasionally, also, signed receipts for them, in his (the deceased's) name. The deceased was a widower, and without children. His wife died in 1812; having first by her will, which was made in 1808, left the bulk of her property, after the death of her husband, to Messrs. Westcott and Atkinson; so that these gentlemen were her executors and trustees, as well as those of the deceased, under the two prior wills. Mrs. Saph's maiden name was Mundy. The Mundys and Harcourts were somehow related; and the deceased and his wife appear to have been upon friendly terms with the father and mother of Mrs. Saph, though resident at some distance from Salisbury. The deceased's wife had stood godmother to Mrs. Saph; and she and her husband took notice of, and were kind to her, both when a school girl, at Salisbury, and when, after her marriage and separation from her husband, she was left with a large family, in narrow circumstances, in more mature life. With all this, however, Mrs. Saph was no object of Mrs. Harcourt's testamentary bounty. Whatever was her connexion with, and whatever were her claims upon her, she, by her [174] will, left her nothing. The deceased, after his wife's death, keeping only one female servant, Mrs. Saph, who lived near, used from that time frequently to be at his house; attended him in particular, in his sicknesses; and no doubt contributed very much to his comfort. On Pleyer's discharge, in 1818, she became his sole attendant. In the previous year, 1817, as well as in 1818, she and her daughter, Ann Saph, had accompanied the deceased to Lymington. The deceased, in return, paid great attention to Mrs. Saph, and was kind to her children, especially to this daughter Ann; occasionally also employing her son Mr. John Saph. The deceased, it is to be observed, however, had returned from Lymington, before the will of October, 1818; and although, in the intervening time between October, 1818, and the date of the new will he had gone to Weymouth, accompanied by Mrs. Saph and her daughter; yet it does not appear that, either on their journey, or during the rest of the interval, there was any marked difference in the sort of intercourse between the deceased and the Saphs, from that which had been going on for, and during, several years prior to the wills of June and October, 1818. And now to state these purported alterations in the deceased's testamentary intentions, as a test of their probability, somewhat more minutely.

The first alteration respects the house in Green Croft Street. This, I have already said, was given by the will of June to Mary Heyley; and, for the reasons stated, to Mrs. Jeboult, by the will of October, in lieu of her pecuniary legacy of 100l. It is now, however, taken from Mrs. Jeboult (no legacy being substituted for it), and is given to a [175] Mrs. Crocker, who turns out to be a married daughter of Mrs. Saph, and in no particular favour or habits of intercourse with the deceased, that I can discover. For the probability of this alteration not an argument even has been advanced; except that general one, of the deceased's increased regard for the Saph family, which I shall consider, once for all, presently.

The next alteration is an interchange between the houses given to Mrs. Saph and Mr. Westcott. By the wills of June and October, 1818, the deceased had given a house in Church Street, adjoining that in which he resided, to Mrs. Saph for her life, with remainder to her son and daughter, James and Sarah Saph; and the house in which he resided to Mr. Westcott, with remainder to his son William Westcott, charged with the payment of 100l. due from the testator and Mr. Westcott to Mr. Atkinson on a joint note of hand. These devises are now interchanged; the last mentioned house is devised to Mrs. Saph in lieu of the first; the first mentioned, and with a similar charge, to Mr. Westcott, in lieu of the last. Now it happens that the testator's own house is worth about five times as much as the adjoining one, described merely as a cottage; the life interest of Mr. Westcott in which is actually not worth the sum charged upon it. Mr. Westcott, at the same time, is excluded from any other benefit or trust under the will; and Mrs. Saph is substituted as the sole executrix and residuary legatee.

In order to account for these alterations, an attempt has been made to set up (still in conjunction with the deceased's great increasing regard for the [176] Saphs) something of disaffection towards Mr. Westcott. But to what does the evidence furnished on this head amount? why, merely to this: that the deceased did sometimes observe that Westcott was imprudent, and might have been richer and provided better for his family. Expressions, however, of this sort are not only of little weight in themselves, but being proved to have occurred as well before the wills of June and October, under which he is the principal legatee, as subsequent thereto; they do not confer a shadow of probability on his virtual exclusion under this third will. It is an alteration, I conceive, highly improbable in itself; and in no degree rendered less so by this attempt to account for it by diminished esteem, on the deceased's part, towards the Westcotts.

Nearly the same observations apply to the case of Mr. Atkinson and his family as under the three wills. Under both the former wills this gentleman was an executor and trustee. His daughter and himself had pecuniary legacies, rather complimentary, however, than any objects to them, as matters of property. His sons and himself had pieces of plate, carefully ticketed by the deceased in his lifetime to distinguish them. In this third will all these bequests are omitted, even those of the pieces of plate, so ticketed, as I have described; nay, more, many of the articles themselves, I observe, are not included in Mrs. Saph's declaration, instead of an inventory, upon her oath, furnished in the February of the preceding year; and what has become of them, non constat. The attempt which has been made to shew that Mr. Atkinson was losing ground in the [177] deceased's esteem wholly fails. He was a very old friend, both of the deceased himself and his wife; he was executor and trustee of both; he had advanced money to the deceased only recently, to enable him to satisfy the demand of Mrs. Heyley; he held a power of attorney to receive his dividends; and the deceased is proved to have made kind enquiries about him, during his absence in Scotland, after the date of the will propounded, and down to the time of his own death. For the probability of this alteration, therefore, we have still nothing to refer to but the deceased's great regard for the Saphs.

The next alteration is that respecting the disposition of the bank stock. The deceased, by both his former wills, had given and bequeathed "so much of his bank stock as should produce 60l. per annum" to the minister and churchwardens of the parish of St. Edmund, Sarum, to be divided between six poor persons—three poor men and three poor women, with direction that if Mrs. Saph chose to apply as one of these latter she was to have a preference. Any bonus payable on the said bank stock after his decease he bequeathed to Mr. Gray, and the residue (being about 3l. 16s. a year each) to Mr. Gray and the three junior Mr. Atkinsons. Under the will propounded on the Saphs' part all these bequests are swept away: "the produce of 800l. bank stock" is bequeathed to Ann Saph, the daughter, and "the remainder" is given specifically to Mrs. Saph, the mother.

An observation upon the wording of this purported legacy of the bank stock will be more in place in a subsequent stage of this enquiry. Meantime, how [178] stands the probability as to the substitution of Mrs. Saph and her daughter, in lieu of the charities? Now it appears that charitable bequests of some sort had been long projected by the deceased. He had long purposed building alms-houses, a purpose, it should seem, not wholly relinquished at the very latest period of his life. Under these circumstances, his abandoning altogether any bequest of the kind is in itself highly improbable.

But, superadded to the improbability that the deceased should have sanctioned any such total abandonment, we have his own positive averments, subsequent to the date of this will, that he had not done so. The witness Nash states that "in conversation with the deceased about the house adjoining his own, then under repair, the deceased said, 'He had had some thoughts of pulling it down and building alms-houses there; but that he had given that up, as building was too fatiguing for him.' The deponent observing, 'He was sorry for it,' the deceased said, 'I have left,' or 'I will leave,' the deponent did not understand which, 'in lieu of it, a weekly allowance to so many poor people.' The deponent said, 'I hope you will not forget it, sir,' to which the deceased replied, speaking very quick and with great earnestness, 'Why, I have done it.'" This conversation the witness fixes in the latter end of September, 1819. Again, the witness Randall, who had been long intimate with him, deposes "to having taken an opportunity of saying to the deceased, upon whom he had called for the poor rates of the parish, 'You used to talk, sir, about the money you meant to lay out in the parish for charitable purposes;' the deceased said, 'My mind is quite [179] easy and satisfied upon that head; I have made my will and have given the sum you and I used to talk about, for the benefit of the poor; you'll hear more about it hereafter.' The deceased further said, 'You are a young man; if you live you will know more about it on some future day. I have left it to the vestry, or to the minister and churchwardens to distribute, and you will have something to do with the distribution of it one day, if you live'—alluding, as the witness understood, to the probability of his being churchwarden at some future period." This was in August, 1819, the month preceding that of the deceased's declarations to Nash.

Why, if the testator really made these averments, and was sincere in making them, independant of their bearing upon the question of probability, there is nearly an end of the case set up by Mrs. Saph upon another score—for they amount to distinct recognitions of the former will, to distinct disavowals of the alleged latter one. Of the sincerity of these, however, on the testator's part, I see no reason whatever to doubt; and the witnesses who have deposed to them, Nash and Randall, are perfectly unbiassed and perfectly unimpeached.

The whole, then, of these alterations, which I have thus gone through in detail, are highly improbable in themselves, and that last considered is, also, at variance with the deceased's express subsequent declarations. We have seen that the attempts, in special, to account for them in two instances, have wholly failed; it remains only to consider that sole remaining and general salvo for all difficulties, set up in the deceased's alleged great (and in process [180] of time it should seem nearly exclusive) regard for the family of Mrs. Saph.

And here it may freely be admitted that, from Mrs. Saph's long connexion with the deceased's family and long attendance upon his person—from her constant and unremitted exertions to contribute to his comfort, especially during his latter years—no surprise could have been excited in the mind of the Court by any provision that the deceased might have made for her in a will that stood per se. The Court would most unquestionably have declined putting its own estimate upon the value of her services—services which only the deceased was qualified duly to appreciate. But the Court has before it an undoubted constat of the value of those services, in the deceased's estimation, at a period only shortly anterior to the date of the will propounded, in the wills of June and October, 1818. And what, upon inquiry, does this turn out to be? Why, it is to be collected from the will of June, ratified and confirmed by that of October, that the deceased, notwithstanding the urgent instances of Mrs. Saph with him to consider her claims and services, had deliberately fixed the value of those services, in his estimate, at a devise of the cottage and garden adjoining his own residence to her for life, with remainder to her two youngest children, and a recommendation that she, on application, should be preferably entitled as one of the six poor persons to whom, as already noticed, he had appropriated 10l. a year each, in the way of charitable bequest. What he had given her in his lifetime, in remuneration of her services, does not exactly appear. According to some of the [181] witnesses, as, for instance, Mrs. Gilbert, he had been very liberal to her and her family. According to his own declaration, as deposed to by Pleyer, "he had done enough for her." Be that however as it may, this is the whole given to her by the will of June, confirmed by that of October, 1818. As a ground, then, of probability for the high rate at which these are estimated in the will now propounded, all merits and services on her part, all declarations and kindnesses in return, on his, either at Lymington or elsewhere, prior to this will of October, 1818, are done away—they go, but they go no farther than, to that will. The vastly higher rate at which they are estimated in this last will than in that of October can only be satisfactorily accounted for, in my mind, by some great accession, either of desert on her part, or of regard on his, or of both these together, between the dates of the two wills, of which I don't see a vestige in the evidence—I should rather, indeed, say, between the date of the first of these wills, or the end of October, and the beginning of March: for it should seem from Mr. John Saph's evidence (of which presently) that the deceased expressed to him his intention of altering his will three months before that intention was actually carried into effect;

so that the deceased's mind must be considered as having undergone the change or revolution so to be accounted for, between the end of October and the very beginning of March. But I can discover nothing, in this interval, in the nature of cause, to which any such effect can be reasonably ascribed; there occurred in it nothing more, that I can perceive, than the same attentions on the one part, and returns of kindness and good [182] will on the other, that had been interchanged between the same parties for years before. Yet this last will (to state more explicitly, what that change or revolution is) purports to bestow on Mrs. Saph and her family, in lieu of the trifling provision made for them under the former wills, the whole of the deceased's property, real and personal, to the utter exclusion of the former objects of his testamentary bounty, whose places they alone occupy. I say the "whole of his property," and to "the utter exclusion;" for I can scarcely consider that the few legacies given away from the Saphs furnish any virtual exception to this mode of speech; being of trifling amount, and precisely such as the generality of fabricated wills are found, by way of colour, to contain.

Upon the whole result, then, of this examination into the evidence furnished upon each of the principal circumstances disclosed on either side, in proof of the probability, or improbability, of this contested will being the deceased's own act, the presumption, I must say, is very strongly against the instrument. I now come to the more direct evidence applicable to the question of whether it be such or not—a question upon which nothing that has been hitherto advanced is, in any sense, decisive. For a case how unlikely and suspicious soever in itself may be irresistibly proved by the force of testimony. Evidence may be such as to substantiate a transaction, however improbable; for it may be such that the falsehood of the evidence would be still more improbable than the fact which it seeks to establish.

The present case is one of a somewhat painful [183] nature to determine. Upon questions of capacity, which, perhaps, most frequently occur in this Court, the evidence in great part, is commonly reconcilable. For evidence upon capacity being, chiefly, evidence upon a mere matter of opinion, witnesses who differ most may depose, upon a question of capacity, with equal sincerity. Here, however, the Court will be under the absolute necessity of withholding its credence from the principal witnesses, that is from those to the factum of the instrument, in the event of pronouncing against it. At the same time, it by no means feels itself driven to the alternative which has been pressed upon it in argument, of either pronouncing in its favour; or of determining, affirmatively, that the instrument is a forgery, and that those are perjured who have attempted to sustain it. The presumption of law, and burthen of proof, are different in the case of a civil inquiry (which is the character of the present proceeding) and in that of a criminal prosecution, under which alone charges of forgery and perjury can be duly investigated. On charges of forgery and perjury the presumption is in favour of innocence; and the weight of any doubt that may arise in the investigation of those charges belongs, most unquestionably, to the parties accused. Here the presumption is in favour of the former will, the validity of which is admitted—so that the Court, instead of giving the latter the benefit of any doubt (which, as I have just said, those who support it would be entitled to, if arraigned upon a criminal charge) is bound to give it the other way, namely, upon the admitted will. I apprehend that this distinction is sufficiently real to enable me to pronounce in favour of the admitted [184] will, without going the length of deciding affirmatively the asserted one to be a forgery. I proceed then to consider the direct evidence applicable to the alleged execution of this instrument.

Now the sufficiency of that evidence to sustain this transaction necessarily depends on the credit, both general and particular, due to the witnesses who speak to it; and upon the character, as to its intrinsic probability, or the contrary, of their narrative.

Who, then, are the witnesses by whose immediate testimony this instrument is to be sustained? and how do they stand affected? and, first, as in point of general credit.

The witnesses upon the condidit are two of the sons, and a daughter, of Mrs. Saph, the party principally benefited under the will propounded. They are competent witnesses, as not having, themselves, a direct pecuniary interest in the event of the suit. At the same time they can, by no means, be considered unbiassed ones. A direct interest of the smallest amount in value would preclude them from being witnesses at all; so jealous is the law of the purity of evidence. At the same time it is obvious that these parties are under much stronger inducements to support this transaction

(and were, originally, to embark in it) than a trifling legacy would have furnished; though this last, as I have just said, would have destroyed their competency as witnesses, whereas the "stronger inducement" only goes to their credit. But though the law (which can only draw its line between interest and no interest) permits witnesses who are so circumstanced as the present are to be heard; yet it even requires them to [185] be heard (as indeed common sense does) with a very considerable deduction from the credit to which they might be otherwise entitled.

And here, by the way, it strikes me as a little singular, that these three Saphs should be competent witnesses; or, in other words, that they should be the only members of the family unnoticed in the deceased's will. Their very competency is an argument, to my mind, against the genuineness of this transaction. Why should the deceased exclude these alone of all Mrs. Saph's children from any participation of his bounty? James and Sarah have the reversion of the deceased's house; Elizabeth (Crocker) has the reversion of the house in Green Croft Street; Ann has the bank stock; but John, Robert, and Sarah have nothing, which is the more extraordinary as to the first, since it appears that he was something in the confidence of, and much employed by, the deceased. That the deceased should have omitted them expressly, as for the purpose of making them witnesses (which is the only solution of the difficulty) is, in itself, most improbable; as he could be at no loss for neighbours and friends to attest his will, even though he had not thought proper to confide in Mr. Wilmot to prepare it. Their exclusion, therefore, is a circumstance which it is extremely difficult to account for, on the supposition of this being the deceased's act. But is it equally unaccountable in the other alternative, namely, that it was not the deceased's act, but a fabrication of Mr. John Saph? By no means—that he, either should not venture, or could not contrive, to embark three indifferent persons in a transaction of this nature is extremely likely: as it also is, that he [186] should have picked up something about legatees not being competent witnesses in his attorney's office. The making these three Saphs, therefore, attesting witnesses, and the omission of any benefit to them, in order to their being such, is perfectly reconcilable with the notion of this instrument being a fabrication—irreconcilable as it is with the notion of its being a genuine and authentic instrument.

The above observations go to the general credit of the attesting witnesses, collectively. I now proceed to consider the credit, both general and particular, which is due to each of them, taken separately. And, first, for Mr. John Saph, who must be admitted to have been the principal actor in this transaction, whether it be false or genuine.

And here, in the first place, how does Mr. John Saph's credit stand affected by his general character? Now it is difficult to conceive a person whose credit is more shaken by what appears of his general character (which has been formally excepted to) than Mr. John Saph. His absconding from Mr. Winch the attorney's office, with some of his employer's money, is a particular fact, which is spoken to by witnesses on both sides, and, indeed, is not attempted to be denied. After so absconding from the service of Mr. Winch, he set up in business as a maltster, at Calne; where his sisters Elizabeth and Jane appear to have lived with him. His particular transactions at Calne, being differently represented by the witnesses, I endeavour to shut out of my mind; but there are several witnesses from Calne who must be presumed to have had means of knowing him, and who swear that, from their knowledge of him, generally, they would not believe him [187] upon his oath. And other persons, from other places, who are acquainted with, and have grounds for forming an estimate of his character, depose to the same effect. Of the witnesses, on the other hand, produced in support of his character, some say "they do not know what character he bears," and consequently prove nothing. Others admit that they have heard "reports to his disadvantage;" and, therefore, prove worse than nothing. Others, indeed, express a more favourable opinion of him, but the Court, for reasons that will presently appear, can place no implicit reliance upon their testimony. The result, in short, of the whole evidence, as to this person's general character is, that it affects his credit very materially: so that whatever proceeds from the mouth of such a witness, even upon this consideration only, requires strong corroboration before it is entitled to belief. The Court is bound, however, to resort to his evidence, he not being an incompetent witness in law. It is in substance as follows:—

He says that, "Living in Salisbury, at but a short distance from the deceased (with whom his mother had resided for the last three years of his life as his housekeeper), he was in the habit of calling upon the deceased daily, or nearly so. That on one of such occasions, the deceased told him, he intended to alter his will; but that he should not employ his attorney to alter it, for that he had ill treated him. This might be about three months before the execution of the new will. After that, he repeatedly mentioned to he deponent, whom he knew to have been writing clerk to an attorney for about three years, that he should alter his will for him. In [188] April, 1819, he drove the deceased, who was accompanied by the deponent's mother and sister Ann, as far as Blandford, on their way to Weymouth; on that journey the deceased told him, before his mother and sister, that he should alter his (the deceased's) will for him when he returned from Weymouth. In the latter end of May the deponent met the deceased, accompanied as before, at Blandford, on his way home, and drove him back to Salisbury. In this journey the deceased said that the deponent should now alter his will for him. The deponent thinks they returned the 26th or 27th of May. On the following morning the deponent called upon the deceased, and mentioned to him the subject of his will, when the deceased said 'he might as well give the instructions for it at once.' This was about nine o'clock in the morning; no other person was present. Pens and ink were on the table, standing in the middle of the room, from a drawer of which the deceased took and gave the deponent some paper. The deceased began by saying that 'he had, by a former will, left a certain sum to charity, but he said that he should give part of that sum, namely, eight hundred pounds bank stock to deponent's sister, Ann Saph, and the remainder of such sum to deponent's mother, Sarah Susannah Saph, independent of her husband Robert Saph, and to be at her sole disposal.' He said that 'he should bequeath the house given by the former will to a Mrs. Jeboult, to Mrs. Crocker, and her heirs.' He further directed that the deponent's mother should be his sole executrix and residuary legatee still, independent of her husband, as before. He directed the deponent to omit a legacy of 200l. to a [189] Mr. Atkinson, and to leave out every thing given to the said Mr. Atkinson and his family. He further said that 'he would give the house in which he lived to the deponent's mother for her life; with remainder to her two youngest children, James and Sarah, instead of to Mr. Westcott, to whom it was given by the former will; and that he, Mr. Westcott, should have the adjoining house, which was given by the said former will to the deponent's mother, Mrs. Saph.' The deceased then got up, and took out his former will from a cupboard in the room, in which they were sitting, and gave it to the deponent, telling him 'to write it over again with the aforesaid alterations.' The deponent, after he had written the aforesaid instructions, read them over loud enough to be heard by the deceased (who was rather deaf) distinctly; and when he had finished the deceased said, 'That will do—that will do; that's all right.' The deponent, having prepared a new will from such instructions and former will, went with the same to the deceased, about three days after; he found him alone, and read it all over to him; the deceased then took, and read, or appeared to read it, all over, to himself. The deponent said that he would procure a light, which he accordingly did, when the deceased, having taken some wax from the ink-stand drawer, melted the same, and made a seal at the end of the will, impressing the same with the initials of his name, from a seal hanging to the watch which he wore in his fob. He then told the deponent that 'his brother and sister, Robert and Jane Saph, should be two of the witnesses to his said will, and that when they were both at home together, and at leisure, he would [190] execute his said will,' which the deponent left with him. The deponent had made one or two drafts before completing the said will; but which he destroyed, as well as the instructions so taken from the deceased as aforesaid, when he had completed it. He goes on to depose that, being with the deceased on the evening of the 3d of June, the deceased told him, if his brother and sister Robert and Jane were at home at breakfast time, the following morning, to bring them with him, and he would then execute his will. On the following morning the deponent went to the deceased accordingly, and was followed by his said brother and sister, who came in about nine o'clock; the deceased's will was then lying on the table, he having previously taken it from the cupboard and placed it there; his mother was the only other person present. The deceased then 'perused the first sheet of the will, mentally, and having so done, he took the pen and ink, and signed his name thereto; the deponent then took the pen and ink, and wrote J. S., being the initials of his name, in the margin of the said sheet, and desired the said Robert and Jane Saph to write their respective initials, which they did.' This was repeated, as to each of the four sheets; the deponent, and his said brother and sister, also subscribing their respective names at the foot of the attestation, written on the fourth sheet. The deponent's said brother and sister then withdrew, and the deceased, without saying any thing, took the will, and went up stairs, whence he shortly returned to the deponent and his mother, but did not mention the will again; having, as the deponent believes, left it up stairs. As the deceased never enquired for his former will, the deponent kept [191] the same in his possession until after deceased's death."

Such is the history of this transaction from its outset to its final completion, as stated by Mr. John Saph. I shall first briefly advert to some improbabilities in his narrative, taken alone; and shall then compare two passages of it, which afford the Court that opportunity; the former, with the evidence of another witness in the cause; the latter, with the face and appearance of the instrument itself.

In the first place, then, the mode in which these instructions are first communicated, as stated by this deponent, strikes me as a little improbable. According to this witness's account, the deceased had the whole matter of the new will so completely arranged in his own mind that he communicates full instructions for it without hesitation, from memory only, and without any reference whatever to any written document. For it is not till after the instructions are so delivered by the testator, and taken down by the witness, that the former will is fetched from the cupboard. So accurately are these instructions, however, given on the one hand, and taken on the other, that when read over to the testator, on being reduced into writing, not an alteration, not a correction, suggests itself—the testator says, "That will do—that will do—that's all right."

The witness goes on to say that, having prepared a new will from these instructions, he took it to the deceased about three days after. The will, so prepared, is then read over, first to, and after this by, the deceased, to whom again, although no intermediate draft had been submitted, not a syllable that requires any alteration presents itself. The witness [192] then, apparently at his own suggestion, procures a candle; and so alert is this aged testator, so active to give effect to this instrument, that, although his hands were paralized in a manner that nearly prevented him from signing, he goes through the much nicer and more operose process of melting the wax, &c., in order to sealing it; with as little of apparent difficulty as there could be of actual occasion. This surely, again, is a little improbable.

This witness, Mr. John Saph, deposes to "having made one or two drafts before he finished the will as for execution;" but he says that "when he had completed it, he destroyed, as well the said drafts, as the instructions so taken from the deceased as aforesaid." Hence it appears that neither these drafts, nor the original instructions, are forthcoming, either to support the truth of his account, or, as the case may be, to detect its falsehood. This asserted destruction of these documents, to say the least of it, supposing the narrative to be true, was a most incautious act—their non-production, under the suspicious circumstances of this case, adds very much to that suspicion. Upon the whole I dismiss the foregoing account with this brief general remark—it does not set out in a manner which creates an impression in favour of the narrator; or that bespeaks a favorable construction for any passages of doubtful import that may subsequently be found contained in it.

I now proceed to consider a passage in this witness's deposition, which the Court has the opportunity of comparing with that of another witness in the cause—I mean that somewhat remarkable one as to the original suggestion of this deponent and [193] the two other Saphs for attesting witnesses to the will. Mr. John Saph's account is to this effect:

Having stated his production of this will to the deceased about three days after taking instructions for it, and that the deceased approved of and affixed his seal to it, in the manner upon which I have already observed, he goes on to depose that "the deceased then told the deponent that his brother and sister, Robert Saph and Jane Saph, should be two of the witnesses to his will; and that when they were both at home together, and at leisure, he would execute his will." He further says that, "Being with the deceased on the evening of the 3d of June, the deceased told him, if his aforesaid brother and sister would be at home, at breakfast time, the following morning, to bring them with him, and he would then execute his will." Now, how does this narrative tally with the evidence of another witness, a Mr. James Gilbert? Previous to considering which, it may be as well, however, to state who Mr. James Gilbert is; and the general tenor and effect of his evidence in the present cause.

Mr. James Gilbert is the cousin and intimate associate of Mr. John Saph, to whose failings he does not seem (as might, indeed, be expected) very clear sighted. In answer to the 10th interrogatory, he positively swears that "John Saph is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a person of good character, credit, and reputation." This is deposing somewhat boldly, considering his necessarily intimate acquaintance with the character, and past conduct, of the person as to whom the interrogatory was put. In answer to the 11th interrogatory, he speaks to some "ill treatment" of Mr. John Saph, [194] at Calne, where he went to see him; but he does not say a syllable as to any actual or imputed misbehaviour during his residence there. Again, in answer to the 12th interrogatory, he had said that "in 1818 Mr. John Saph kept a school in Salt Lane [Salisbury], and continued to keep it till the deceased's death; he thinks he has left off keeping it about a twelvemonth; during the greater part of that time he has been living with the respondent at his house." Now the deposition of this witness was not finished at one sitting—it broke off at the end of the 13th interrogatory. On the following day, after answering the 22d interrogatory, he desires to amend his answer to the 12th interrogatory (as to his cousin John Saph's occupation, &c. during the last three years), by adding thereto that "he, Mr. John Saph, had, within the last three years, and particularly within the last twelvemonth, repeatedly been visiting at the respondent's mother at Stapleford; and that he had also, within that period, been paying his addresses, in the way of courtship, to a young lady at Ringwood, &c." Being asked by the examiner whether, subsequent to leaving him on the preceding evening, he, the witness, had seen Mr. John Saph, he replied that, "having a dangerous road to pass, John Saph accompanied him home, he, the respondent, being on horseback, and John Saph on foot; and that they had returned, in the same manner, nearly half-way to Salisbury from Stapleford, a distance of seven miles, that morning; but the respondent declares that, in obedience to the strict injunction of the examiner not to say one word respecting this cause to any person whomsoever, he had not said one word to John Saph, nor [195] John Saph to the respondent, in any way or manner. What he now adds to his deposition is the consequence of his own reflections." All this may, possibly, be very true and sincere; but the general complexion of this witness's deposition (which I have considered with much attention) by no means disposes me to think that it actually is so.

It is said, and very truly, that in vivâ voce examinations, the Court and jury have the benefit of seeing the witness, and of collecting, from his manner and deportment, whether the substance of his evidence be true or false. This advantage is denied to our mode of examining witnesses; but then it has others, with which examinations of witnesses in open Court, vivâ voce, are not attended. It affords us an opportunity of considering, maturely, the story which the witness has told, deliberately—of balancing the parts of that story one with another, so as to form an adequate opinion of its probability or improbability—finally, of inspecting its general tone and character—which last to those, the habit of whose life it is to consider written testimony, may ordinarily furnish as accurate a test of the forwardness or shyness of a witness, of his proneness to add or suppress, and the like, as his manner and deportment could do if the witness himself were examined in open Court—where, it may be added, very erroneous impressions of these are, sometimes at least, liable to be formed, from the mere embarrassment of witnesses, of a certain character, under that course of examination. All this, independent of the benefit of deliberately [196] weighing and comparing the stories told by different witnesses. But to proceed.

Mr. James Gilbert deposes, on the 8th article of the allegation, that, "Being one day in Salisbury after he had gone to reside at Clarendon, and in the latter end of 1814, or the beginning of 1815, John Saph came to the deponent, and asked him if he would be a witness to Mr. Harcourt's will? that Mr. Harcourt had sent him to ask—the deponent replied that he would—a day was fixed, and the deponent attended; and, together with the said John Saph, saw the said William Harcourt execute his will in the parlour of his, the said deceased's, house in Church Street—he does not recollect that any other person was present; the deponent understood that Mr. Wilmot, of Salisbury, the solicitor, had made such will."

Now is the above statement, relative to this witness attesting a former will of the deceased, one upon which the Court can depend? There is no trace of any such former will in any part of this cause; neither John Saph nor Mr. Wilmot, whom the witness understood to be the drawer of such will, make any mention of it; nothing about it even is suggested in the interrogatories. The transaction itself is most improbable. If this "former will" had been prepared by Mr. Wilmot, how came he not to attest it himself, as he had the deceased's other wills, and the will of his wife, which he had also prepared? Again, the deceased had real estate; so that it is most improbable that he should have executed a will in the presence of any two only, much more of these two, witnesses. Lastly, John Saph had absconded from Mr. Winch's in April 1814, and was [197] at Calne at the specified period of this transaction, namely, the latter end of 1814, or beginning of 1815. All these circumstances taken together render this statement, I confess, somewhat incredible in my opinion. It has strongly the semblance at least of a pure fabrication; as by way of laying a ground, and to account, for other particulars in his evidence, which he might think in want of something of the kind to introduce, or usher them in.

This witness goes on to state that, "Subsequent to the execution of that will [that is, of the will which he so states himself to have attested, as above], and prior to the time when Mr. John Saph applied to the deponent to witness another will, the time more particularly he cannot recollect, the deceased complained of Mr. Wilmot to the deponent." He said that "he had made him pay a large bill for making his will; that he should never make another for him, or do any other business. The deceased told the deponent that he could get a will made for a guinea. The deponent said that he could get a will made for nothing; any body could make a will for him."

Now, here again, with respect to these declarations against Mr. Wilmot, are they genuine, or are they mere inventions to lay a ground for the deceased's alleged employment in this behalf of Mr. John Saph? They have much more the appearance of the latter than of the former, in my apprehension of them. In the first place, this witness takes a wide range as to time; only fixing them as having been made sometime between 1814 or 1815, and 1819. The probability should seem that, if made at all, they were made soon after the transaction of the former will, i.e. in 1814 or 1815; that being [198] the will, of course, I presume, with Mr. Wilmot's charge for preparing which, it is meant to be inferred that the deceased expressed himself so highly dissatisfied. In the course of three or four years that dissatisfaction would, probably, have worn off; and the circumstance itself would, probably, have been forgotten. But unless these declarations are fixed as having been made subsequent to October, 1818, they prove nothing; if made, the deceased departed from them in his employment of Mr. Wilmot to draw up the two successive wills of June and October, 1818. He departed from them, indeed, at any rate; for it is in evidence that Mr. Wilmot was professionally employed by the deceased in August, 1819; subsequent, that is, by three months to the date of this will propounded by Mrs. Saph.

This witness, Mr. John Gilbert, further says, that "one day, just before the deceased executed the will in question in this cause, John Saph came to the deponent at Clarendon, and informed him that Mr. Harcourt wished him to come and be a witness to his will, which the said John Saph told the deponent he, the said John Saph, was making for him. The deponent told him that if it was a market day he should have no objection; and added, that there was no occasion for him to come down, that his, the said John Saph's, brother and sister would do as well; any body would do for witnesses; or to that effect. The deponent asked the said John Saph what was in the will; but he said that he had promised Mr. Harcourt not to tell; and he did not."

Here, at length, then, we arrive at a part of this witness's evidence, directly at variance with, and contradictory of, and that in no more unimportant [199] particular, the evidence of his cousin and fellow-witness Mr. John Saph. In the first place we have seen that, according to the evidence of the latter witness, this notion of procuring Robert and Jane Saph to attest his will originated with, and proceeded solely from, the deceased; without being proposed to him by the witness, or any other, and without the deceased himself, as in the first instance, designing Mr. Gilbert or any other person to that office. The witness Gilbert, on the contrary, represents this as having been recommended by him, and as having proceeded from his suggestion. But whatever may be said of this inconsistency, secondly, the evidence of the witness Gilbert as to the message, &c. from the deceased, upon this head, is utterly irreconcileable with Mr. John Saph's parallel evidence by any process that I can apply to it. Is it possible that, if this person had really gone over to Clarendon with any such message as that spoken to by Gilbert, at the express desire of the deceased, the circumstance itself, and every thing connected with it, could wholly have escaped his memory? But not a syllable respecting it occurs in his deposition, though taken eight months before that of Gilbert. Not a word is said about "witnesses," according to his statement, till the will is drawn up and sealed; and then the deceased himself proposes his brother Robert and his sister Jane, and never adverts to any other.

Now which of these two witnesses the Court is to believe, or whether either are credible, is not very material. It is quite sufficient that Mr. John Saph's evidence not only is not confirmed, but is invalidated by Gilbert's contrary evidence. Nor [200] does this last witness's deposition, as contended, necessarily connect the deceased with the execution of this instrument. The passage relied on as having that effect being that which immediately follows the one just recited, is in these words, "The deceased, when the deponent next saw him, a week or two after, or perhaps longer, observed to the deponent, 'You did not come,' alluding, as the deponent believes, to the deponent's not having attended to witness his will." Now, as to this passage confirming the truth of the transaction, or amounting to a recognition of this instrument by the deceased, it does nothing of the sort, even admitting it to be genuine. All that it makes the deceased say to Gilbert is, "You did not come;" that might as well have been said if Saph, or any other, had told the deceased that Gilbert was coming over to Salisbury, and would dine, or drink tea, with him, or would see him for any other purpose, or upon any other business. But, in the next place, I have strong doubts whether the deceased said any thing of the sort, or whether the whole matter of this last passage is not a mere after-thought between these two witnesses. I suppose it an after-thought, because the circumstance deposed to is wholly extra articulate; there being no such circumstance pleaded. And although, where little or no intercourse subsists between a witness and a party, a circumstance sometimes comes out in evidence with greater effect, from its not having been stated in plea; still, in the present case, considering the intimate connection between this witness and the Saphs, and considering that he is vouched in the article to the having been applied to as a witness —his not having been vouched to, at [201] the same time, nor the plea averring, this supposed recognition of that application, strongly inclines me to suspect the whole of it to be, what I have already termed it, a mere matter of after-thought between these two persons.

I have only one other observation to make upon the evidence of Mr. John Saph: it results from a comparison of his narrative, not with that of any other witness, but with the instrument itself. He says (in substance) that, "In three days after the instructions were taken [namely, on the 27th or 28th of May] the will was finished, and submitted to the deceased, who read, &c. and affixed his seal to it, as already stated, when the instrument was left in his possession ready to be executed; but no time of execution was proposed." He further says that, "Being with the deceased on the evening of the 3d of June, the deceased told him, he would execute it next morning." Until the evening then of the 3d of June it should seem from this statement that the execution was neither fixed nor even proposed for the fourth; but this statement the instrument itself contradicts, and is at variance with; for upon the closest inspection of the instrument, I can perceive no trace of a blank having been left for the date, and of the date having been subsequently supplied: the whole instrument appears to have been written uno contextu; and the date to have been inserted at the time when the body of the instrument was written.

This circumstance, coupled with the others already noticed, is decisive, in my judgment, and prevents me from placing any sort of reliance upon the truth of the narrative contained in the deposition of this [202] witness, Mr. John Saph, or upon the reality, so far as it depends solely upon that narrative, of the transaction itself.

It is argued, however, that if Mr. John Saph is discredited, there are still two other unimpeached witnesses to the fact of execution, upon whose testimony the Court is bound to rely, even if it is under the necessity of rejecting his. But here, in the first place, it is observable, that it is not merely the general credit of this witness that is impeached, but the truth of his particular narrative. The very foundation, consequently, of the whole transaction is shaken; a circumstance, this, which affects the credit of all the witnesses. In respect to these other two Saphs, again, although it is true that their general characters are not liable to the same objections that apply to that of Mr. John Saph, yet they are equally biassed witnesses in this particular transaction, as having the same expectant, if not direct, benefit. They are also equally, or nearly to the same extent, implicated in this fraud, if it be one; and to the penal consequences of failing to sustain it, they are all three liable in common. And not only are they biassed and implicated witnesses, but there is a "suppressio veri" in the deposition of one at least of the two (on a point not immediately connected with the factum of this instrument), which, independent of other considerations, by no means tends to create a favorable impression, on my mind, of the credit due to them.

It is in evidence that this young woman Jane Saph actually resided with her brother at Calne. Now, whether he behaved ill, or whether he was used ill there, as Gilbert represents, she must have known that he went to Calne upon quitting Mr. [203] Winch's, where he set up as a maltster; and that he got into disputes, and was under difficulties at Calne. She must also have perfectly known the circumstances under which he left Mr. Winch's. Yet in answer to the fourth and fifth interrogatories she deposes that "she does not know whether her fellow-witness and brother John Saph left Mr. Winch's service voluntarily, or whether he was discharged therefrom; neither does she know upon what account it was if he was so discharged. She does not recollect into what trade or business he went after leaving Mr. Winch's employ, nor where he immediately afterwards lived; that he has been, occasionally, absent from home, but not for long together; that she has never known her said brother to be involved in debt, nor insolvent, &c. &c." This, I repeat, is a suppressio veri, upon a collateral point, by no means creditable to the witness. Nor am I at all satisfied that the brother Robert is wholly clear of the same imputation. He was examined in August, 1820, and then stated himself to have been seventeen years old in the December preceding; he was, therefore, between eleven and twelve when his brother was discharged from Mr. Winch's service in April, 1814. He, however, professes the same utter ignorance of all the circumstances attending that discharge as the last witness; an ignorance which I can hardly suppose to be real, considering his age at the time; and that the whole family have been residing together, at Salisbury, nearly ever since. So much for the general credit due to these witnesses; and now for the particular credit due to their account of the transaction in dispute.

[204] In proportion as these two witnesses have been less connected with that transaction than the witness whose narrative of it has been already examined, the means of the Court to ascertain the truth, or to detect the falsehood of their narratives, are obviously abridged. One or two observations, however, occur, as upon the face of the account given by these two witnesses of the act of the execution.

The counsel for Mrs. Saph have argued much for the genuineness of the transaction, and consequently of the instrument under review, from the three witnesses concurring strictly in their account of the manner in which this instrument was executed by the deceased. The truth of the premises I am ready to assent to; in the propriety of their inference I am not disposed, unreservedly, to acquiesce. Concurrence up to a certain extent most unquestionably evinces truth and sincerity; but the instant that it savours of preconcert, it operates the other way. Now these witnesses concur in stating one circumstance at least, to an extent that savours strongly of preconcert in my judgment. They all depose that the deceased read over the will apparently to himself, or, as one of the witnesses expresses it, mentally, and then executed it, sheet by sheet; that is, that he so perused and then signed the first sheet, which the witnesses attested by their initials; and so of the remainder; repeating this cumbrous and operose process (no very likely circumstance in itself) four times; the instrument consisting of as many sheets. Now that all the three witnesses should not only remember this circumstance, but should remember to specify it with the particularity which they all do, in their respective [205] depositions, does savour strongly of preconcert, considering who these witnesses are, and how they are connected together. The mode of executing the instrument (sheet by sheet) is, I have already said, no very usual or likely one for the deceased to have adopted. It is, too, I may further observe, not very probable that the deceased, an old man of eighty, should have perused the will at all, mentally or otherwise, at the instant of execution. The deceased himself had given instructions for it, which, when taken, were read over to and approved by him. The will itself, when drawn up, was also read over first to and then by the deceased, at the time of his affixing his seal to it. The deceased had the intermediate possession of it from that time to the time of execution; an interval of at least three days. All this according to the evidence of Mr. John Saph. That the deceased, under these circumstances, should have perused this instrument as they describe him to have done, in the presence of these three witnesses, whom he must have kept waiting, accordingly, during the operation—one of the three, a young apprentice, pressed into this service of attesting the will during an interval in which he had merely stept home for his breakfast—is a little unlikely.

I am not aware that the depositions of these two witnesses suggest any further material observation, nor am I willing to press against them, to any thing of a harsh extent, the one or two remarks which they have actually suggested. It will be quite sufficient to observe that the testimony of these two witnesses—so biassed—so implicated—so not devoid of suspicion upon the face of their testimony—by [206] no means furnishes the evidence of their fellow-witness, Mr. John Saph, with that sort of corroboration of which it stands in absolute need in my judgment: and, in conclusion, I may safely dismiss the evidence upon the condidit with this general remark: It is very far from satisfying the moral conviction of the Court against all the probabilities which have been already stated, that this, really and truly, was the deceased's own act.

Before actually dismissing it, however, it may be requisite that the Court should redeem its promise of saying a word as to the purported legacy of the "bank stock" to Ann Saph, apparent on the face of this instrument.

The deceased Mr. Harcourt, jointly with his wife during her life, was a holder of bank stock, which, as long back as 1790, had amounted to 594l. stock, and which had increased by bonuses to 742l. 10s. stock, producing, as at 10 per cent., an annual income of 74l. 5s. The dividends were received by Messrs. Hoares, of London, and carried to the credit of Mr. Atkinson; who accounted for the amount from time to time to the deceased. Out of this same bank stock he had given, by the wills of 1818, "so much as would produce 60l. per ann." to a purpose, and "the remainder" in a manner already stated. This third will, however, purports to bequeath "800l. bank stock" (worth nearly 2000l. and more by 57l. 10s. of that stock than the testator had to bequeath) to Miss Ann Saph, and "the remainder," specifically, to the mother Mrs. Saph. Why, here again is a circumstance utterly inconsistent with any notion of this instrument being the deceased's act; but easily reconcileable with the [207] supposition of its being a fabrication of these Saphs, which it is admitted that it must be, if it be not the act of the deceased. The deceased, who, of course, was fully acquainted with the nature and properties of bank stock, could not but have discovered this obvious blunder whilst repeatedly perusing, first the written instructions, and then the will itself, as already observed; granting even that he might have committed it, by saying, as deposed to by Mr. John Saph, that he should give his sister Ann "800l. bank stock," and "the remainder" to his mother, in the first instance. But there is no improbability in the commission of this blunder by the Saphs; they may well be supposed ignorant of the rate of interest payable on bank stock; and as it appeared by the former will that the deceased had more than sufficient bank stock to produce 60l. per ann. (which itself at 5 per cent., the standard rate of interest, would require 1200l.), they might very naturally conceive that the deceased's interest in that fund was quite sufficient to cover these several bequests of "800l. bank stock," and "a remainder."

An attempt, however, a last attempt, has been made to support the credit and character of this instrument, by what are technically called "recognitions;" that is, by declarations or acts of the alleged testator referring to this instrument. Previous acts or declarations, as of dissatisfaction with his former will or the like, there are none, excepting the declarations spoken to singly by Mr. John Saph; which, for reasons that need not be repeated, are entitled to no sort of consideration from the Court. But still clear and distinct subsequent recognitions of this will, proved as clearly and distinctly by [208] witnesses above exception and suspicion, might alter the whole complexion of this case, and carry irresistible conviction to the mind of the Court that the paper set up in it is, what it asserts itself to be, the deceased's will. It is material therefore to consider, both who the witnesses are that speak to them, and what the asserted recognitions themselves amount to.

Two witnesses only (besides Mr. James Gilbert, the supposed recognition, contained in whose deposition, I have already said, giving it credit, amounts to nothing) have been relied on in this respect—a Mrs. Betsy Bursey and a Mrs. Elizabeth Gilbert.

Bursey, by business a dress-maker, at Lymington, is the intimate friend of Mrs. Saph, whom she confesses to have "assisted her memory" in some things relative to which she has been subsequently examined; she has been active too in collecting testimony in the cause. Now I do not mean to say that these are circumstances which would at all induce the Court not to take this person's oath to a mere matter of fact; but they are circumstances which do induce the Court to listen to her with some degree of suspicion when she is brought to speak to expressions said to have been used by the deceased several years before—expressions liable to misapprehension, possibly insincere, and certainly not unlikely to be distorted and exaggerated in the deposition of a witness, whose scanty memory, in respect of them, is admitted to have been eked out by that (or the invention) of Mrs. Saph. The declarations too, themselves, when accurately considered, amount to little or nothing; they are either equivocal or immaterial; and by no means directly [209] come up to what I am bound in law to consider distinct recognitions of this will.

Mrs. Gilbert's evidence is of still less weight. She is the sister of Mrs. Saph, and the mother of the witness James Gilbert, whose evidence has already undergone the investigation of the Court. Her deposition is open in its outset to the same remark which was applied to that of her son; that of bearing a strong internal character. For instance, speaking of her nephew, John Saph, she says that "he misapplied some of his master's money, which she considers a mere frolic of youth; she believes him to be a good young man." Such is her moral estimate of the transaction at Winch's and of her nephew's general conduct and character. Again—her examination broke off at five o'clock upon a Monday, and she was appointed to attend the examiner at seven o'clock on the same evening. Instead of this, however, she does not in fact so attend again until the Wednesday evening following, at the same hour, by reason, as pretended at least, of indisposition; and then, after forty-eight hours, "recollection," as she terms it, she desires to amend her deposition, as taken by the examiner, upon the second article of her sister's allegation. Now that deposition, as already taken, was pretty minute as to favors conferred by the deceased upon her sister Mrs. Saph; but, after an interval of two days (admitted by her to have been spent at the Saphs, in the company of both mother and son, though she, too, protests to the examiner that not a syllable was exchanged between them on the subject of the suit, after that interval I say) for "recollection," she comes out with a long story, wholly extra articulate, [210] of Mrs. Saph having shewn her about Christmas, 1818, three notes of hand (as she calls them), given to her by the deceased; the one for 100l.; the other for 30l. odd; and the third for 25l. She says that after this (consequently in 1819) she heard the deceased Mr. Harcourt say that a very unpleasant thing had happened to him, relative to a Mrs. Alie (to whom he had left 10l. by his will) appearing to be entitled to some houses and land under the will of his late wife, which he (Mr. Harcourt), conceiving them to belong to him, had sold; but the value of which he was now obliged to refund to this Mrs. Alie. And she adds that, sometime after this again, her sister Mrs. Saph told her that Mr. Harcourt had taken back the three notes, amounting together to 150l. odd; and had given her one note for 450l., which note she then produced, and shewed to the witness.

The account furnished by the witness John Saph, relative as it should appear to this same note of hand for 450l. is as follows:—In answer to an interrogatory suggesting him to have said that, "Even if the will would not stand, still that his mother had the deceased's note of hand for a considerable sum," this witness, after, in the first place, denying the use of that or any similar expression, goes on to state that "the only note of hand he ever knew of, as given by the deceased to his mother, the producent, is one for 450l., which was given, as the deceased told the respondent, for what he owed to the producent, and for a sum of money lent to him by the respondent's sister, Ann Saph, who was just come of age, to enable him to pay the relations of his deceased wife some money, which the deceased [211] had, inadvertently, and conceiving it to be his own, applied to his own use." He says that "he, at the desire of the deceased, drew such note, which was to secure both his mother and his sister, as he now best recollects, in the latter part of 1818; that he has seen it once since in his mother's possession; but whether before or since the deceased's death he cannot recollect."

He further answers that "if the same is now in existence, he does not know in whose care, custody, power, or control, it is."

Now it appears from the above, and by the names "Alie" and "Heyley" (which are nearly idem sonantia, especially vulgarly pronounced), that the transaction to which these witnesses would, some how or other, refer this matter of the "notes of hand," is the identical transaction deposed to by Mr. Fletcher Wilmot, in speaking of the deceased having altered his will of June, 1818, by that of October in the same year, as already stated, in consequence of his displeasure at the conduct of a Mrs. "Heyley," a legatee in the former will, in making some claims upon him as under the will of his deceased wife. But he deposes to the deceased's having borrowed money of Mr. Atkinson, and not of these Saphs, to pay Mrs. Heyley's demand; and the transaction itself plainly belongs to the former year 1818, and not to the year 1819, where Mrs. Gilbert's evidence would place it. Not to dwell, however, upon these inconsistencies, this circumstance of the notes, altogether, is one of a very suspicious character. If the transaction itself were fair and genuine, how is it possible that it should not have been brought forward in some shape (for instance, in proof of the intimate connexion between the Saphs [212] and the deceased, and of the obligations which they mutually conferred upon each other) during the long pending of this cause? Mrs. Gilbert's account of it, after an interval of forty-eight hours for "recollection," confessedly spent with the Saphs, by no means either clears up the character of the alleged transaction itself, in my judgment, or impresses me with a favorable opinion (and it is with this view alone that my attention has been directed to it) of the credit due to her testimony in other particulars.

But, lastly, supposing even this witness, Gilbert, entitled to full credit, still the declarations to which she has deposed would leave the case pretty much where they found it. They are of the same character as those spoken to by Bursey, and are open to the same remarks. At all events, they are by no means so forcible as those of a contrary tendency stated by Nash and Randall, witnesses wholly unimpeached; which are directly referential to the will of October, 1818, and are plainly inconsistent with the alleged subsequent will of June, 1819, propounded on Mrs. Saph's part.

Supposing, then, the case to have rested here, the Court would have felt itself bound to pronounce against the instrument propounded; looking, in the first place, to the improbability that it should be, and, secondly, to the insufficiency of the evidence tendered in proof of its being, the deceased's will. Before actually arriving, however, at this conclusion, it is proper that I should notice the evidence which has been introduced into this case, on the direct question of whether the signature is, or is not, in the hand-writing of the deceased.

Evidence as to hand-writing, in questions touching [213] the factum of any instrument, is (or may be) common to both parties. Affirmative, may be produced by the parties setting up the instrument; and negative, by those whose object it is to impeach it. The advantage to be derived from either is, in a great measure, dependant on circumstances. Where neither the character of the transaction, nor the credit of the witnesses, is materially affected; affirmative evidence upon this head is unnecessary; and negative is unavailing: the converse of both these almost necessarily follows where the transaction is suspicious, and where the witnesses are discredited. Such evidence, indeed, either affirmative or negative, is commonly inconclusive for obvious reasons; the former from the exactness with which hand-writing may be imitated; the latter from the dissimilarity which is often discoverable in the hand-writing of the same person, under different circumstances. Still, however, it is admissible evidence in these, as in other Courts; although the assertion that greater weight is attached to it here than in other Courts is by no means correct. On the contrary, the rule here rather inclines to hold that a will cannot be proved by mere evidence to the hand-writing of (without some concomitant circumstance, as the place of finding, or the like to connect it with) the party whose suggested will it is.

In the present case, however, evidence as to the deceased's hand-writing was not merely admissible; but affirmative was actually called for from the parties, that is, who have propounded this instrument, from the circumstance of negative being tendered, by its opponents, in every capable shape. Nor were they unaware of this, as it should seem, [214] from their having pleaded the affirmative; although they have not ventured to produce a single witness to an opinion that the signatures to the asserted will are of the deceased's hand-writing. The first circumstance, therefore, that strikes one on turning to this part of the case is, that the evidence is all upon one side; on that side, too, in favour of which, in the view just taken by the Court, the scale, independent of it, decidedly preponderates.

I have said, and repeat, that negative evidence of this kind was vouched by the parties opposing this instrument in every capable shape. For it was, in substance, pleaded by them, not only 1st, that the subscriptions to this instrument were not those of the deceased in the cause, and were known not to be such by persons who had seen him write, and were acquainted with his manner and character of hand-writing; but it was further pleaded, 2dly, that the said signatures would appear not to be those of the deceased, on a comparison of them with other, his admitted, signatures; 3dly, that they would appear to be of the proper hand-writing of Mr. John Saph; 4thly, that they would appear to be, let who would write them, written in a feigned, and not in a natural, hand.

Now, as to the first of these four special allegations, no witness has been produced who will undertake to swear, from a previous knowledge of the deceased's hand-writing, derived from having seen him write, that the subscriptions to the instrument in question are not those of Mr. Harcourt, the party deceased in the cause. Mr. Wilmot ventures nearest, but does not go the whole length, possibly, as much, from his disinclination—a disinclination which is common to most of us—to depose positively to such [215] a fact, as from any great doubt which he entertains upon the subject. But I am yet to learn that this absence of evidence upon the first of the four is a bar, as asserted, to the reception of any, upon the other three. The assertion has proceeded from an utter misconception, as I take it, of the true meaning of the maxim, that "the best evidence must be given of which the nature of the thing is capable." But the application, at all, of that rule (into the true meaning of which this is not the right place to inquire) to the present case, assumes this position, namely, that the evidence of witnesses acquainted with the supposed writer, and who have acquired a previous knowledge of his hand-writing from seeing him write, is the best proof of hand-writing—a position to which, if laid down universally, and without limitation, I am not disposed to accede. It may, or may not, be the best, according to the means and extent of the witness's information, who deposes, one way or the other, from such previous knowledge; may be the best, that is, where these are ample; and may be very far from it, where these are scanty, or abridged. Suppose the case of two persons who have written for years at the same desk; the evidence of one of these to the other's hand-writing, from his previous knowledge of it so derived, may, for aught that I know, be the best evidence which the nature of the thing admits. But suppose the case of two persons, one of whom has seen the other write only a few words, or only once, or many years ago—will it be said that the evidence of that one to the hand-writing of the other, from his previous knowledge of it, so derived (which still, be it observed, is that of a witness deposing to [216] the party's hand-writing from a previous knowledge of it, acquired by having seen him write), is the best evidence? is better (for instance) than persons of competent skill and experience could furnish, after comparing the signature (for instance) in dispute, with ten or twenty admitted signatures of the same party, made about the same time, and under not dissimilar circumstances? The proposition can hardly, I think, be seriously maintained. All evidence as to the hand-writing of any party is the mere statement of an opinion formed by the witness, on comparing a writing said to be his, with some standard; and to say that the mere having seen that party write, furnishes, under all circumstances, and universally, the best standard would, in my judgment, be absurd. I not only conceive, therefore, that the maxim of law which has been invoked into this part of the case has been misunderstood in the attempted application of it; but I deny the universality, at least, of the position which has been assumed, in the first instance, in order to its being invoked into the case at all.

Evidence, therefore, upon these last three heads being clearly admissible, notwithstanding the absence, or failure, of evidence upon the first, is any other valid reason assignable for its exclusion? I am aware of none. Evidence of this description has always been received in these Courts (see Beaumont v. Perkins, 1 Phillimore, 78). In the cases of Revett v. Braham (4 T. R. 497), and The King v. Cator and Others (4 Espinasse, N. P. C. 117), it has also been admitted in other Courts; and although under the special cir-[217]-cumstances of a late case, that of Gurney v. Longlands (5 Barnewall & Alderson, 130), the Court of King's Bench did refuse a new trial when applied for on the ground that the Judge at Nisi Prius in that case had rejected such evidence, I cannot deem that refusal decisive against its general admissibility, at least in these Courts.

Such evidence being, then, upon the whole, admissible in this case, it remains only to see to what it actually amounts.

It is impossible that evidence of this sort can be stronger, or amount to more. The witnesses who have been examined, in proof of these special averments, have given it as their opinion, quasi uno ore, 1st, that the subscriptions to the will propounded are not of the hand-writing of the deceased; a number of whose genuine signatures were submitted to them, at the time of their examination, for the purpose of being compared with those in dispute; 2dly, that they are written in a feigned and not in a natural hand; 3dly, that they are of the proper hand-writing of Mr. John Saph.

The persons who speak to these several particulars (b) are persons of skill, persons whose profession, I may almost say that, it is to examine hand-writing critically in order to the detection of forgery. In cases where witnesses of this description entertain different opinions they may so neutralize each other that their evidence, as taken alto-[218]-gether, is good for nothing. But that is not the case here. These witnesses all give their opinion as to each of these several particulars; some indeed with greater and some with less confidence, but they all give it one way. As to one particular, namely, as to these signatures being in a feigned and not in a natural hand, they all speak, without the slightest hesitation, and with the fullest confidence. They say that, acting with all caution, where they entertain any doubts, they either state those doubts, or decline giving an opinion altogether. Here, as to this particular, they neither state any doubts, nor are backward in drawing their conclusions—conclusions in which, in substance, they all agree.

There certainly is a very considerable likeness, to a common observer, between the deceased's alleged signatures to the will propounded and his admitted signature to the prior will of October, 1818; from which last, by the way, the first of the two, if not those of the deceased himself, most probably were copied. At the same time there is one feature of dissimilarity which, as it is noticed by all the witnesses, the Court will briefly advert to—I mean the dissimilitude between the final "t's" in the deceased's name of "Harcourt," in the genuine and disputed subscriptions. In every admitted signature the "t" is made without carrying the pen back behind the perpendicular line, and then crossing it. In every disputed one it is made by carrying back the pen behind the down stroke, and then crossing it, with a loop. This, in itself, is a strong circumstance of the kind, and will appear more so when I add, that in every admitted signature, of which there are several, of the deceased's name by Mr. John [219] Saph, the final "t" in Harcourt is made in the same way in which it is in the disputed signatures to the alleged will.

Upon the whole, I am bound to pronounce that the party setting up this will has failed to establish its authenticity; and I think that I am also bound, as well in justice to the other party, as by way of general example, under all the circumstances of this case, to condemn her in the costs of the present suit.

TROWER AND SMEDLEY v. COX. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1822.—The attornies of an executrix having withdrawn from the suit, after propounding an alleged will, and suffered a next of kin to take administration, held, under the circumstances, not to bar that executrix from calling upon the next of kin to bring in the administration, and re-propounding the alleged will.

This was a cause or business of citing Frances Charlotte Cox, wife of Robert Albion Cox, to bring into, and leave in, the registry of this Court, letters of administration (with the last will and testament annexed, bearing date the 5th day of February, 1794) of the goods of Francis Newman, deceased, thentofore committed and granted to her, as the natural and lawful daughter of the said deceased; and to shew cause why the same should not be revoked, and declared null and void, as unduly obtained; and why letters of administration (with the last will and testament annexed, bearing date the 26th day of September, 1817, with two codicils annexed) of the goods of the said deceased should not be committed and granted to Robert Trower and Francis Smedley, as the lawful attornies of Elizabeth Hannah Friers, otherwise Elizabeth Newman, the sole executrix, and [220] residuary legatee during her single life, named in the said will.

(b) The witnesses examined upon these allegations were Joseph Hume, Esq., Inspector of Franks at the General Post Office; Mr. John Richard Taylor, Inspector of Franks at the General Post Office; and Mr. William Henry Nelson, a clerk in the Power of Attorney Office at the Bank of England.

An appearance was given for the party cited, under protest; and an act on petition was entered into.

In this act it was (in substance) alleged for the party cited that "Francis Newman died in the month of March, 1818, having first made and executed his last will, bearing date 5th February, 1794; and thereof appointed certain executors, all of whom, with the exception of James Meddowcroft, died in the testator's life-time; and having, in and by his said will, given and bequeathed the residue of his estate and effects to his reputed son, Elizabeth Francis George Newman, who also died in the testator's life-time; whereby such bequest of the residue became lapsed: that in the month of February, 1820, a citation issued under seal of this Court, at the instance of Frances Charlotte Cox, the natural and lawful daughter of the deceased, against James Meddowcroft, the surviving executor, to bring in, and take probate of, the said will; otherwise, to shew cause why administration, with the said will annexed, should not be committed and granted to the party proceeding: that the executor appeared to that decree, and brought in the will, but declined taking probate; whereupon the usual steps were had, and letters of administration, with the said will annexed, were about to be decreed to the said Frances Charlotte Cox, to wit, on the 3rd of May, 1820, when a proctor intervened for Robert Trower and Francis Smedley, as attornies of Elizabeth Hannah Friers, otherwise Newman, alleging her to be sole executrix of the last will and testament of [221] the said Francis Newman, bearing date the 26th of September, 1817, with two codicils: that, upon this intervention, the cause assumed a regular shape, and was proceeded in by the said attornies on behalf of their principal, up to giving in an allegation propounding the said last will and codicils; when, on the caveat day after Trinity Term, to wit, on the 5th of September, 1820, the proctor for the said attornies declared that he proceeded no further in the said cause—upon which letters of administration with the will of February, 1794, annexed were decreed to the said Frances Charlotte Cox, and passed the seal, accordingly, on the 12th day of the said month." And it was submitted for the party cited "that the said Robert Trower, and Francis Smedley, under the circumstances above set forth, were not entitled again to set up the said pretended will of the said Francis Newman, bearing date the 26th day of September, 1817, as his true last will and testament; and, consequently, that she was not bound to appear, absolutely, to the citation taken out in the cause."

To this it was replied, on the behalf of the parties proceeding, that "Robert Trower and Francis Smedley (the said parties) who had been previously concerned as solicitors for Francis Newman, the party deceased in the cause, having received from America an official copy of the last will of the deceased, bearing date the 26th of September, 1817, and the said codicils bearing date on the 30th of September, in the said year, on or about the 28th day of December, 1818, they gave intimation thereof to Robert Albion Cox, the husband of the said Frances Charlotte Cox, the [222] daughter of the said deceased, and furnished him with a copy thereof: that, on the 3rd day of February following, they forwarded to America a special power of attorney, to be executed by the executrix named in the said will, authorizing them to prove the same, and also to proceed in a chancery suit, wherein the deceased had been plaintiff, they having been previously concerned for the said deceased in such suit: that, in the month of March following, they received a power of attorney, duly executed by the said executrix, fully authorizing them to act in her behalf in respect of the said will, but, otherwise, varying from the power of attorney sent out as aforesaid, and containing clauses objectionable to the said Robert Trower and Francis Smedley, as with respect to the conduct of the said chancery suit: that the said Trower and Smedley thereupon wrote to the said executors, stating to her that they should decline acting under the said power of attorney, and urging her to send over a new power of attorney, in the form previously forwarded to her; and further intimating that, in the mean time, should it be necessary, they would produce the said will and codicils, and leave it to be dealt with at the discretion of this Court, until such power of attorney, without the said objectionable clauses, was received by them: that, shortly after, the proceedings hereinbefore mentioned, to obtain a representation to the said deceased, having come to the knowledge of the said Trower and Smedley, they did intervene and act in the said proceedings, as stated on behalf of the party cited; fully expecting the receipt of a satisfactory power of attorney in the course, and during [223] the pending, thereof; but that having repeatedly addressed letters to the said executrix, requesting the transmission of the said power of attorney, which produced no reply; and having been repeatedly and solemnly assured, by the said Robert Albion Cox, that he could prove the said will and codicils to be a forgery, and that he should oppose the same in every way; and having no funds in hand to defray the expenses of the suit; they did authorize a proctor to declare that they proceeded no further, as aforesaid: that the said Trower and Smedley, however, have since received a satisfactory power of attorney, as well as divers letters from the said executrix, expressive of her anxious wishes that they should proceed in proof of the will of September, 1817, in her behalf; in consequence whereof they instructed a proctor to procure the decree or citation in this cause to issue: that, subsequent to the return of the said decree, they have received a further letter from their said principal, stating that Elizabeth Francis George Newman, to whom the residue of the deceased's estate was bequeathed by the will of February, 1794, and who was alleged, and sworn, by the said Frances Charlotte Cox, to have died in the said deceased's life-time, is now living, and is one of the legatees named in the will of 1817, by the names of Francis Newman only: lastly, that the amount of property of the deceased expected to be realized under a grant of administration is 8000l., although the goods of the deceased, in order to the former grant, were stated and sworn not to amount to 100l." Under these circumstances, it was submitted that the Court would over-rule the protest, and direct an absolute appearance.

[224] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Frances Charlotte Cox (heretofore Newman), the party cited in this cause, is the natural and lawful daughter of Francis Newman, deceased; and, as such, is administratrix of the deceased, with a will annexed, dated in February, 1794, and executed in this country. The deceased afterwards went to America, where he died in March, 1818, leaving there a wife, or rather a female with whom he had cohabited as a wife; and a numerous family, consisting of four sons and three daughters.

In the month of February, 1820, a citation issued under seal of this Court, against Mr. Meadowcroft, the sole surviving executor of the will of February, 1794, at the instance of Frances Charlotte Cox, asserting herself to be interested in the lapsed residue of the deceased's estate given by that will to his reputed son, whom she alleged to have died in the testator's life-time. The sole object of that proceeding was, that the party instituting it might obtain letters of administration of the deceased's effects, with the will of 1794 annexed, in the event of the executor declining to take probate; and it had no reference whatever, ostensibly at least, in its origin, to any subsequent will of the deceased. In the course of that proceeding, however, Messrs. Trower and Smedley (parties in the present suit) intervened, as attornies for Elizabeth Hannah Friers, otherwise Newman, asserting her to be the sole executrix of a subsequent will of the deceased, dated in September, 1817, and prayed letters of administration with this subsequent will annexed, to be granted to them in her behalf. After pro-[225]-pounding this latter will, however, and giving an allegation, they withdrew from the suit in which they had so intervened, declaring they "proceeded no further;" upon which letters of administration, with the will of 1794 annexed, were decreed to Mrs. Cox without opposition, in common form. The question is whether the executrix is so barred, by her attornies having withdrawn from the former proceeding in the manner which I have described, as not to be entitled to call upon Mrs. Cox, to the effect of the present decree.

Now, under the circumstances stated in this act on petition, on the one side, and on the other, I am not disposed to hold that the party proceeding is so barred, or that the party cited is exonerated from the obligation of an absolute appearance. The suit here, in 1820, was commenced against the executor of the prior will, and not against the executrix of the alleged subsequent one; nor involved any call upon her to set up the validity of that instrument. It is true, indeed, that she intervened in the suit, and propounded that instrument for herself, by her attornies; and that letters of administration, with the one will annexed, were decreed to Mrs. Cox, only upon their declining to proceed to proof, in solemn form of law, of the other. But it must be remembered, at the same time, that there has still been no sentence, either for, or against, the validity of either will; and, although, in ordinary cases, where the parties being present, declare they proceed no further, or duly authorize a practitioner to take that step for them, the Court, as far as it legally can, will hold them bound; yet, it would be unjust, and inequitable, not to make great allowance in this [226] respect for a case, circumstanced as the present is, for a variety of reasons. For here, in the first place, the party principal is abroad—is resident in a foreign and distant country—a circumstance which, alone, would induce the Court to distinguish this from an ordinary case. But, secondly, and principally, on what grounds did Messrs. Trower and Smedley proceed in withdrawing from the former suit? Was it under any special authority to that effect, communicated to them (under any misapprehension even) by their principal? No such thing. It proceeded, as they allege and depose, upon quite different grounds. Upon the insufficiency of their funds—upon their unwillingness to act under their power of attorney (now rectified in that respect), but which, it seems, then contained some obnoxious clauses—and, lastly, upon the "repeated and solemn" assurances of Mr. Cox, the husband of the party proceeding (somewhat too hastily, perhaps, confided in, on their parts), that "he could prove the will and codicils" of which their principal asserted herself the executrix, "to be a forgery." Now the attornies declining to act, or being deterred from proceeding, under these circumstances, is not so binding, in my judgment, upon their principal as at all to exclude, even her, from re-propounding the alleged last will under the process now taken out.

But the question, in substance and effect, which the Court has to determine, goes a great deal further, being, not whether the act of the attornies shall be binding, to this extent, upon their principal merely, but also whether it shall be binding, and to a similar extent, upon all the parties interested in the bequests of this will. For, unless the Court should [227] determine to have this effect, as well as the former, it would be of little avail to relieve Mrs. Cox from the obligation of appearing to this decree. But that it has, or can have, the effect of barring the other parties entitled under it from putting in suit the validity of the will—several of the parties so entitled, and among them, the substituted universal legatee, being minors; all of them being resident abroad; and none of them having been cited in the course of the prior proceeding, either in form or in fact—is, I apprehend, a proposition that can hardly be seriously contended for. The asserted will of 1817 has every appearance of authenticity, as far as I can judge by inspection of the mere copy; it is certified by the register of Maryland; it was proved, recently after the death of the deceased, not merely on the oath of the executrix, but on the oaths (which it is the custom to require there, for the purpose of the probate) of the subscribed witnesses; there are two codicils of a subsequent date to that of the will; and the instrument has every internal evidence of genuineness, which can be furnished by the character of the dispositions contained in it. Still, however, it may be a forgery, as Mr. Cox suggests. I would be understood only to mean that it looks authentic, primâ facie. Now that the Court should set aside all this; and should decree this whole property (taken, originally, as under 100*l.*; but which, it seems, may eventually be 8000*l.*(a)) to Mrs. Cox, [228] away from the legatees, merely because the attornies of the executrix, under special circumstances, withdrew from the former suit, would be a departure from all those principles upon which this Court is in the habit of proceeding, in determining these and similar cases.

But, superadded to this, there is a circumstance disclosed in the act, which gives double weight and effect to the considerations on which I have previously insisted, and which does not leave, in my mind, a shadow of doubt, as to the propriety of directing an absolute appearance. The residuary legatee in the deceased's will of February, 1794, was a reputed son, described in the will as "Elizabeth Francis George Newman;" and it was solely upon her allegation of his death in the testator's life-time that letters of administration were granted to Mrs. Cox at all; she taking no benefit whatever

(a) It was said, in explanation, that the amount of the effects was dependant upon the issue of a suit in Chancery; and that if it turned out to be greater than the sum administered to, it was the intention of the administratrix to amend the administration in that respect, as directed by the stamp act.

under the will, but in that event. It is now alleged, however, that this reputed son not only survived the deceased, but is still living; and is a legatee under the will about to be propounded, under the description of "Francis Newman" only. Why, if this be so, Mrs. Cox's administration is clearly voidable: and she, while in possession of it, is a mere trustee for the benefit of the residuary legatee under the former will; independant of any consideration of the validity of the alleged latter testament. It is true that the fact of this reputed son having survived the father rests in allegation only; but it is to be remembered that so also does that other fact of his death in the father's life-time. For I take Mrs. Cox's affidavit, which states that event only in general terms, and without any specification of time [229] or place, as proof only of her information, and of course, of her belief, of that event, and not as proof, strictly speaking, of that event itself.

Upon the whole, though Mrs. Cox is entitled to be reimbursed for any expence to which she may have been put in taking out these letters of administration; yet I am clearly of opinion that the executrix, and the parties benefited under the alleged latter will, are not barred by any thing that has hitherto occurred from putting it in suit; and, consequently, I over-rule this protest, and direct an absolute appearance.

EVANS v. KNIGHT AND MOORE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—Probate in common form of certain "instructions" as containing the last will of the deceased, granted on a special affidavit. That probate called in, eight years after, and the executors put on proof of the will in solemn form of law. This step held to have been taken by the next of kin upon insufficient grounds—the instructions pronounced for—and the next of kin condemned in costs from the time of giving in their allegation.

[For former proceedings see 3 Phill. 413; and see p. 138, ante. Followed, Beale v. Beale, 1874, L. R. 3 P. & D. 179. Distinguished, Leigh v. Green, [1892] P. 17.]

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The party deceased in this cause is John Moore, who died on the 24th April, 1812. He had formerly been in service as a gentleman's coachman; but afterwards took a wine and liquor shop at the corner of Goodge Street, in Tottenham Court Road, where he died.

The deceased, while in service, had two natural children, by different mothers; the one, a daughter, Betty White, of whom I shall have occasion to speak presently; the other, a son, John Moore, who was in the naval service, and whose death has occurred subsequent to that of the deceased in this cause. He does not appear to have cohabited with either of these women.

[230] In 1803 the deceased paid his addresses to a young woman named Mary Hewitt, then living with her parents in Oxfordshire; and shortly after he came to London, wrote to Hewitt to come up, as for the purpose of being married to him. With this request she complied; and they were supposed to have been married accordingly. Whether a marriage in fact, however, and still more, whether a legal marriage, was had between the parties is extremely doubtful; at all events, no legal marriage can be proved; and the presumption is strongly that none such was had. But from that period to the death of the deceased they cohabited as man and wife; acknowledged each other as such; and were universally so reputed. The issue of this connexion were three children, of whom two, a son and a daughter, survived the deceased, and, indeed, are still living. The deceased invariably treated them with the greatest love and affection; and constantly acknowledged them as his lawful issue.

The deceased, who, by the assistance of his reputed wife, appears to have been successful in business, purchased, in the year 1807, a house in Tottenham Court Road, held on lease for a term of which more than ninety years were then unexpired; and which is stated in the answers to be let for 165l. per annum. In 1809 he purchased a piece of ground in Alfred Place, on a similar lease, and built a house, No. 30, stated also, in the answers, to be let for 63l. per annum. In 1811 he purchased ground in Upper Gower Street, upon which he was building two houses at the time of his death: they have since been completed, and are proved to let, as above, at 195l. 12s. per annum. It is in evidence [231] from the witnesses on both sides that the deceased made frequent declarations of the manner in which he meant to dispose of these houses. He frequently declared his intention to give the house in Tottenham Court Road to his widow; the house in Alfred Place to his daughter Jane; and the houses in Upper Gower Street to his son Richard, an infant of two years old at the time of his father's decease.

About a fortnight before the deceased's death he caught a violent cold, while standing about in the wet to purchase timber for his new buildings. This produced an inflammatory affection of the chest and lungs, technically called "peripneumony," under which the deceased was evidently labouring for several days before his death; and which terminated his life on Friday, the 24th of April. No apprehension whatever of the result appears to have been entertained until the Monday preceding, when a physician, Dr. Outram, was called in for the first time; rather, it should seem, to satisfy some doubts entertained by Mrs. Moore (or Hewitt) as to whether the deceased were getting better than from any thing in the nature of actual alarm that he was getting rapidly worse. It is alleged that the deceased on that day sent for a professional gentleman to make his will, who attended accordingly, but not till the afternoon of the following day, being Tuesday, the 21st of April; when it is also alleged that he took from the deceased instructions for his will. The purport of these instructions is to dispose of the leasehold houses in the manner which I have already stated in stating the deceased's declared intentions with respect to the disposal of them. They further provide that the expence of finishing the [232] houses in Gower Street shall be defrayed from the deceased's personalty; the residue of which shall "be for the use and benefit of his children;" and they appoint the deceased's "wife, Mary Moore" (so termed in the instructions), his brother, Richard Moore, and a friend, Mr. Joseph Knight, his executors. From these instructions, which are alleged to have been signed by the deceased (who also inserted the date), and attested by the solicitor, a will was actually drawn up, which the deceased, however, was prevented by death from executing.

Probate of the instructions so taken, as containing the last will of the deceased, was granted in common form upon a special affidavit of the solicitor, and of Mr. Hewitt who was present at the giving of the instructions, to the subscription and date being in the hand-writing of the deceased; and to the several circumstances in support of them, of which the above may be considered a general outline. It was granted to all three executors; and the deceased's property, sworn not to amount in value to 10,000l., was administered under that probate for eight years. But in the year 1820 that probate is called in, upon a suggestion that the deceased was incapable, from delirium, at the time when the instructions, as pretended, were taken, of which it was had; and the executors are then, for the first time, put on proof of the will in solemn form of law.

This is the history of the case; and, under the circumstances stated, the presumption is strongly in favour of the will. The burthen of proving incapacity rests with the parties setting it up; especially at this distance of time. It is said, indeed, that these parties had no interest in the question of the [233] deceased's testacy or intestacy, until their discovery (stated to have been made for the first time, it does not appear by what means, in the year 1820) of the nature of his connexion with Hewitt; being ignorant, till then, of the relation in which they stood to the deceased of his legal next of kin. This will justify them, I admit, for not proceeding sooner; if it shall appear, in the end, that they have sufficient grounds for proceeding at all. It is a circumstance, however, which disposes of one only of the numerous difficulties attending the case set up, as in opposition to the will. On the other hand, I observe that one of the next of kin, now impugning the instructions, is the very brother who took probate of them; and swore, consequently, to his belief of their containing the deceased's will. I must presume, therefore, that this brother had no intimation, at that time, that the deceased was incapable when the instructions were taken. Yet he says, in his answers, that "he saw the deceased two or three times every day, from the time of his being taken ill till his death." It is also in evidence that he had a daughter resident with the deceased through the whole period of his illness; a daughter, too, now deposing to the deceased's incapacity pretty unreservedly. Under these circumstances, had the fact been such, how is this brother's ignorance of it at that time, which I must presume, to be, even probably, accounted for?

It should seem, indeed, as if the next of kin were fully apprized of these difficulties; for the suit has been conducted, on their part, with extraordinary activity. No pains have been spared to procure evidence against the will; every legal means, at least, [234] has been resorted to, to exclude such as might tend to support it. The medical gentlemen who attended the deceased are twice had to the solicitor's chambers, and interrogated as to their opinion of his capacity; and this eight years after his death.

Dr. Outram is apprized by one of the relatives, whom he was professionally attending, a twelvemonth before his examination, what was contemplated, in consequence of their discovering that the deceased was not married to Hewitt—namely, "the setting aside the deceased's will, which, they said, had been made while the deceased was delirious." This sort of, all but, tampering with witnesses frequently communicates a bias; and renders the Court a little jealous as to mere matters of opinion deposed to from recollection, especially after a long interval, by witnesses, however respectable, upon whom it has been practised. Again, if the witness Smith is to be believed, applications were made in another quarter, of a still less warrantable description. He deposes to having been present with Edward Manwaring when a Mr. Barker, the solicitor for the next of kin, "was extremely urgent with him, the said Edward Manwaring, to call upon him, and told him, in deponent's presence and hearing, that he was sorry the other party had got him first—that Mr. Roberts could not find out his direction—that if they could have got him first they would have managed to keep him out of the way at all events, and so to have weakened their opponent's case. Mr. Barker then asked Manwaring if the signature to the will was of the deceased's hand-writing; to which Manwaring replied that it was; and that no power on earth should induce him to say otherwise. And he [235] said further, that Roberts knew it as well as he, Manwaring, did. Subsequent to this, several letters came from Mr. Barker to induce Manwaring to go to him; and Manwaring begged that he might be refused, if Mr. Barker should call; and he requested of the deponent to go to Mr. Barker and tell him that he, Manwaring, would not come to him." In justice to the professional gentleman employed for the next of kin the Court abstains from giving full credence to this account; as the matter of the charge coming out upon interrogatories to Smith, a witness, upon the allegation given in support of the character of Manwaring, no opportunity has been afforded him of explaining or denying it. Lastly, four of the seven witnesses produced to the testator's incapacity are on the very verge of incompetency, as being the children of parties entitled in distribution; and, consequently, as having a derivative interest in setting aside the will. As to the exclusion of evidence tendered by the other party, witness the double attack on Manwaring (vide page 138, ante) on his general character and his particular evidence; arising, too, out of transactions very remote in point of date and quite unconnected with the subject of the suit. Witness, too, the objection to the competency of Hannah Roberts,(b) on the score of an interest in [236] the event of the suit, acquired long subsequent to the death of the testator; so that her evidence in favour of the will,

(b) Hannah Roberts, wife of John Roberts, was produced and examined on the part of the executors. Subsequent to her evidence being taken, an allegation was given for the next of kin, pleading that the paper-writing propounded, purported to contain amongst other things a bequest in the following words:—"I give unto my dear wife, Mary Moore, my house, No. 19 Tottenham Court Road, in the county of Middlesex, for the remainder of the term therein: that after the death of the deceased (to wit) in August, 1818, Mary Moore (or Hewitt, so calling herself), by virtue of a certain indenture or deed of gift, assigned or set over the said house and premises, No. 219 Tottenham Court Road, for the remainder of the term then to come and unexpired therein, and all her right, title, and interest therein, under and by virtue of the said bequest, to certain persons, in trust for her use and benefit, during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease for the use and benefit of her children, as therein mentioned: and from and after the respective deaths of her children, then to and for the absolute use and benefit of Hannah Roberts (formerly Hewitt, she being Mrs. Moore's (or Hewitt's) sister) or her assigns." Consequently that she, the said Hannah Roberts, had, at the time of her examination, a contingent interest in the said house and premises; by reason of which she was an incompetent witness, as having an interest in the event of the cause.

This allegation was admitted without opposition on the part of the executors. Upon the evidence, however, there was no proof whatever that the witness had any knowledge of the deed pleaded against her at the time of her examination; on the contrary, there was every reason to believe that she was then wholly ignorant of it. But the proofs of this last not being quite satisfactory, and the counsel for the executors not pressing for its reception, the evidence of Hannah Roberts, under the circumstances, was taken as rejected now (in a manner) rejected by the Court, would have been unexceptionable, had the question of its validity been gone into, recenti facto. Witness, again, the objections urged to the affidavit of Mr. Moore, the solicitor who prepared the will, being introduced into the cause (vide note (a), page 251, post). All which I would be understood to signify by these observations is that if parties choose to contest [237] wills under such circumstances, and by such means, they must be content to do it at their own peril.

Such, then, is the general character of this proceeding; and the question for the Court's determination is whether these pretended instructions were fraudulently obtained from the deceased while in a state of delirium and incapacity. I apprehend there is no medium: it is not resolvable into a case of erroneous impressions as to the state of the deceased, on the part of those privy to and connected with the transaction. The adverse case, indeed, set up is that the transaction, throughout, was bottomed in fraud and has been sustained by perjury. It even appears that suggestions have been thrown out of forgery, as if the date and signature to the will were not, as alleged, of the hand-writing of the deceased. This was suggested to Manwaring, as appears by the answers of Smith to the 3d interrogatory in part recited above; and is also suggested in the answers of the parties to the allegation propounding the will. And the witness, Hewitt, deposes to having been shewn a letter from a nephew of the deceased to Mrs. Browne (formerly Moore or Hewitt), in which he asserted "that the deceased's pretended will was a forgery; that she, Browne, and Hewitt had perjured themselves; and that if they knew no better, he would teach them."

The circumstances of this case hardly require, perhaps, a preliminary statement—that where mental aberration is proved to have shewn itself in the alleged testator, the degree of evidence necessary to substantiate any testamentary act depends greatly on the character of the act itself. If it purports to give effect only to probable intentions, its validity [238] may be established by comparatively slight evidence. But evidence, very different in kind and much weightier in degree, is requisite to the support of an act which purports to contain dispositions contrary to the testator's probable intentions, or savouring, in any degree, of folly or phrensy.

What, then, are the features, and what is the character, of the testamentary act set up in the present case? It is precisely such a disposition as natural affection would dictate. The testator bequeaths by it his whole property, in equitable proportions, to his wife and children. If, in truth, the mother of these children were not his lawful wife, this rather increases than repels the presumption in favour of the act. In addition to natural affection, it rendered some measure of the sort absolutely incumbent on the deceased in point of moral duty; as his intestacy in that case would have left this mother and her children wholly destitute and unprovided for. But the conformity of these bequests with the deceased's probable intentions does not rest upon their accordancy with natural affection and moral duty merely; they are conformable with the deceased's constant and repeated declarations, spoken to by both sets of witnesses, as to the disposition of the major part of his property, that consisting of the leasehold houses. There is no evidence, indeed, of any precise declarations of the deceased as to his intentions with respect to the residue; but to whom was it probable that this should be bequeathed but to his children?

Now the presumptions in favour of a will of this description are strong, and it is capable of being supported, according to what I have already observed, on comparatively slight evidence. What the [239] evidence tendered in support of this instrument actually is shall be considered presently. I shall first, however, proceed to state and examine the proofs adduced of the testator's alleged general incapacity at and about the time when the instructions were taken.

Experience in this Court teaches us that evidence upon questions of capacity is almost always contradictory. The obvious grounds of conflicting evidence upon these questions are that evidence of capacity is, commonly, evidence of opinion merely; that of the witnesses, no two, possibly, have seen the party whose state is deposed to at precisely the same time and under precisely the same circumstances; and that each again of the several witnesses, however numerous, measures, possibly, testamentary capacity by his own particular standard. These sources of discrepancy, and many more might be enumerated, are common to all cases of this description. In the present case, however, there is an additional source, namely, the remoteness of the transaction to which the witnesses are called to depose—a circumstance sufficient, in itself, to account for a no inconsiderable degree of contrariety of evidence, even where the witnesses have to speak to facts merely, and not to opinions formed and inferences built upon facts, of which most of the evidence commonly furnished on questions of capacity, as already observed, is made up. If the Court, therefore, on questions of capacity generally is accustomed to rely but little on such evidence, so far as it is that of mere opinion; but to form its own judgment from the facts and the conduct of the parties at the time; it becomes it to do so, more peculiarly, in the present instance, where much of the evidence [240] not merely consists of opinions, but of opinions delivered long subsequently to the transactions which they profess to have suggested them—upon loose recollections, too, and in some instances after repeated discussions of the subject-matter with interested parties.

The witnesses examined in support of the deceased's incapacity on the day when the instructions were taken are three nieces and a nephew of the deceased, Betty White, his natural daughter, and Doctors Outram and Pearson. Of these, the deposition of White, the fifth witness, must be taken with some abatement of the credit which might otherwise be due to it; she having died before she had been repeated or examined upon the interrogatories of the adverse parties.(a) [241] Now of these nieces and the nephew, and White, the natural daughter, it is extremely difficult to reconcile the evidence, even taking into the account all the grounds of discrepancy which I have just stated. Some of them say that the deceased was so violent as to be obliged to be held; others represent him as tranquil and quiescent, which last is the character ascribed to his disorder by Dr. Pearson. Some fix the commencement of his delirium on the Monday or earlier; one, indeed, as early as a fortnight before his death; others observed no symptoms of wandering till the Tuesday, and then only slight ones. All agree, however, that the deceased's delirium was not continuous but intermittent; that he was not at once plunged into a state of derangement from which he never recovered, but that this was slight at first, and grew worse latterly, pari passu with the disorder that produced it. And this, I apprehend, is the natural course of the thing where delirium is not the primary disorder—where the seat of that is the chest or stomach, and the head is only affected collaterally.

In estimating, however, the general result of this evidence, the utmost length which the Court could go would be to hold that some degree of wandering had began occasionally to shew itself in the deceased as early as the night of the 20th or the morning of the 21st. But this evidence, even as fortified by that of Dr. Outram and Dr. Pearson, by no means excludes proof of capacity; or renders it in the slightest degree improbable that the deceased should have been in the perfect possession of his intellects for a sufficient interval to perform the testamentary act now under discussion. Dr. Outram only [242] speaks to "restlessness and excitement" on the 21st, and an "evident aberration of mind:" he expressly deposes "that the deceased was not in a state of total derangement;" and that, in spite of "a marked confusion of intellect," he could answer questions put him sensibly and rationally. Is there any thing in all this, I may ask, which negatives the probability that the deceased might not merely answer questions sensibly and rationally, but possess full testamentary capacity (a) Betty White, the deceased's natural daughter, was produced and examined in chief on the allegation given in behalf of the next of kin. The examiner reduced her deposition into writing, and afterwards read the same over to her, and she declared the same to be true; but did not sign it. The examiner, being unable to proceed at that time, desired her to attend on a subsequent day. Previous to this, however, the witness was seized with a sudden and violent illness which occasioned her death in two or three days, before her deposition was signed, and before she had been repeated or examined on the interrogatories of the adverse party. These facts were pleaded in an allegation offered for the purpose of inducing the Court to receive her deposition so in part taken; and being proved by the depositions of five witnesses (one of whom was the examiner) it was received accordingly, with some deductions, however, from the credit due to it, as stated in the text, proceeding on the supposition that the cross-examination might have discredited the witness. See Hill v. Bulkeley, 1 Phillimore, 280. The deposition of the witness in that case was one step nearer completion, as being actually signed; the single material point in which it differed from the deposition of White in the present case.

for the period which this transaction would occupy? The length of time during which a patient in this state continues rational, when roused from torpor or delirium, commonly depends on the degree of excitement and the degree of interest by which he is roused: and the same patient who instantly relapses after answering, rationally, the common-place queries of a servant or medical attendant, into wandering or delusion, may be stimulated, by any matter of great interest, into the active exertion of a much greater portion of intellect for a much greater length of time.

Upon the evidence of these witnesses I shall only further observe that there are certain admitted facts in the case which are hardly consistent with what must have been the opinion of those about him at the time, if the deceased's state and condition on the 20th and 21st had really been such as they now describe it. Dr. Outram is not called in till the 20th; and then, as it should seem, from no great alarm entertained on their parts. The witness, John Roberts, deposes "that the deceased was ill about a fortnight before his death, as he the deponent best recollects: he was for some time attended by Mr. Thomas, a surgeon, who said he was getting better; but the said Mary Hewitt, [243] who lived with the deceased as his wife, thinking Mr. Thomas not altogether right about it, sent the deponent to make some inquiries, &c.;" which, in short, terminated in the introduction of Dr. Outram. The deponent "was not present when Dr. Outram saw the deceased: he was then in a small parlour behind the bar." Hewitt deposes to having gone, on the morning of that day, to Camden Town, "to take a lodging for the deceased to be removed to; but when he returned, after engaging a room, Dr. Outram, whose first visit had been paid in this interval, said that he could not be removed before Friday, when he would determine about it." It is not till Thursday night, I observe, that Dr. Pearson is called in to consultation; and this, and the merely postponing the deceased's removal, satisfies my mind that Dr. Outram did not, at the time, think him in that imminent danger on the 20th which he now conceives himself to have thought him in at his first visit. Dr. Outram expressly deposes that "the persons about the deceased had very erroneous notions upon the subject, having no adequate idea, if any apprehension at all, of the danger he was in." This could hardly have been had the deceased's state at that time been such as the witnesses upon the part of the next of kin would now represent it. Dr. Pearson did not see the deceased till the evening of the 23d, when he was in extremis, having actually died on the 24th. His evidence proves no fact; and his state and condition on the evening of the 23d, the day preceding his decease, furnishes, to my apprehension, very imperfect grounds for an opinion even of what it was, especially in point of mental capacity, in the afternoon of the 21st.

[244] To the evidence of these witnesses, with the exception of Doctors Pearson and Outram, as to the deceased's capacity, so far as it goes to mere opinion, the Court is disposed, for reasons already stated, to pay but little respect. But the mere opinions of professional men of eminence can, by no means, be passed over with similar inattention.

Now Dr. Outram certainly deposes that "when he saw the deceased on the 21st day of April, the deceased was not in his, the deponent's, opinion in a state of sound mind, memory, and understanding, or capable of doing any act requiring the exercise of thought, judgment, and reflection." The length of Dr. Outram's visit on that day, I should observe, did not exceed "a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes;" and whether his incapacity during, and through, the whole day, is a matter of fair inference from his incapacity, admitting him, for argument's sake, to have been incapable during that small portion of it, may, under the circumstances, be justly doubted. Dr. Outram's opinion, however, is, to some extent, that of Dr. Pearson, who says, "That he cannot depose to the state of the deceased on the 21st day of April aforesaid; for the deponent did not see him at all on that day. But the deponent saith that the deceased's complaint did not appear to be of that acute peripneumonic nature which sometimes attacks persons in good health suddenly; but it appeared to be of that kind which had been preceded by inflammation: and it would be out of the ordinary course of that complaint, and so much so as to make it extremely improbable, that the deceased should have been free from wandering and mental affection on a day so shortly before the de-[245]-ponent saw him, as the 21st day of that month, the deponent having seen him on the 23d. The deponent considers it to be highly improbable that the deceased should have been of sound mind on the 21st day of April aforesaid." To the opinions of these gentlemen, had they been examined recenti facto, the Court must have deferred very considerably, though opinions merely; but it is by no means disposed to place the same confidence in them, delivered eight years subsequent to the facts upon which they are founded. Dr. Outram, indeed, speaks from "memoranda" opposite the deceased's name in his "book;" but he does not tell us how these memoranda were made, whether the symptoms of each day were noted upon that day, or whether the whole was put down together, as it might have been, after the deceased's death, in support, possibly, of his hypothesis (with which the Court does not presume to interfere) relative to the nature of his patient's disorder, which the result confirmed.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the whole of this evidence, I mean the evidence of these nieces and the nephew taken in conjunction with that of Doctors Pearson and Outram, not only does not exclude proof of testamentary capacity when these instructions were taken; but that it does not even oppose any thing in the shape of antecedent incredibility to the evidence of such capacity at that time, which may be furnished by the other party.

What then, on the other hand, are the direct proofs of capacity in the deceased when these instructions were taken; and what are the inferences in support of those proofs, fairly deducible from the facts of the cause and the conduct of the parties at the time?

[246] In the first place, then, it is admitted that the person sent for to make the deceased's will (whether at the suggestion of Dr. Outram or not is not very material) was Mr. Moore, a solicitor well acquainted with the deceased, and long employed by him in that capacity. It is admitted, too, that his services were invoked as for that express purpose; and without, as it appears, any shadow of clandestinity. How utterly inconsistent is this with the case now set up against these parties. Was this the probable conduct of parties meditating fraudulently to obtain a pretended will from an incapable testator? Hewitt or some other of those privy to the fraud would, in that case, have been the drawer of the will; and this gentleman, of whose character I shall presently speak, was the last person to be sent for upon such an occasion.

Lloyd, an old and very intimate friend of the deceased, deposes that, "Having called to see the deceased in the afternoon of the Tuesday next immediately preceding the day of his decease, he was desired to walk up stairs, which he did, into a small bed-chamber, where he believes the said deceased usually slept—that to the best of his present recollection there were two women in the room, one of whom was Mrs. Cutmore." He says that "he inquired of the said deceased how he was, who, he thinks, replied 'Not worse.' That soon after Mrs. Moore came up; and the deponent, whispering, asked her if Mr. Moore had made his will? To which she replied, No; and then added, 'But he is going to make it to day.' Shortly after which she requested the deponent to assist the deceased into the next room, whereupon the deceased and the de-[247]-ponent proceeded up a few stairs, the deponent putting his hand under one of the deceased's arms in going up stairs. Not long after, Mrs. Moore joined them, and Mr. Richard Hewitt came in. In a short time afterwards a gentleman, at that time unknown to the deponent, but whom he understood before he left the house to be a Mr. James Moore (the solicitor), came into the room. After inquiring of the deceased how his health was, he said, 'You want to make your will;' to which the deceased replied, 'I do.' That pen, ink, and paper were then procured, and a table placed for Mr. James Moore, when the deponent, considering that it was proper for him to withdraw, took his leave."

Why this evidence (especially coupled with the res gesta) outweighs all the loose evidence of delirium given by the adverse witnesses, and proves capacity equal to the act done, up to the very instant of its being entered upon. He speaks to the perfect capacity of the deceased, in his opinion; and adds that the deceased was very weak and unwell, but, he believes, had no thought of dying. He also saw the deceased on the following day, the Wednesday, and speaks to his perfect capacity, in his opinion, at that time.

But the evidence of Hewitt is much more decisive, and, indeed, proves the whole case. Unless the Court imputes to this witness the grossest perjury, all doubt on the subject is removed. It is not from his opinion, but from the facts to which he speaks, that the Court is warranted in drawing this conclusion. It is true that he is the brother of Mrs. Moore (or Hewitt), and, as such, a biassed witness; but he has no interest whatever in the issue of the [248] suit, either present or expectant; and I see nothing in the character of his evidence that has the slightest tendency to discredit him. He, too, as well as the rest of the world, believed that his sister was lawfully married to the deceased; and, so believing, could have no inducement to join in obtaining this will as for the advancement of her interest; since, if the lawful wife of the deceased, she would have been more benefited under an intestacy.

Hewitt was present when the greater part of the instructions were given. He proves that they originated entirely with the deceased himself; not that Mr. Moore, the solicitor, put leading questions to the deceased, to which he merely assented; but that the deceased dictated the several bequests which the solicitor committed to writing, and read over successively, in the order in which they were delivered, for the deceased's approval, without any suggestion even on his part.

Hewitt was not present at the conclusion of the instructions. The deceased had long been his friend and benefactor; and he deposes that he left the room towards the conclusion of the instructions, overpowered by his feelings at the thought of being then, probably, about to part with that friend and benefactor for ever. He returned, however, soon afterwards, and saw the written instructions lying on the table. He then remarked, he says, "That the deceased had signed the same, and noticed that the name of John was clear, and that there was a blot over the name of Moore, the ink of which was still wet." This witness corroborates Lloyd as to his being present up to the commencement of the transaction, and his quitting the room, from motives [249] of delicacy, upon the arrival of the solicitor, as soon as he understood the nature of the business about to be transacted.

It is quite unnecessary to state the deposition of Hewitt in detail. It will be sufficient to observe that, if he is credible, he proves every thing. He not simply states his own decided opinion of the deceased's capacity, but he deposes to facts, about which he could not be mistaken, from which the Court can go the whole length of drawing that conclusion for itself.

The other evidence which bears directly upon the factum of these instructions is the proof of the death, character, and hand-writing of the solicitor, Mr. Moore. Now it is proved that this gentleman died in the year 1817, at the advanced age of seventy-eight; and the proofs that are furnished to the Court of his highly respectable character are even stronger evidence in favour of the will, in some respects, than his own deposition could have been had he been living and examined in the cause. In that case the Court would only have had the ordinary presumption that he was a person of fair, because of unimpeached, character. But as it is, his character is proved to have been of the first respectability. He was thirty years vestry clerk of the parish of St. Pancras; and was employed as a collector of rents, and in various offices of trust and confidence. He was also, and had for many years been, the deceased's conveyancer, who was a purchaser of leases, and engaged in several building concerns; consequently, he was well acquainted with the deceased; and not liable, therefore, to form an erroneous impression as to the state of his capacity—and that a person of [250] this description should have engaged in the fraud of obtaining these instructions from a testator whom he knew to be in a state of incapacity and delirium is quite incredible. In some respects, however, the legatees under the will may suffer from the loss of his direct evidence: but it is the duty of the Court to protect them from suffering by that loss unduly. He, if living and examined, could doubtless have explained those little variations between the instructions and the instrument drawn up from them (as I shall presently observe)—he could, probably, have also explained how the mistake arose, which has been so much relied upon, about the residence of Knight the executor.(a)

But the Court has further, as bearing upon the validity of these instructions, evidence of the conduct of Mr. Moore, the solicitor, as with relation to them at the time. The instructions being taken as above, and signed by the deceased, and attested by the solicitor, he is in the less hurry to prepare a will for execution—

(a) He was described in the instructions as residing in Southampton Row, Bloomsbury, whereas it was pleaded and proved by the next of kin that he never resided there; but that, "at the time of the date of the instructions, and for several years prior thereto, he had resided in High Holborn, near Gray's Inn, which circumstance was well known to the deceased whilst" (as they pleaded it) "he retained the enjoyment of his mental faculties." How this mistake originated was left unexplained in the cause.

which is confirmatory of the fact of the deceased not having been then considered in imminent danger by those about him. A will, however, is actually prepared; and on the Thursday evening Mr. Moore desires his assistant, Mr. Ker-[251]-sey, to call at the deceased's house on the next morning, and fix a time for its execution. This is deposed to by Mr. Kersey, as also that, in passing the deceased's house on the following morning, he found the shutters closed, from which he conjectured, as the fact was, that the deceased had died in the course of that night. This conduct, therefore, of the solicitor at the time, in drawing up a will, and preparing to wait upon the deceased, in order to attest its execution, is plainly inconsistent with any suspicion on his part that the deceased was incapable at the time of giving the instructions, and is strongly confirmatory of the other and more direct evidence of their validity. I may also observe that Mr. Moore has confirmed this account of the general course of the transaction by the sanction of an oath. This I do without adverting particularly to the contents of his affidavit; (a) but [252] thus much at least being in evidence,

(a) The 12th article of the allegation propounding the instructions on the part of the executors pleaded "that in order to probate of the instructions, as containing the will of the deceased, being granted to the executors, Mr. James Moore was, on the 21st of May, 1812, in conjunction with Mr. Richard Hewitt, duly sworn to an affidavit before a surrogate of the Judge of this (the Prerogative) Court, in the presence of a notary public; and in such affidavit Mr. James Moore made oath that he knew, and was well acquainted with, Mr. John Moore, the deceased, for several years before, and to the time of, his death; and that on the 21st of April, then last past, he attended at the house of the deceased, for the purpose of taking instructions for preparing the will of the deceased, and found him ill and sitting in his bed-chamber; and that from the verbal instructions of the deceased he then drew or wrote the paper writing propounded in this cause, as the will of the deceased; and that when he had finished writing the same, he read the said paper over in an audible manner to the deceased, who approved thereof, and subscribed his name thereto; and that he set and subscribed his name to the said instructions as a witness thereof; and then took the instructions home with him to prepare the deceased's will therefrom; and that the deceased was, at and during the transactions set forth in his affidavit, of sound and disposing mind, and well knew and understood what he said and did." And the next subsequent article of the allegation referred to the affidavit, so made, remaining in the registry, of which a copy was annexed; and pleaded the identity of the parties, and also the hand-writing of the surrogate and notary.

The admission of these articles, and the exhibit was opposed, on the part of the next of kin as a novel attempt to substitute a voluntary, and extrajudicial, affidavit for direct evidence.

Trinity Term, 3d Session, 1820.—Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. If the professional gentleman, who took the instructions propounded, were still living, his affidavit, though made before this Court, and for the purpose of probate, would be clearly inadmissible as evidence in the cause. It would not in that case be the best evidence; and the adverse parties would be unduly deprived, by its being admitted as evidence at all, of the right to cross-examine, which must result to them in the event of his being produced and examined as a witness. But in this case the professional gentleman being dead, it is the best evidence; and if the adverse parties having lost their opportunity of cross-examining, the loss is to be ascribed to their own laches, in not calling for proof of the instructions earlier.* Mr. James Moore is pleaded to have survived the deceased four years. It would be strange if parties interested to defeat a testamentary paper could lay by till the death of the solicitor who prepared it; could then object a defect of proof; and at the same time could object to the solicitor's affidavit (an affidavit made in this Court, and for this very purpose of probate) being received in evidence.

I am not at all therefore disposed to shut out of the cause these articles and this exhibit, in limine—their value will depend much on the general circumstances of the case, as disclosed in the evidence—valeant quantum. At present I admit the articles, namely, that probate of these instructions was obtained upon his [253] affidavit, I must presume that its contents, in general, verified and confirmed the account given by Hewitt and Kersey.

Without, therefore, any more particular reference to this affidavit—without any reference whatever to the evidence of Manwaring, which, to guard itself from prejudice, the Court has not even read—and without invoking the testimony of Betty Roberts, which is also to be taken as rejected—the depositions of Lloyd and Hewitt, and the evidence to the character and conduct of Mr. James Moore, satisfy me that the deceased gave and signed these instructions, and was fully competent to the act—for, upon loose evidence of incapacity, given eight or nine years after the death of the testator (evidence for the most part of mere opinion), to discredit the witnesses, Lloyd and Hewitt, and to some extent, Mr. Moore, [254] and to pronounce the whole matter of these instructions false and fraudulent, would be quite extravagant; the more especially when the dispositive part of them is viewed in connexion with the admitted state of the deceased's affections; with the nature of his relation to this female, with whom he cohabited, as his wife, and her children; and with his often declared intentions relative to the disposition of his property. And as every just presumption, as well as every reasonable probability, was in favour of this will; as it had been acted upon for so many years; and as the parties opposing it had every opportunity of satisfying themselves upon the justice of the case, before commencing the suit; I think that there were no sufficient grounds for calling in the probate; and that their conduct in so doing was unjustifiable. And as these parties have chosen to stand upon their extreme legal rights in calling, at so late a period, for the proof of this will—a will made in exact conformity as well with the deceased's declared intentions, as with his natural affections, and his moral duties, I think that they are liable, at least, to all the costs incurred from the time of giving in their allegation. My only doubt has been, whether in justice they were not liable to the whole costs from the time of calling in the probate.

[255] IN THE GOODS OF HIS LATE MAJESTY KING GEORGE THE THIRD, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1822.—Application to the Court for its process, calling upon his Majesty's proctor to see a testamentary paper of his late Majesty propounded and proved—that application rejected; and upon what principles.

(On motion.)

The case out of which the present question arose was described, in the heading of the act to lead the proposed decree, as "a business of citing Iltid Nicholl, Esq., his Majesty's Procurator-General, for, and on behalf of, our Sovereign Lord the King, as heir and successor of his late Majesty King George the Third, deceased, to see the last will and testament, or testamentary schedule, of his said late Majesty, bearing date the 2d day of June, in the year of our Lord 1774, propounded and proved, in solemn form of law; promoted and brought by her Highness Olive, the natural and lawful daughter of his Royal Highness Henry Frederick, the late Duke of Cumberland, deceased, whilst living, the natural and lawful brother of his said late Majesty, the only legatee named in the said will, and there being no executor, or residuary legatee, named in the same—against the said Iltid Nicholl, Esq., his Majesty's Procurator-General."

On the 1st session of the present (Trinity) term a proctor exhibited, as such, for the party styling herself her Highness Olive, Princess of Cumberland, as above, and alleged—first, that "his late most gracious Majesty, George the Third, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, &c. departed this life on, or about, the leaving it open to the counsel for the next of kin to renew their objections to the affidavit's being relied on, as evidence, at the hearing of the cause; when the Court, being in possession of all the circumstances, will be better able to finally dispose of that question agreeably to the equity of the case.

Articles admitted.

The question thus mooted merged, however, to some extent, at the hearing, by the counsel for the executors not insisting on the affidavit being read. The fact of an affidavit having been made by Mr. James Moore for the purpose of probate was admitted in the cause.

29th of January, 1820, a widower, leaving behind him his eldest son, his then Royal Highness George Augustus Frede-[256]-rick, Prince of Wales, Prince Regent of the United Kingdom, who thereupon succeeded to the throne of this United Kingdom, and became entitled, in right of his Crown, to all and singular the personal estate and effects of his said late Majesty remaining undisposed of"—secondly, that "his said late Majesty, whilst living, made and executed his last will and testament or testamentary schedule in writing, under his royal sign manual, in manner as required by law, bearing date the 2d day of June, 1774; and therein bequeathed the sum of 15,000l. to his niece, Olive, daughter of his said Majesty's brother, his Royal Highness Henry Frederick Duke of Cumberland; but did not of his said will appoint any executor, or dispose of the residue of his personal estate, and effects." In verification of the premises he exhibited the said last will and testament or testamentary schedule, together with certain affidavits. Lastly, he prayed that the Court would, on motion of counsel, "Decree the said Iltid Nicholl, Esq., his Majesty's Procurator-General, to be cited, by the service of a decree in that behalf, to appear on the sixth day after service, if a Court-day, otherwise on the Court-day next and immediately following, to see and hear the said true and original last will and testament, or testamentary schedule, of his said late most gracious Majesty, King George the Third, deceased, bearing date as aforesaid, propounded and proved, in solemn form of law, if he thought it for the interest of our Sovereign Lord the King so to do; and, further, to do and receive, as unto law and justice should appertain, under pain of the law, and contempt thereof, at the promotion of her said [257] Highness Olive, Princess of Cumberland, &c. with the usual intimation," namely, that "the Court would proceed in the said cause or business, the absence, or rather contumacy, of him, the said procurator-general, in anywise notwithstanding."

The alleged testamentary paper itself was in the following terms:—

"George R. "St. James's.

"In case of our royal demise, we give and bequeath to Olive, our brother of Cumberland's daughter, the sum of 15,000l.; commanding our heir and successor to pay the same, privately, to our said niece, for her use; as a recompense for the misfortunes she may have known through her father.

"June 2, 1774. "CHATHAM.

"Witness, J. Dunning. "WARWICK."

The affidavit of third parties in support of the paper went, merely, to the subscriptions, "J. Dunning" and "Warwick," being of the handwriting respectively of the late Lord Ashburton (formerly Mr. Dunning) and of the late Earl of Warwick; as also to the name and letter "George R." at the top of the paper, being the true and proper sign manual of his late Majesty King George the Third. There was no affidavit as to the signature of the late Lord Chatham, but it was sworn that the whole, body, series, and contents of the instrument (save and except the name and letter "George R." and the other subscriptions), as well as the title "Warwick" subscribed, were of the true and proper handwriting of the late Earl of Warwick.

There was also an affidavit from the party her-[258]-self promoting the suit, accounting for the plight and condition of the instrument; and for the manner in which it came into her hands. She deposed that, "In the beginning of the year 1815 his Royal Highness the late Duke of Kent informed the deponent, that George, Earl Brooke, and Earl of Warwick, with whom the deponent had been well acquainted from her infancy, had told him, the said Duke of Kent, that he the said Earl of Warwick wished to communicate to the deponent, some important particulars regarding this deponent's birth, the purport of which he, the said Duke of Kent, at the same time intimated to the deponent, that one evening happening in, or about the month of May in the said year, the Duke of Kent, being at this deponent's house, No. 74 Seymour Place, Bryanstone Square, the said Earl of Warwick also came there; and, in the presence of the said Duke of Kent, after requiring and receiving a most solemn pledge, on the part of the deponent and the said Duke of Kent, not to divulge the purport of the communication he was about to make, until after the death of his then Majesty King George the Third, informed the deponent of her illustrious birth, to wit, that she, the deponent, was and is the natural and lawful daughter of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Cumberland, deceased; and that the proofs thereof had been deposited with the said Earl of Warwick, for the benefit of the deponent, in case she survived his Majesty, by the late Earl of Chatham and the late Dr. Wilmot, under a solemn pledge to preserve them safely, and to keep them secret, until the demise of his said Majesty—and he, the said Earl of Warwick, further informed the depo-[259]-nent, that the several papers and documents were then at Warwick Castle; and that, apprehending his own health to be precarious, he had considered it incumbent on him to place the same in safe custody, that, shortly after the premises, the said Earl of Warwick having, as he informed the deponent, gone to Warwick for the documents, delivered the papers into the deponent's hands; and part of them were so delivered in the Duke of Kent's presence; and, amongst other things, the paper writing annexed, beginning thus: 'George R. St. James's. In case of our royal demise;' and ending thus: 'she may have known through her father,' bearing date 'June 2d, 1774,' and having the name and titles, 'J. Dunning,' 'Chatham,' and 'Warwick,' respectively set and subscribed, as witnesses thereto." The deponent further made oath that the instrument was in the same plight and condition as when so delivered to her. Lastly, she deposed to her belief that the instrument itself so delivered was true and genuine; that the name and letter "George R." was the proper sign manual of his late Majesty King George the Third; that the name and title "J. Dunning" and "Chatham," subscribed, were so subscribed by the late Lord Ashburton (then Mr. Dunning) and the late Earl of Chatham; and that the body of the instrument, together with the date, and the signature "Warwick," were of the proper hand-writing of the late Earl of Warwick.

On the 1st session of this (Trinity) term the Court, upon being moved, as above, ex parte, directed the matter to stand over, on account of the special nature of the application; and that his Ma-[260]-jesty's advocate should, in the mean time, be instructed to shew cause against the issue of the proposed citation. In consequence of this intimation, counsel were heard, on the two succeeding Court days, both in support of, and in opposition to, the issue of the process as prayed; and, on this 4th Session, the Court proceeded to dispose of the application in nearly the following words:—

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an application to the Court for its process, calling upon his Majesty's proctor to see, and hear, an alleged testamentary paper of his late Majesty, propounded and proved. It need hardly be observed that it is not a matter of choice and discretion, but of justice and duty, to grant or refuse that process according as the law shall direct. The Court has received all the assistance that the learning and ability of counsel could furnish in support of the application, as well as in opposition to it; and, after that assistance, the Court has, itself, given the subject all that due consideration which its importance and delicacy appear to require.

The attention of the Court was called, in the course of the argument, to several points—to the right of the Sovereign to make a will—to the form of this particular instrument—to the affidavits exhibited in proof of the hand-writing and history of the paper; and, lastly, to the jurisdiction of the Court to issue the process prayed.

Courts of justice cautiously abstain from deciding more than what the immediate point submitted to their consideration requires. In the present case, several of the points, though properly urged by [261] counsel, would come more regularly for decision in some future stage of the proceeding; if such a proceeding as is prayed can take place.

The right of the Sovereign to dispose of property by will, if doubted, might be ground for the King's proctor's appearance under protest, if this Court should think it could cite him at all. The nature of the instrument, whether testamentary or not, might be formally argued upon the admission of an allegation propounding it in that stage of the proceeding; and its genuineness would be the last, and ultimate, object of the whole proceeding.

Upon these points, therefore, the Court at present expresses no opinion whatever; because, assuming them in the affirmative, and, for the present, taking the several allegations in the act of Court to be true, still the first and immediate question is, whether the Court has jurisdiction to institute this inquiry; to entertain such a proceeding; and, consequently, whether it has a right to form any judicial opinion whatever upon these other points.

His late Majesty (and it is so alleged by the party making the application) "did not appoint any executor, or dispose of the residue of his personal property;" but (and it is also so alleged) "his present Majesty became entitled, in right of his Crown, to all the personal estate and effects of his said late Majesty remaining undisposed of." The paper itself (assuming it to be genuine and testamentary) directs the bequest to be paid "by the heir and successor." This is, therefore, not a question between the asserted legatee and any subject; either as executor, or residuary legatee, or next of kin. No subject [262] is interested in opposing the paper; but it is directly a claim and demand upon the reigning Sovereign.

The process prayed is, consequently, in substance, against the Sovereign; though in form it is described as "a business of citing the King's proctor:" of citing him, however, it is added, "for and on behalf of our Sovereign Lord the King, as heir and successor of his late Majesty."

When the application was first mentioned, the Court asked the learned counsel if any precedents could be furnished; and it did so at that early stage, in order to set all possible enquiry in motion; not, however, expecting or requiring a precedent precisely similar in all its circumstances; but endeavouring to ascertain whether, by diligent research, any proceedings could be found in this Court, or elsewhere, out of which some principle could be extracted, either directly or by way of analogy, furnishing something of legal authority to govern this case.

Now the history of the wills of Sovereigns from Saxon times—from Alfred the Great down to the present day, has been diligently searched and examined; but no instance has been produced of probate having been taken of the will of any deceased Sovereign in these Courts; much less of its having been contested here against the reigning Sovereign. One single instance occurs in the Rolls of Parliament of something of a reference to this jurisdiction in respect of a royal will, which is the instance referred to by Lord Coke (in his 4th Institute (p. 335)) [263] and by other writers. It is, in substance, to this effect: In the 1st of Henry 5, it is stated in the Parliament Rolls, that Henry 4 having made a will, and appointed executors thereof, those executors, fearing the assets would be insufficient, declined to act. It is then recited that, under these circumstances, the effects would be at the disposal of the Archbishop of Canterbury, as ordinary, who should direct them to be sold; but Henry 5, instead of allowing the effects to be sold, took to them, and agreed to pay their appraised value. This is the whole that appears on the Rolls of Parliament: and thence it clearly appears that subjects were the executors—subjects alone were interested in the effects bequeathed: and, lastly, that the successor to the Crown voluntarily took to them, and paid their appraised value. But except this recital in the Parliament Rolls, 400 years ago, when the matter was, probably, neither controverted nor even much considered, not the slightest trace is to be found of any allusion to, much less of any exercise of, this Court's jurisdiction over the wills of departed Sovereigns.

The only will of a Sovereign deposited in the registry of this Court (for wills of Queens Consort are wills of subjects) is the will of King Henry 8; and that, as I understand, is not the original, but merely a copy; and from the appearance of this copy there is no trace of any probate of the will having ever been taken. Whether this document was deposited here for safe custody, and as a place of notoriety for such a purpose, or for what else, does not appear.

[264] The statute of the 24th of Henry 8 (c. 12), however, has been cited, as conferring upon the Court a jurisdiction in this respect. The object of that statute was to prohibit appeals to Rome; and the statute itself serves to shew that the reigning Sovereign, at the period of the Reformation at least, became the supreme head of the Church—the supreme ordinary of the country. But how it tends to establish that he became at that time personally subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of the archbishop, whatever might have been attempted in times of Papal usurpation, is certainly not very obvious.

For the last 300 years, and, indeed, from all antecedent time, there is no instance of any Sovereign taking probate in the Archbishop's Court, or of any Sovereign's will having been proved there. Yet if it be true that by the constitution Sovereigns have always had a right to make wills (and it appears, by the Rolls of Parliament, that in the 16th year of King Richard the Second "the bishops, lords, and commons assented in full Parliament that the King, his heirs and successors, might lawfully make their testaments") (vide 4 Inst. 335); and if it is thence to be presumed that Sovereigns, in many instances, have exercised that right (in which or to what extent, in fact, need not, at present, be inquired, but some instances have been referred to, and one so late as George 1 (vide Annual Register, 1772, page 188)); and if, yet, no instance is to be found of a probate issuing from this Court, nor of any will since the copy of that of Henry 8, [265] being even deposited here; it does furnish pretty decisive evidence, to my judgment, that this Court, in such a case, has no jurisdiction whatever. What might be the case if the will of a deceased Sovereign raised a question merely, and exclusively, between subject and subject, the Court is not, at present, required to decide.

But suppose no royal wills to have been made from Henry the Eighth's time to the present, but that all the intermediate Sovereigns have died intestate, still the inference, in respect to this jurisdiction, is the same. Of the effects of all other persons dying intestate, the ordinary grants administration. Before the statutes of administration, the ordinary granted it to whom he pleased: under the statute of 21 Henry 8 (c. 5) it was to the widow or next of kin: and by the statute of distribution (22 & 23 Charles 2 (c. 10)) that administrator became a trustee to dispose of, and distribute the property in the manner therein prescribed. Of a Sovereign who dies intestate, the successor is exclusively entitled to the personal property; but in order to have legal authority to collect and recover that property, there is no instance of any such successor coming into this Court (as all other persons must do) for letters of administration—for the authority of the ordinary to invest him with the legal character of administrator. Nothing of the sort has ever taken place: and, indeed, it would be against all principle, and contrary to all analogy, that it should. Now the total absence of any exercise of such a jurisdiction by this Court on the death of a Sovereign in cases either of testacy or intestacy is [266] pretty strong evidence, to my mind, that no such a jurisdiction exists.

The testamentary Courts of the two archbishops, in their respective provinces, are styled Prerogative Courts, from the prerogative of each archbishop to grant probates and administrations, where there are bona notabilia; but still these are only inferior and subordinate jurisdictions; and the style of these Courts has no connexion with the royal prerogative. Derivatively, indeed, these Courts are the King's Ecclesiastical Courts; the Sovereign being the fountain of all justice, as well as the supreme head of the Church; yet, immediately, they are only the Courts of the ecclesiastical ordinary. The ordinary, and not the Crown, appoints the Judges of these Courts; they are subject to the restraint and control of the King's Courts of Chancery and Common Law, in case they exceed their jurisdiction; and they are subject, in some instances, to the commands of those Courts, if they decline to exercise their jurisdiction, when by law they ought to exercise it.

That this Court should, therefore, now for the first time presume to entertain a suit for so delicate and high a purpose as that of deciding on the validity of the will of the late Sovereign, under any circumstances, and in any form, would require much consideration in point of law. But this is by no means the only, or the greatest, difficulty which the present application has to surmount.

It is (as has been already stated), in substance, not merely a proceeding to try the validity of the will of his late Majesty, but a proceeding against the reigning Sovereign —a demand upon his Majesty, [267] which is to be enforced, adversely, against him. That a process of the nature prayed could not issue directly against the Sovereign himself seems to be admitted, by praying it, in form, against the King's proctor. It would be quite a novelty in constitutional law to implead the Sovereign personally. These Courts are not presumed to be the best acquainted with the rights and prerogatives of the Crown: in regard to such matters we must look diffidently and respectfully to other authorities; but there seems no principle in the constitution more distinctly laid down by common law writers than that the Sovereign cannot be personally impleaded. Mr. Justice Blackstone, in the first volume of his Commentaries, speaks of the "great and transcendant attributes" which the law ascribes to the King; and first he notices the attribute of sovereignty. "He is said," says the learned commentator (1 Bl. Com. 242, &c.) "to have imperial dignity; and in charters before the Conquest is frequently styled basileus and imperator." "His realm is declared to be an empire, and his Crown imperial, by many acts of parliament, which at the same time declare the King to be the supreme head of the realm in matters both civil and ecclesiastical." "Hence it is," he adds, "that no suit or action can be brought against the King even in civil matters, because no Court can have jurisdiction over him. For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power; authority to try would be vain and idle without authority to redress; and the sentence of a Court would be contemptible, unless that Court had power to command [268] the execution of it; but who, says Finch (Finch, L. 83), shall command the King?"

"Are then, it may be asked, the subjects of England totally destitute of remedy, in case the Crown should invade their rights, either by private injuries, or public oppressions?" To this we may answer that "the law has provided a remedy in both cases."

"And, first, as to private injuries; if any person has in point of property a just demand upon the King, he must petition him in his Court of Chancery, where his chancellor will administer right as a matter of grace, though not upon compulsion."

"Besides the attribute of sovereignty, the law also ascribes to the King, in his political capacity, absolute perfection. The King can do no wrong."

"The King, moreover, is not only incapable of doing wrong, but even of thinking wrong; he can never mean to do an improper thing; in him is no folly or weakness; and, therefore, if the Crown should be inclined to grant any franchise or privilege to a subject contrary to reason, or in anywise prejudicial to the commonwealth or a private person, the law will not suppose the King to have meant either an unwise or injurious action, but declares that the King was deceived in his grant; and thereupon such grant is rendered void, merely upon the foundation of fraud and deception, either by or upon those agents whom the Crown has thought proper to employ; for the law will not cast an imputation on that magistrate whom it trusts with the executive power, as if he was capable of intentionally dis-[269]-regarding his trust, but attributes to mere imposition (to which the most perfect of sublunary beings must still continue liable) those little inadvertencies which, if charged on the will of the prince, might lessen him in the eyes of his subjects."

Again, speaking of the King as the foundation of justice, this author says, "A consequence of his prerogative is the legal ubiquity of the King. His Majesty, in the eye of the law, is always present in all his Courts, though he cannot personally distribute justice." "And from this ubiquity it follows that the King can never be nonsuit; for a nonsuit is a desertion of the suit or action by the non-appearance of the plaintiff in Court. For the same reason also, in the forms of legal proceedings, the King is not said to appear by his attorney as other men do; for, in contemplation of law, he is always present in Court."

Again, in the third volume, speaking more in detail of the modes of proceeding to obtain property from the Sovereign, Mr. Justice Blackstone says (3 Bl. Com. 256, &c.), "The common law methods of obtaining possession or restitution from the Crown of either real or personal property are—1. By petition de droit, or petition of right, which is said to owe its original to Edward the First; 2. By monstrans de droit, manifestation or plea of right; both of which may be preferred or prosecuted either in the Chancery or Exchequer."

This Court is not sufficiently acquainted with the proceedings of other Courts to say whether this mode of proceeding is the proper remedy, if the [270] right here set up exists. All that this Court presumes to decide is whether the remedy can be obtained here in the mode prayed; it is not necessary for me to decide whether any and what remedy can be obtained elsewhere.

Now to proceed by this sort of process against the King himself; to cite him personally; to put him in contempt; to do certain acts in pain of his contumacy—was too extravagant even to be attempted; and therefore the citation is prayed against the King's proctor.

But here, again, exactly the same difficulty occurs, both in principle and practice. Either the King's proctor does or does not represent the Sovereign. If, virtute officii, he represents his Majesty, he has the same privileges; nor can he be put in contempt and proceeded against in pœnam. If he does not officially, quoad hoc, and so as to be binding upon, represent the Sovereign, this process is nugatory. It may be sufficient to add that the King, as has been said, does not appear by his attorney; and that no instance or precedent exists of making the King's proctor a defendant, so as to bind the Sovereign in a matter touching his personal rights. The present King's proctor has, by his warrant of appointment, the same, but no greater, powers given him than those exercised by his predecessors. He is a mere law agent of his Majesty to watch the interests of the Crown, and to assert them, when so directed, either by originating proceedings, or by intervening when suits have been brought by others; but it does not follow that the Court can compel him to be a defendant; can put him in contempt, and proceed in pain of his contumacy. So the King [271] may be a voluntary plaintiff in other Courts; he is the public prosecutor; criminal suits are conducted in his name; and his attorney-general may originate other proceedings. But it clearly does not result, as we have just seen, that because he may be voluntary plaintiff, he can be made a defendant by compulsion in other Courts.

The case of the King's proctor appearing for the Crown, to assert its right to the property of illegitimate persons dying unmarried and intestate, which has been referred to in the argument, is the very opposite of the present. There he asserts a right on the part of the Crown; here he is to be made a defendant to resist a claim set up against it. And even, in that case, the King's proctor cannot proceed, officially, without a warrant under the sign manual, countersigned by three Lords of the Treasury; and then only on behalf of a nominee appointed in that warrant. And this, by the way, is conformable and analogous to what Lord Coke states in his 4th Institute (p. 335), that "when the King is made an executor of the will of another, the King doth appoint certain persons to take execution of the will upon them (against whom such as have cause of suit may bring their action), and appointeth others to take the accounts." But in no case is the King's proctor ex officio competent, much less compellable, to have suits brought against him, and to be impleaded, so as to bind the Sovereign.

The notice served on the King's proctor in cases of proceedings by creditors to obtain an administration where a person is dead, intestate, without [272] known relations, has also been mentioned in the argument. But that is a mere notice, and not at all for the purpose of proceeding in pœnam, so as to bind or affect the right of the Crown. It is quite modern practice, too, very lately directed by the Court ex cautela to guard against surprise and oversight; for, although in law the King's proctor is at all times present in Court, still a notice, in fact, is preferable, lest a creditor, perhaps to a trifling amount, should, under an assertion of there being no relations, obtain possession of, possibly, a large property: and the notice which the Court expects to be given to the King's proctor, in these cases, is to preserve the rights of the Crown in the event of no relations appearing; and for the benefit of those relations, if afterwards any should appear. So different, therefore, is that from the present proceeding, that it furnishes no analogy to warrant it. This is directly a demand against the Sovereign of property in the contemplation of the law, already in possession of the Sovereign.

It has been said that the statute 39 & 40 Geo. 3 (c. 88), having given, or at least regulated, the Sovereign's right to dispose of his property by will, must afford the means of giving effect to his disposition. But such a general deduction is not sufficient, in point of law, to give a new jurisdiction to this Court, which it never before exercised, of proceeding against the reigning Sovereign. That could only be done by clear and express enactment. What inconsistency is there in supposing that the legislature, though it declared and regulated the Sovereign's right of tes-[273]-tacy, chose to leave the mode of proceeding respecting his will where it stood before? Why, is it to be supposed that the legislature meant, in future, to submit the reigning successor to the authority of an ordinary jurisdiction, to which no Sovereign had ever before been subjected, and which would be a departure from, and violation of the principles of, the constitutional prerogatives of the Crown? It was said that it would be a mockery to recognize the power of one Sovereign to make a will, and yet to leave a power in his successor to defeat its operation; and so it would be if the successor could be supposed capable of exercising any power of that sort. It would be in some degree presumptuous, and almost disrespectful, for the Court to express its full conviction of the impossibility of his Majesty, personally, entertaining the slightest disposition to exercise any such power of defeasance. The Sovereign can have no personal wish on this subject but that of doing justice. The law itself, indeed, does not permit the contrary to be even suspected. The King can do no wrong; he cannot, constitutionally, be supposed capable of injustice. If properly applied to in the forms prescribed by law and the constitution, no doubt ought to exist that real justice will be done. What the real justice of the case may be, this Court, in my judgment, has not the authority to decide; and being of that opinion, the Court holds itself bound by law to reject the present application.

Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1822.—Mutual, or conjoint, wills (so styled), irrevocable by either of the (supposed) testators, unknown to the testamentary law of this country; what effect soever may be given to such instruments in equity. An allegation, propounding an instrument of this species, rejected; and a separate will of the same deceased, of a later date, in effect pronounced for.

Martha Hobson, Susannah Hobson, and Joshua Hobson, sisters and brother, made the following conjoint or mutual will, dated on the 2d day of September, 1794:—

We, Martha, Susannah, and Joshua Hobson, being in health of body and sound in mind, do agree to the following assignment of our property in case of each other's decease, exclusive of five hundred pounds, the disposal of which we propose leaving a memorandum of, according to our particular liking. The remainder of our property we resolve to be left in this manner:—The whole of the interest of it, excluding the above mentioned five hundred, shall devolve to the longest life or lives while continuing single; but, if the survivors marry, the property of the deceased shall be immediately distributed equally amongst our brothers and sisters, viz. William Hobson, Lydia Blackburn, Hannah Blades, and George Hobson, including survivor or survivors of this testament, who are to have an equal share with the rest; or in case of their decease, viz. our above mentioned brothers and sisters, their share to be equally distributed among their children; or in case one of the survivors marrying, the single survivor shall have the interest of the property of the deceased during the time of his or her remaining single, but after marriage to have no more [275] claim than any other part of the family; and on the demise of the last of us three, provided he or she remained single during life, the property of the other two shall he equally divided amongst our remaining brothers and sisters; or, in case of their decease, their share to be equally divided amongst their children, with this provision, that the property of the last survivor shall be entirely at their own disposal. We agree to leave each other, with our brothers William and George Hobson, executors, to this our last will and testament, to which we put our hands this 2d day of September, 1794.

Witness, George Hobson.

MARTHA HOBSON.
SUSANNAH HOBSON.
JOSHUA HOBSON.

Joshua Hobson died in the month of October, 1796, a bachelor, and without having altered or revoked his part of the said mutual will; a probate of which, as to the effects of the said Joshua Hobson, was granted in August, 1799, to Martha Hobson, spinster, Susannah Hobson, spinster, and George Hobson, three of the executors named in the same. And Martha Hobson and Susannah Hobson enjoyed the income so derived, arising from the property of Joshua Hobson, till the death of Martha in the month of December, 1820, a spinster, leaving Susannah, also a spinster, still surviving.

On the 30th of November, 1820, Martha Hobson made the following separate testamentary disposition of her property:—

As my last will I leave to my dear sister, Lydia Blackburn, my share of the undivided property in my dear father's estates; to my dear sister, Susannah [276] Hobson, I leave the income arising from the whole of my funded property for her life; I also leave to her my plate, books, furniture, and such of my apparel as she may like to take, the remainder of my apparel I wish to be given away to any person my sister Susannah may think proper; and, after the demise of my dear sister Susannah Hobson, I leave the whole of my funded property to be divided equally between my nephew William Blackburn, and my nieces Lydia Blackburn, Eleonora Blackburn, Elizabeth Blades, Caroline Blades, and Laura Blades.

I leave my sister Susannah Hobson, executrix, and my brother George Hobson, executor, to this my will.

MARTHA HOBSON.

Buckwell Hall, Dulwich,
30th November, 1820.
Witness, George Hobson.

Probate of the joint will, as that of Martha Hobson, the party deceased in this cause, was prayed by George Hobson, one of the surviving executors named in the said joint will, on the one hand; and letters of administration, with the separate will annexed, as that of the same deceased, were prayed by the nieces and two of the legatees named in the said separate will, on the other hand.

The allegations propounding these instruments respectively were, in effect, mere common condidits, except in the following particulars:—The allegation propounding the joint will further pleaded the death of Joshua Hobson, a bachelor, in October, 1796, and that probate of the said joint will, as to the effects of Joshua Hobson, was taken by the deceased in [277] the month of August, 1799. The allegation propounding the separate will further alleged, "That at the time of making the joint will, and also at the time of the death of the said Joshua Hobson, the whole of the personal estate and effects of the said Martha Hobson, spinster, the party in this cause deceased, did not exceed in value the sum of 8000l.; and that she was, at the time of her making and executing her true last will and testament [namely, the one propounded], and at the time of her death, possessed of, and entitled to, personal estate and effects of the amount or value of 13,000l. or thereabouts—that the value of the estate and effects of the said Joshua Hobson, at the time of the making of the said joint will, was about 8000l.; and at the time of his death did not exceed the sum of 6650l., and that the value of the estate and effects of the said Susannah Hobson, spinster, at such time [that is, at the time of making the joint will] did not exceed the sum of 8000l."

Of these allegations, that propounding the joint will of September, 1794, was opposed on behalf of the nieces, who propounded the separate will of November, 1820.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. I have no hesitation whatever in rejecting the allegation propounding the mutual, or conjoint, will, as that of the party deceased in this cause, on the principle that an instrument of this nature is unknown to the testamentary law of this country; or, in other words, that it is unknown, as a will, to the law of this country at all. It may, for aught that I know, be valid as a compact—it may be operative, [278] in equity, to the extent of making the devisees of the will trustees for performing the deceased's part of the compact.(a) But these are considerations wholly foreign to this Court, which looks to the instrument entitled to probate as the deceased's will, and to that only. The allegation plainly proceeds upon a notion of the irrevocability of the instrument which it propounds as the will of the deceased. Why this very circumstance destroys its essence as a will,(b) and converts it into a

(a) As in the case of Dufour and Perraro: see the judgment of Lord Camden in that case, delivered 18th July, 1769, in Hargrave's Jurid. Exer. vol. ii. p. 101.

In the Walpole case, George Earl of Orford's will of 1756, and Horace Lord Walpole's codicil of the same date, made in concert, constituted, in effect, a mutual will. Horace Lord Walpole died in 1757, without revoking his part of the mutual will, namely, the codicil of 1756. George Earl of Orford died in 1791, when it appeared that he had made a codicil in 1776; and this, by reason of a reference to his last will bearing date in 1752, was construed a revocation of his part of the mutual will, namely, the will of 1756. [Vide pages 38, 39, ante; and 7 Durnf. & East, 138.] A case was then raised, in equity, that the mutual will of 1756 became irrevocable on the death of Lord Walpole in 1757, though it was admitted to have been revocable by either during the joint lives of Lord Walpole and Lord Orford, with notice to the other. And the judgment of Lord Camden in Dufour and Perraro was mainly relied on in support of that position. The compact of the mutual will was not enforced, however, in the Walpole case; but this was chiefly, it seems, by reason of the uncertainty and, in some sense, unfairness of the compact: so that it leaves the principle of Lord Camden's decision in Dufour and Perraro wholly unshaken. See 3 Ves. 403.

(b) The making of a will is but the inception of it, and it doth not take effect till the death of the testator: for, "Omne testamentum morte consummatum est; et voluntas est ambulatoria, usque ad extremum vitæ terminum." Then shall it be against the nature of a will to be so absolute, that he who maketh the same being of good and perfect memory, cannot countermand it. Forse and Hembling's case, 4 Rep. 61.

If a man make his testament and last will irrevocably, yet he may revoke it; for his acts or his words cannot alter the judgment of the law to make that irrevocable which, of its own nature, is revocable. Vynior's case, 8 Rep. 81.

contract; a species [279] of instrument over which this Court has no jurisdiction. Upon these broad and, as I apprehend, sufficiently intelligible grounds, I reject this allegation.

Allegation rejected.

DEW v. CLARK AND CLARK. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, Bye-Day, 1822.—Partial insanity may invalidate a will which is fairly to be inferred the direct offspring of that partial insanity. An allegation pleading partial insanity, in order to defeat a will, admitted.

[See further, 2 Add. 102; 3 Add. 79; 1 Hagg. Ecc. 311.]

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Ely Stott, the deceased in this cause, died on the 18th of November, 1821, leaving behind him a widow, and Charlotte Mary Dew, his natural and lawful and only child. The deceased died possessed of a considerable personal property, amounting in value to about 40,000l.

[280] The present question arose as to the admissibility of a plea tendered on the part of Charlotte Mary Dew, responsive to an allegation or common condidit given and admitted on the parts of Thomas and Valentine Clark, the residuary legatees therein named, pleading and propounding a testamentary paper, bearing date on the 26th of May, 1818, as the last will of the deceased.

The allegation (after pleading, in the first article, the death and circumstances of the deceased) went on to plead, in substance—

2. That in the year 1774 the deceased intermarried with Mary Simson, the mother of Charlotte Mary Dew, party in the cause—that shortly after the said marriage he betrayed great violence and irritability of temper especially towards his said wife, and conducted himself as a person labouring under mental derangement—that a few days after his wife was delivered of the said Charlotte Mary Dew, in the month of November, 1788, the deceased, who then practised as a surgeon, directed that she should be taken from her bed and washed from head to foot with cold water—that this order was reluctantly complied with by the persons attending her under the deceased's peremptory injunctions; in consequence of which extraordinary treatment his said wife became very ill, and died in about ten days.

3. That immediately after the birth of the said Charlotte Mary Dew the deceased shewed great antipathy to her, and refused to see her for two or three years—that he laboured under great and continued delusion of mind respecting his said daughter; declaring, whilst she was in her earliest infancy, that [281] she was invested by nature with a singular depravity—was born to become the peculiar victim of vice and evil—was the special property of Satan, &c. That the deceased, as his said daughter advanced in life, persisted in similar assertions, and continued to entertain a similar notion respecting his said daughter at all times to the time of his own death.

4. That the said Charlotte Mary Dew, notwithstanding, constantly felt and expressed a filial affection for the deceased, and behaved to him with respect and attention—that she conducted herself, on all occasions, with decorum and propriety; was a person of strictly moral and religious habits; and was so known to be by many persons of high character and reputation.

The subsequent articles of the allegation, eighteen in number (with the exception of one at the end, reciting and contradicting the condidit), instanced a variety of circumstances, as well evincing the deceased's insane aversion to his daughter, pleaded in the third article, as tending to shew that he laboured under mental perversion in some other particulars, especially on religious subjects.

So Swinburne, in treating of the revocation of testaments, wherein are express clauses, even derogatory of the power of making future testaments, as "I do from henceforth renounce the power of making any other testament," or the like, lays down that such testaments are avoided by testaments of a later date, precisely as if they contained no such derogatory clauses. "The reason," he adds, "is because the clause derogatory of the power of making testaments is utterly void in law; nor can a man renounce the power or liberty of making testaments; neither is there any cautel under heaven to prevent this liberty, which also endureth whilst any life endureth." Swinb. p. 504. See also to the same effect, pages 101, 102, 501, &c.

The admission of this allegation was opposed on the behalf of Thomas and Valentine Clark, as stating, on the face of it, a mere case of great and apparently unfounded, but still not insane, dislike—that nothing could impeach the will short of legal insanity, to a case of which, it was contended, that no proof taken upon this allegation could be expected to amount. In particular, it was argued that the will itself was incompatible with any notion of the deceased's aversion to the party who appeared in [282] opposition to it, being founded in insanity—that the deceased could not be mad quoad hanc by halves—that irrational antipathy must have operated with him to the total exclusion of its object from his testamentary bounty; but that a series of testamentary scripts was before the Court, in each of which the daughter was benefited; and that the very will sought to be impeached bequeathed her 100l. per annum—a legacy which, however inadequate, perhaps, to her views and expectancies, was conclusive to shew that the testator's disaffection to his daughter was not such as to preclude him from exercising a discretion in testamentary matters, even with respect to her; and, consequently, that it could not avail to call in question his general testamentary capacity.

Some objections were also taken to particular parts of the allegation, in the event of the Court declining to reject it as a whole.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The present case is one of a singular complexion; but it is one which I am not disposed to stop, in limine, by repelling this allegation; especially being, as it is, set up on the part of an only child.

The case, in substance, is one of partial insanity—of insanity quoad hoc, upon a particular subject; or rather, perhaps, quoad hanc, as to a particular person—that person being the deceased's daughter and only next of kin. It is alleged, in the plea now tendered to the Court, that the deceased conceived a dislike to this only child, founded purely on illusion; and it is inferred that he was actuated solely by that illusion to dispose of his property in the manner in [283] which it is purported to be conveyed, by the will propounded in the allegation to which this plea is responsive.

Now the possible occurrence of such a case of partial insanity, and that proof of it may invalidate a will, which is fairly presumable to have been made under its direct and immediate operation, must be admitted on the authority of Greenwood's case,(a) though the last verdict in that case, if I remember, established the will. And this being so, I am by no means prepared to say that no case made out in evidence, taken as upon the plea now tendered, could induce me to relieve the party who tenders it against the operation of the will sought to be impeached. At the same time I must observe, first, that the plea is one of that sort to which it is not very likely that the proof will come up; and, secondly, that, even if it does, I by no means pledge myself to pronounce against the will. Being a case, however, which I cannot determine satisfactorily to [284] my mind against the party who sets it up, in this stage of it, I think that I am bound to admit the allegation, as by so doing I give her the option of proceeding with the cause, if she thinks proper. She must be apprized, however, as well that the burthen of proof rests with her, as that this burthen, in my judgment, is, from the very nature of the case, a pretty heavy one. The present, indeed, may be less difficult to make out than Greenwood's case, in one respect, as the delusion under which this deceased is charged to have laboured towards the complainant is alleged to have been coupled with something of insane feeling in other particulars, especially on the subject of religion; although here, as in Greenwood's case, the general capacity is, in substance, unimpeached. But she must understand that no course of harsh treatment—no sudden bursts of violence—no display of unkind or even unnatural feeling, merely, can avail in proof of her allegation—she can only prove it by making out a case of antipathy, clearly revolvable into mental perversion; and plainly evincing that the deceased was insane as to her, notwithstanding his general sanity.

Without, then, committing the Court as to what may be its ultimate opinion, even should the facts pleaded in this allegation be proved, it is not an allegation which I think myself justified in precluding from going to proof. The case set up in the plea, to say the least, savours strongly of being one of partial insanity; and it is too much to say, in the first instance, that a will which can be argued, with any face of probability, to have been the direct offspring of that partial insanity if it be proved to have existed, can, upon no such proof of its actual [285] existence as may result from the evidence taken upon this plea, be relieved against.

Being disposed, therefore, to over-rule the objections taken to the allegation as a whole; the objections taken to parts of it are of no great weight in my mind. They are nearly all resolvable into this general objection, namely, that the case, as laid, embraces a considerable period of time, and must lead to a considerable bulk of evidence. But these are results to which the setting up of such a case leads unavoidably. It is hardly possible for the Court to form a right judgment of the deceased's state of mind in the particular in question, without his whole history, so far as respects that particular, being laid before it. It was incumbent, therefore, on the party, to go into some minuteness of detail on this point; and to take up the history from an early period. Nor do some objections to one or two articles, of another nature, appear to me altogether well founded. It is said, for instance, that under the 19th article the Court could only be furnished with Mr. Bartlett's opinion. Why, that is not exactly so. Mr. Bartlett, in stating his opinion that the deceased was insane, will, of course, at the same time, state his reasons for it—and his reasons may have weight with the Court, though his mere opinion may have little, if any.

Upon the whole, then, I admit the allegation; leaving it for the party to proceed with or drop the suit ad libitum. Upon the expediency of the former measure she will advise with her counsel; the propriety, under all the circumstances, she must determine for herself.

Allegation admitted.

[286] FILEWOOD v. COUSENS AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th July, 1822.—A pauper, so admitted in the middle of a suit, may at least be condemned in costs up to the time of his being admitted pauper.

This was a question respecting the force and validity of the asserted last will and testament of Charles Elms, late of Leicester Square, in the county of Middlesex, the party deceased in the cause, bearing date on the 10th of February, 1820. It was propounded by Mr. John Cousens, the deceased's son-in-law, and one of the executors named in it; and was opposed by Harriet Filewood, the sole executrix under a will of the same deceased, dated on the 3d of February, 1810. The suit commenced as long back as in Michaelmas Term, 1820; and counter allegations had been filed; witnesses had been examined on both; and publication was prayed; when on the 1st Session of Hilary Term, 1822, Mr. John Cousens appeared, and was admitted a pauper. Other proceedings were subsequently had on the cause, which now stood for sentence, having been argued upon two preceding days.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. [After recapitulating, and commenting upon, the evidence.] Upon this evidence, I have no doubt in pronouncing against the paper propounded, and should have as little in condemning the party, who has been rash enough to propound it, in costs, but from the circumstance of his now appearing before the Court as a suitor in formâ pauperis. In the superior Courts, at least, of common law, paupers, so admitted [287] under 2 Hen. 7, c. 12, are excused from paying costs, when plaintiffs, by 23 Hen. 8, c. 15; (a) at the same time they are liable, under that statute, to suffer whipping, or other punishment, at the discretion of the Judges: and (a) See 23 Hen. 8, c. 15, in conjunction with 11 Hen. 7, c. 12. The statute of Hen. 8 is limited, however, to particular suits; in which particular suits only it should, therefore, seem that paupers could claim to be exempt from paying costs, at least, under that statute.

it was formerly the custom—(a custom said, however, more than a century back, to have fallen into disuse, even at that time (see 1 Sid. 261. 7 Mod. 114))—to give paupers, if nonsuited, their election either to be whipped, or to pay their costs, notwithstanding their exemption from costs under the statute of Hen. 8, to which I have just referred. But I am not aware that this Court either is, or, indeed, ever was, authorized to order a suitor before it, in formâ pauperis, to be punished by whipping or otherwise, under what circumstances soever of misconduct. And supposing the Court to be at liberty, notwithstanding the statute of Hen. 8, to condemn a pauper in costs, and put him in contempt, &c. for non-payment,(c) I should still be unwilling to proceed to that extremity in the absence of a precedent; no instance of the sort having occurred in these Courts, at least that I am apprized of.

[288] Meantime—in order to mark my sense of the iniquity of the present suit, and by way of interposing some check to cases of this description, which have occurred too frequently in recent instances—I adopt a middle course, as to which I feel myself at perfect liberty, by condemning this pauper in costs of the suit, up to the time of his being admitted a pauper; and I pronounce accordingly.

[289] GREEN, FALSELY CALLED DALTON v. DALTON. In the Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1822.—A marriage annulled by reason of undue publication of banns [the name of "Augusta" being inserted between the true, and only, Christian, and the surname] under the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33.

Sophia Green, the natural and lawful daughter of William and Maria Green, of Oxford Street, in the parish of Mary-le-bonne, was born on the 31st of December, 1802. On the 26th January, 1803, she was baptized by the name of "Sophia" only, and from the time of her said baptism was called and known by no other name. On the 23d of February, 1820, a marriage was had and solemnized in the parish church of St. Mary, Islington, between Thomas Dalton (the party proceeded against) and the said Sophia Green, in virtue of banns of marriage three times previously published in the said parish church, as between Thomas Dalton and Sophia "Augusta" Green. This was a suit brought by William Green, the father, to annul the said marriage, on the grounds of minority, want of consent, and such undue publication of banns.

It was clearly established in evidence that the minor, Sophia Green, was so born and baptized; and was so known by the Christian name of "Sophia" only. It was also clearly established that the banns were so published, as between Thomas Dalton and Sophia "Augusta" Green, in the church of a parish to which neither of the said parties belonged; that the marriage had, pursuant thereto, was unknown to the said William Green till the month of June following, the said Sophia Green returning immediately to her [290] said father's, and living with her parents as before; and that the said William Green expressed the utmost grief and surprize at the discovery of it. It appeared that the banns under which the marriage was had were delivered by the de facto husband; but the entry of the marriage in the parish register book was signed by the wife, Sophia "Augusta" Green. It did not appear that there was any disparity of age or condition in the parties; but the party proceeded against neither gave a plea nor put a single interrogatory to either of the ten witnesses examined upon the libel.

The Judge (Sir Christopher Robinson) held that this use of the name "Augusta," in the publication of banns upon the occasion of the said marriage, was to be deemed a fraud of both parties on the rights of a third party, the father; and as intended, by misleading that third party, to effect a marriage, the celebration which might else, possibly, have been prevented. He admitted that the insertion of the name "Augusta" as not entirely confounding the identity of the wife was open to explanation, but held that, as no explanation was tendered even by the husband, he was bound to consider that it admitted of no satisfactory one; and, therefore to conclude against the bonâ fides, of the insertion; and, consequently, to pronounce the marriage null and void.(a)

[291] SAUNDER v. DAVIES. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1822.—A clergyman suspended, under a proceeding by articles, for drunkenness, profaneness, &c. Quære as to the right of the dean of the Arches, per se, to depose, or deprive, in any case, under the 122d canon.

(By letters of request from the chancellor of the diocese of Oxford.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a cause of office promoted by Samuel Saunder, a parishioner of Charlbury, against David Griffith Davies, licensed curate of the augmented curacy of Ascot, and curate of the parish of Charlbury, both in the county and diocese of Oxford, for drunkenness and profaneness, immorality and irregularity, and indecorum in the performance of divine offices. It was instituted in this Court, in the first instance, by virtue of letters of request from the chancellor of the diocese of Oxford.

In proof of the articles given in and admitted, on the part of the promovent, containing the facts [292] charged in due detail, eighteen witnesses have been examined. An allegation has also been brought in and admitted, on behalf of the defendant, but no witnesses have been produced upon it—the defendant suggesting his inability to examine witnesses by reason of pecuniary embarrassments; and now declining, for the same suggested reason, to appear by counsel. This course of proceeding imposes upon the Court the duty of examining the proofs in the cause with the strictest possible attention, in order that Mr. Davies may have the full benefit of any defect or failure of evidence. It is the duty indeed of the Court to bestow this attention upon the proofs in criminal proceedings under any circumstances; but it is more peculiarly its duty where, as in this case, the absence of counsel for the defendant devolves upon it the whole onus of sustaining the defence. For where the Court performs that duty in common with counsel, it may be pretty certain that their zeal and talent will fully obviate any ill effect of its own, possibly relaxed vigilance. But the Court is sorry to say that all its attention to the proofs in this case has furnished nothing which can suggest a doubt even in the defendant's favor. On the contrary, it is bound to pronounce the articles admitted in the cause sufficiently, and more than sufficiently, proved—and that by witnesses, not only competent, but, nearly in every instance, fully credible.

The first article merely pleads the general law applicable to offences of this nature committed by persons in holy orders, and neither is, nor of course requires to be, sustained by oral evidence. The circumstances pleaded in the next following articles to [293] the sixth inclusive, namely, the clerical character of the defendant, and his being licensed to the curacies of Ascot and Charlbury, are sufficiently established by the eight first witnesses and the eighteenth witness, the witness to the exhibits. Upon these facts indeed no question has been raised; nor were they attempted to be controverted by the defendant in plea. The criminal charges begin at the seventh article, which objects to the defendant habitual drunkenness and profaneness—being the first of the three branches into which the whole accusation may, not improperly, be considered as dividing itself.

Upon this general article no fewer than sixteen witnesses have been examined. These witnesses, who are persons in various classes and occupations, clearly convict the defendant in both these particulars. They differ something as to the degree of intoxication in which the defendant was in the habit of indulging—but in all other respects they depose, upon this general article, with pretty much of accordance. In short, that the defendant was in the habit of resorting to inns and alehouses in his own and neighbouring parishes "without any honest necessity"—that he was in the habit of drinking to excess, and running up scores there, although occasionally paid for; lastly, that he was in the habit, both there and elsewhere, of profane swearing, and of talking very grossly, immorally, and obscenely — is substantiated by their testimony in too convincing a manner to leave the facts at all disputable. And, which is most extraordinary, Mr. Davies appears to have adopted, and persisted in, this line of conduct, extremely reprehensible [294] in any individual, but highly criminal in a clergyman having cure of souls, without any shew of disguise. He commits these excesses, indifferently, in the parlour bar, or kitchen, or any public house in his neighbourhood, according to the class of company into which he happens to fall—this being a matter which, at no time, seems to have occasioned him any sort of anxiety.

Having said that this defendant's habits of drunkenness and profaneness are established to the conviction of the Court, it will not be required of it to descend into the particular instances. It would even be improper, if not absolutely indispensable, for reasons that will readily suggest themselves to every considerate mind. It remains therefore only to say of the three next following articles that they go to particular instances—and that each of the three, one of extreme grossness, is satisfactorily proved. An attempt which has been made to discredit two of the witnesses produced upon these articles, Evans, and a witness named Jonah Smith, by means of interrogatories, has wholly failed.

The eleventh article charges the defendant with being, almost more than, passive to a criminal connexion between his own wife and a young man who had been his pupil. This indeed is a part of the case too odious to be dwelt upon, and which the Court deeply laments the necessity of adverting to. It remains only to say that the charge, incredible as it seems, is positively deposed to, in a manner not to be explained away, by three witnesses—young women who had lived, at different times, in the defendant's service. Two of these again are attempted to be discredited by interrogatories, but [295] still unsuccessfully—and the third, a young woman, named Bursom, is a witness above all impeachment. She established, indeed, her own character, by taking steps for leaving the defendant's service the instant she discovered the gross immoralities practised in his family. Her evidence, in conjunction with that of the other two witnesses, satisfies my mind that not a doubt can be entertained of the truth of this charge—incredible, I repeat, as it seems, and revolting in its nature, as it undoubtedly is.

The twelfth article objects to the defendant's irregularity in the time, and indecency in the mode, of performing divine service. Eight witnesses have been examined upon it—whose depositions clearly prove the defendant's culpability in both these respects. As to the last, indeed, which is partly matter of opinion, there is some contrariety again among the witnesses, in point of degree; owing, probably, to their being differently affected, both towards the defendant himself and towards the offices which he had to perform. But that the defendant frequently read the service with most indecent haste, and that, on some occasions of performing divine offices, he has not been perfectly sober, is indisputable upon this evidence. And it is proved upon the thirteenth article, what perhaps would have been matter of just inference, without any proof, that the congregations at the defendant's churches, owing to such conduct on his part, have sensibly diminished. It is also proved that a baptist meeting-house has sprung up now for the first time at Chadlington, which several of the witnesses ascribe solely to the defendant's mode of doing duty in the church of that parish, coupled with the scandal occasioned by his [296] general misbehaviour. Hence it plainly appears that he has done a sensible injury to the cause, if not of religion itself, still, of that Church, the interests of which he stood solemnly pledged, by his ordination vows, to sustain and support.

These charges being thus established by proof, the only remaining consideration is the correction to be applied. The articles conclude with praying, generally, that the defendant may be punished "according to the exigency of the law;" but the first article, adverting to correction specifically, pleads that clerks in holy orders are liable, for offences of this nature, to be deprived of their ecclesiastical benefices, and suspended from the exercise of their clerical functions, by the ecclesiastical canons and constitutions of the Church of England, as by law established. And the Court is now given to understand, by the counsel for the promovent, that the sentence prayed against this defendant is the first of these, or a sentence of deprivation.

It appears, however, to the Court, in spite of what has been urged to the contrary, that deprivation is a penalty which it is not at its option to award; that, and deposition, being specially reserved by the canon (a) to the diocesan. It would be extremely unwilling to do, in the teeth of that canon, what the canon itself seems, in the Court's view of it, expressly framed to exclude it from doing, upon the mere dicta of counsel, however respectable, in the absence of any, or, at most, upon the strength [297] of one (blind) precedent.(a) For this, at least then, if for no other reason, the Court declines proceeding to a sentence of deprivation, as prayed by the promovent. And the Court not having, in its own opinion, authority to pronounce this sentence, it is unnecessary, and it might even be improper, for it to suggest whether the merits of this party's offence exact it. The discretion of diocesans ought not to be fettered by opinions on this head, in this view of the matter purely extra judicial, expressed here. It seems also clearly to result from the premises that suspension, the proper sanction of the Court, ought not to be carried to any such ex-[298]-tent in point of time as would render it tantamount to deprivation; for the Court would not be justified to itself in doing that indirectly which it felt itself precluded from doing openly and avowedly, by a precise sentence to that effect, in the first instance. The Court is bound too, in duty, and, it may be hoped, is disposed in inclination, to administer justice in mercy; and not to inflict punishment beyond what it deems necessary, first, to correct the individual himself, and, secondly, to produce due effect, in the way of example, upon others. At the same time it is to be remembered that offences of a grave nature must not be visited too lightly; as dismissing them, when they occur, with comparative impunity, is certainly not to consult best for their future prevention.

Still, however, with the aid of these principles it is difficult to define the exact quantum of any variable and discretionary penalty, incurred by a particular defendant, under all the circumstances, for any given offence. It is peculiarly so in the present instance, because it fortunately happens that few precedents occur in this kind to guide the discretion of the individual judge. I say "fortunately happens;" it being highly creditable to the body of the clergy that, numerous as it is, there has seldom been occasion to resort to any proceeding of a nature similar to the present. The single instance within my memory (now beginning to extend over no short period) is the case of Dicks and Huddesford, which occurred here in 1794. The Court suspended the defendant in that case, a clergyman articled against for drunkenness and profaneness, for two years; and directed that, at the end of that [299] period, he should exhibit a certificate from three clergymen in his vicinity of good behaviour in the interim, prior to the suspension itself being taken off or relaxed; condemning him, at the same time, in costs. Upon looking into that case I find it to have been one of by no means equal enormity with the present. There was much, too, in the case which went to shew that the defendant was hardly strictly sane—a consideration which might, and probably did, operate in mitigation of punishment, although the fact of derangement, if it were such, did not appear in the cause in any such shape or to any such degree as could render Mr. Huddesford irresponsible for his conduct altogether. Taking that case, in some measure, for a guide, but looking at the (a) In support of the Court's right to deprive, it had been urged, among other arguments, by counsel for the promovent, that such was the general impression or understanding of the bar, and the Court was reminded that, on a late occasion, this position had been broadly advanced by counsel * before a full commission of Delegates, without provoking any dissent. A manuscript note of Dr. Harris was also introduced to its notice, which was in these words: "In 1689 Sir George Oxenden, as dean of the Arches, deprived one Rich," and, in confirmation of that note, it was said to appear from books in the Arches registry that there was a suit depending in the Court of Arches in the year 1689, entitled Dr. Rich against Gerard and Another, presumed the first (plaintiff or appellant) to be the Dr. Rich said to have been deprived.

In the course of the hearing the Judge threw out that, under a future similar proceeding, it would be advisable to consider whether a sentence of deprivation might not be had (as by invoking the diocesan or archbishop, or otherwise) so as to avoid a breach of the canon which would result, he conceived, from the Court's proceeding to pass it per se, in the manner then prayed.

* Namely, by Dr. Swaby, in the case of Watson v. Thorp, Del. Tr. T. 1811. See 1 Phill. 277.

greater magnitude, and, I may add, at the deeper malignity of the offences proved against this defendant, it appears to me that it would be a shrinking on the part of the Court from a due discharge of that duty imposed on it, in order to preserve the discipline of the Church, and for the interests of the public, were its sentence of suspension, in the present case, to be for less than three years. The Court, therefore, on these several considerations, pronounces the articles proved; decrees a suspension of three years, and a certificate, as in Huddesford's case, of intermediate good behaviour, prior to its relaxation; and condemns Mr. Davies in the costs of this suit.(a)

Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—Imprisonment for a contempt, nature, effect, and remedy of—not, as often erroneously supposed, either in the discretion, or terminable at the pleasure, of the Ecclesiastical Judge by whom the party is pronounced in contempt.

(a) The sentence was as follows:—

The Judge, by his interlocutory decree, pronounced the articles proved, &c. and "that the said Rev. David Griffith Davies, clerk, licensed curate of the augmented curacy of the chapel of Ascot, and curate of the parish of Charlbury, both in [300] the county and diocese of Oxford, be suspended for the space of three years, to commence from the time of the publication of the said suspension in the parish church of Charlbury aforesaid, from all discharge and functions of his clerical office, and the execution thereof, viz. from preaching the word of God, administering the sacraments, and celebrating all other duties and offices in the said chapel and parish church, and elsewhere, within the province of Canterbury, and from all profits and benefits of the said augmented curacy of the chapel of Ascot, and curacy of Charlbury, and from taking and receiving the fruits, tithes, rents, profits, salaries, and other ecclesiastical dues, rights, and emoluments whatsoever, belonging and appertaining to the said curacies; and did suspend the said Rev. David Griffith Davies, clerk, accordingly; and did condemn him in the costs of this suit: and did order and decree that, at the expiration of the said three years, the said Rev. David Griffith Davies, clerk, do and shall exhibit and leave in the registry of this Court a certificate, under the hands of three clergymen in his vicinity, of his good behaviour and morals during the time of his suspension; and that the said certificate be exhibited to, and approved of by this Court, before such suspension be taken off or relaxed; and that the said suspension shall continue in full force, notwithstanding the expiration of the aforesaid term of three years, until the aforesaid satisfactory certificate shall be exhibited and approved of; and the Judge did direct that a copy of this decree, duly certified, be transmitted to the Consistorial Court of the diocese of Oxford, in order that such sequestration or sequestrations may there be issued, or such other steps be taken as the nature of the case, and the exigency of the law may appear to require; and did also direct the said suspension to be published in the said parish church of Charlbury, on Sunday the 1st day of December next ensuing, or on Sunday the 8th day of the said month, and in the said chapel of Ascot on the said 8th day of December, or on Sunday the 15th day of the said month aforesaid."

prisoner in the gaol of Ipswich, for the county of Suffolk, by virtue of a writ, dated May 21st, 1821, issued by Phillip Bennett, Esq., the then high sheriff of the said county, in pursuance of an order of your Honorable Court, [302] consequent upon a monition from the same, addressed to your petitioner, the said Frances Sarah Barlee, directing her to return home to her husband, Charles William Barlee, and upon a subsequent decree, declaring your petitioner to be in contempt of Court. Your petitioner humbly states that it is not in her power to comply with the monition of your Honorable Court, her husband, the said Charles William Barlee, not having, since the year 1815, had any regular house or place of residence, and that she does not at present know where he resides. Your petitioner further begs leave humbly to state that did she know the residence of the said Charles William Barlee, she could not, consistently with her own safety, return to him, as from his threats and ill usage she considers her life to be in danger, and that she has formerly sworn the peace against him. Your petitioner further states that a mutual verbal agreement of separation took place between her and the said Charles William Barlee, on the 5th of June, 1815, but that, on the 6th July following, he seized and confined your petitioner in a house in Vine Street, Lambeth; but that, by the interference of the magistrates of Union Hall, she was enabled to appear before them at the said hall, on the 27th July, 1815, when she there swore the peace against her said husband, who could not then be found. She further states that she had lived in a state of separation from her said husband for upwards of three years previously to his institution of the suit against her in your Honorable Court; and that she is now detained by virtue of a writ in which she is wrongfully designated by the male appellation of Francis.

[303] "Your petitioner further humbly states that she was heiress to a considerable property, part of which was, by her marriage-settlement, reserved to her own use; but the trustees nominated in that settlement being all related to, and acting, as she supposes, under the influence of the said Charles William Barlee, have failed to afford that protection to her person and property which she conceives she has a right to demand; she has, therefore, been obliged, under great difficulties from the want of money, to institute certain proceedings against those trustees, which proceedings are now pending in the High Court of Chancery, but your petitioner, by her present incarceration, is disabled from going on with them properly, whereby her estate and interests are materially injured.

"Your petitioner also further begs leave to state that, since her confinement in the gaol at Ipswich, her husband, the said Charles William Barlee, has totally neglected and refused to supply her with food and raiment, and that she is in want of the common necessaries of life, being reduced to the gaol allowance of bread and water, and a small portion of cheese. That your petitioner, when first imprisoned, was suffering under a liver complaint, for which she was attended by the late Dr. Girdlestone, of Yarmouth; that since her imprisonment that complaint has increased, and that, in consequence of the varied temperature, and other inconveniences of the apartment assigned to her, which is uncieled, and open to the roof of the prison, she has had an abscess in her head, and been severely afflicted with rheumatism; and that she has just ground to fear that another winter's imprison-[304]-ment, under her present privations, would be fatal to her.

"Your petitioner, therefore, humbly prays that your Honorable Court would be pleased to take into consideration these statements, and graciously to pardon the contempt into which your petitioner has involuntarily and unhappily fallen, and by giving an order for her liberation, afford her the means of saving her life and property. And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

"F. S. BARLEE."

Court—Sir John Nicholl. The petition of Mrs. Barlee, which has just been read, together with the recommendation accompanying it from the sheriff and magistrates of Suffolk, gives this Court an opportunity of publicly noticing the case of this unhappy woman, about which some misapprehension apparently exists. By this public notice of it the party herself, and those who take an interest in her behalf, may become informed that, whilst the Court very sincerely commiserates her situation, it is without any power of affording her relief in the manner prayed. Mrs. Barlee is imprisoned for what is termed a contempt. A notion prevails that a contempt must be some disrespect shewn to the Court, and that the imprisonment is in the discretion, and terminable at the pleasure, of the Judge. This is very erroneous. Contempts are usually incurred by a party's neglect or refusal to do some act which is, in justice, due to the other party in the cause; such as the giving in of answers, the payment of costs, or the like; and the imprisonment which follows is at the prayer of the other party—a prayer to which the Court cannot refuse to [305] accede without a breach of its duty, and a denial of justice. By the law of this country, married persons are bound to live together; and if either withdraws without lawful cause the other may, by suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, compel the party withdrawing to return to cohabitation. The only lawful cause for withdrawing is the cruelty or adultery of the other party; for this Court can take no cognizance of disputes about property or mutual agreements to live separate. To amount to cruelty there must be personal violence, or manifest danger of it; for unkindness and reproachful language on the one side, or vain and unfounded fear on the other, do not constitute any case of cruelty which the law can notice. It need scarcely be added that it is not sufficient to allege and charge cruelty; it must be judicially established by evidence. Mrs. Barlee withdrew from her husband—he instituted a suit to compel her to return—she pleaded cruelty—time was allowed her to produce her evidence—that time was repeatedly extended—till, at length, no witnesses being produced, the Court was forced, in justice to the husband, to conclude the cause, and to decree Mrs. Barlee to return to her husband. A monition was issued against her to that effect. This monition was not obeyed. The Court was continually pressed, on behalf of the husband, to pronounce Mrs. Barlee in contempt for not obeying the monition. Letters were addressed by this lady to the Judge of the Court, to other Judges, and to various persons, complaining of her husband, of her trustees and relations, and of her law agents; and suggesting that all these were in a conspiracy to [306] oppress her, and to rob her of her property. The Judge of this Court of course could neither answer, nor act upon, such letters respecting a matter depending before it; but they exhibited such symptoms of aberration of mind as to induce the Court publicly to throw out a suggestion, on being pressed to pronounce her in contempt, whether her friends could produce any satisfactory evidence of actual derangement; for an insane person cannot be guilty of contempt, so as to be legally responsible. The husband, of course, would have been entitled to controvert the fact. No case of that sort however was brought forward by Mrs. Barlee's friends; and after a considerable lapse of time, and repeated application on behalf of the husband, the Court was at length compelled to pronounce Mrs. Barlee in contempt, and to signify her contempt to the proper temporal jurisdiction. Carrying forbearance to the utmost point, the Court could no longer, without an absolute denial of justice, refuse to take this step on the demand of the husband. Here the authority of this Court ceased—the imprisonment takes place under that of the temporal jurisdiction; nor has this Court the power of releasing at pleasure, but only on the obedience of the party. This Court can no more release in the way prayed, than a Judge at common law can, at pleasure, release a defendant who is imprisoned for non-payment of damages recovered in an action. The imprisonment is here to enforce the legal rights of the husband; and unless the husband will consent to waive his rights, or unless she obeys the monition, or unless it can be shewn that she is not in a fit [307] state of mind to obey, this Court can take no step.(a)

(a) At the sitting of the Court on the next following, the 4th session, an affidavit of Mr. C. Barlee, the husband of the petitioner Frances Barlee, and a letter addressed to the dean of the Arches by the Rev. Edward Barlee, the brother of Mr. C. Barlee the husband, were read in Court by the registrar, in vindication of the conduct of the husband, and in total denial of nearly all the facts stated in the wife's petition. And on the bye-day a statement forwarded to the Judge by the high sheriff of Suffolk was also read in Court, in direct contradiction of what the petitioner Mrs. Barlee had asserted relative to her treatment in Ipswich gaol.

The Judge, after reprobating all private communications from suitors respecting matters depending before him, and noticing the irregularities into which any attention paid to these in the first instance naturally led, observed,

The Court has permitted these several documents to be read as an act of justice

AUSTEN v. DUGGER. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—If a party committed for non-payment of costs, under an erroneous process, be thereupon released, the Court is bound, at the application of the party to whom they are still due, to issue a new monition for payment of such costs.

[Referred to, Martin v. Mackonochie, 1879, 4 Q. B. D. 717; Mackonochie v. Lord Penzance, 1881, 6 A. C. 435.]

(On motion.)

This was an appeal from the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Exeter, where the cause originally depended, being a cause of the office of the judge for quarrelling, chiding, or brawling, in the parish church of Fowey, in the county of Corn-[308]-wall, and diocese of Exeter, promoted by Joseph Thomas Austen, Esq., against Richard Dugger, both of the parish of Fowey (vide 3 Phill. p. 124). By the sentence appealed from, dated on the 5th day of June, 1818, Dugger was dismissed from the suit, and Austen was condemned in costs. But on the 8th of May, 1819, the Court of Arches reversed that sentence, and pronounced the articles fully proved; suspended Dugger ab ingressu ecclesiæ for one week; and condemned him in the costs in both Courts, excepting only such as were occasioned by a certain allegation, exceptive to the character af the defendant's witnesses, given by Austen, the promovent, in the Consistory Court of Exeter.

Those costs were afterwards taxed at the sum of 202l. 8s. 5d.; for payment of which a monition went out, and was returned duly, and personally served upon Dugger; and on the 2d Session of Michaelmas Term, 1819, the Court pronounced him in contempt, and directed him to be signified, for not having obeyed the said monition. A significavit accordingly issued under seal of the Arches Court, followed by a writ de contumace capiendo out of Chancery, pursuant to the statute; under which writ Dugger was taken into custody, and lodged in Bodmin gaol, some time about the latter end of November, or beginning of December, 1819.

In Easter Term, 1822, a rule nisi for a habeas corpus to bring up the body of Dugger, in order to his discharge, was granted by the Court of King's Bench, on the ground of a defect in the warrant of commitment. That rule, upon argument, was made [309] absolute (see 5 Barn. & Ald. p. 791), and Dugger soon after was brought up before a judge at chambers, and discharged.

The present was an application to the Court for a new monition against Dugger for payment of these costs, in order to his re-commitment under a new warrant, in default of payment. It was sworn that neither the said costs, nor any part of them, had been paid, but that the whole were still due and owing to the said Joseph Thomas Austen.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The facts upon which the present motion is founded partly appear upon the records of this Court; and the rest are regularly stated in, and verified by, affidavits. It appears by these that the costs in question have been decreed by the Court, and are still due; and the question is whether the Court, upon this application of the party to whom they are due, can refuse the aid of its process to enforce their payment. Now I am of opinion that the party applying for, under the circumstances, is entitled to that aid; and, consequently, that a new monition must issue. Here has been a former process, and, from an error lately discovered in it, that process has become ineffectual. Could this error be fairly ascribed to the party suing it out; or could it be shewn to have occasioned the other party material, or any, inconvenience, a different consideration might possibly apply to the case. But, on the contrary, I incline to hold that neither the one party is blameably in error, nor the other has sustained any injury. It is true that the Court of King's Bench has held the significavit defective, as not stating, with suffi-[310]-cient certainty, the nature of the cause in which the costs were incurred, so as to fix it within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court. But that process issued in the ancient and accustomed form; and the description of the cause in the significavit, viz. "a certain to the husband, in consequence of the publicity which it has been the means of giving to the wife's (as it should now seem unfounded) complaint. Here, however, these irregularities must stop, there being nothing before the Court upon which it can make any order.

cause of appeal and complaint of nullity," is literally taken from that in the Court books; so that no blame is justly imputable to the party suing out the process. Had the process again been liable to no such objection, Dugger must have still been in Bodmin gaol; whereas, in consequence of its being erroneous, he has been released from prison, and at large since Easter Term last. He, therefore, has suffered no injury by the process going out in its actual form; or, if he has, it is an injury for which, in my judgment, he must seek his remedy in another forum. Meantime, the costs being, as I have said, due and unpaid, it seems to me that the Court is bound, ex debito justitiæ, to enforce their payment. This Court is not functus officio till it has enforced the execution of its decree; nay, even after payment of costs, had the process been regular, the party, Dugger, must have come here for his writ of deliverance; so that this Court could hardly have been styled functus officio in either alternative. I shall therefore allow the monition to go; not, I confess, without some reluctance; as the party against whom it is prayed has been imprisoned upwards of two years, and may be unable to pay the costs in question; in which case, if aware of it, the party praying the monition is chargeable with proceeding upon purely vindictive, and therefore upon unjustifiable, grounds. The fact, however, may be just the reverse: Dugger may have [311] ample funds, and may merely resist from obstinacy, and to defeat the just claims of the other party. After all the monition is only, in effect, in the nature of a rule to shew cause; for it should be distinctly understood that its issue is by no means conclusive. Upon its return the party monished may appear, and pray it to be superseded—a prayer to which, upon cause shewn, the Court may be disposed (as I apprehend that it is at full liberty) to accede. In this character, and subject to these limitations, I direct the monition to issue as prayed.(a)

[312] BLYTH, FORMERLY SODEN against BLYTH. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 1822.—An appeal only suspends the sentence appealed from, does not render it a nullity. Hence, the statute 3 G. 4, c. 75 (which passed after a sentence of the Consistory Court of London pronouncing a marriage null and void by reason of minority and want of consent under 26 G. 2, c. 33, though pending an appeal from that sentence), held, in no degree, to affect the question of such marriage.

An appeal from the Consistory Court of London.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

This, in the first instance, was a suit of nullity of marriage, promoted and brought in the Consistorial Episcopal Court of London by Samuel Blyth, the natural and lawful father of Augustus Frederick Blyth, against Sarah Blyth, otherwise Soden, for the purpose of obtaining a sentence declaratory of the nullity of a marriage had between the said Augustus Frederick Blyth, and the said Sarah Blyth, otherwise Soden, by reason of the said Augustus Frederick Blyth's alleged minority at the time of his said marriage, and of the marriage being had without the consent of his natural and lawful father, the said Samuel Blyth. The marriage was solemnized under a licence granted on the usual affidavit, stating "both parties to be of age," sworn by the alleged minor.

(a) The monition so decreed was immediately extracted, and was returned, duly served, on the 1st Session of Hilary Term, 1823. On the 2d session a proctor appeared to the monition on behalf of Dugger, the party monished, but under protest; which he was assigned to extend by the 4th session. An act on petition was consequently entered into between the several parties, which was brought in, sped, on the 3d Session of Easter Term, when the proctor for the petitioner Austen also brought in two affidavits in support of that part of his act which alleged Dugger's ability to pay the costs in question. On the 4th Session of Easter Term the Judge over-ruled the protest entered on behalf of Dugger (who did not appear by counsel), and assigned him to appear, absolutely, on the next court-day. On the next court-day, namely, the 1st Session of Trinity Term, 1823, no appearance being given, the Court pronounced Dugger in contempt for not having appeared absolutely to the monition [i.e. the monition last issued], in compliance with its order to that effect; and directed him to be signified pursuant to the statute. A significavit was accordingly again extracted followed soon after by a new writ de contumace capiendo, under which Dugger was re-committed to Bodmin gaol.

The cause was heard in the Court below, on the 4th Session of Trinity Term, in the present year — on which day [the 28th of June] a sentence was pronounced, declaratory of the nullity of the said marriage. From that sentence an appeal was immediately asserted, and was afterwards duly prosecuted to this (the Arches) Court. The usual libel of appeal was brought in and admitted—and was followed by an allegation, tendered on the same be-[313]-half—that of the appellant—the admissibility of which was the question now before the Court.

The allegation consisted of two articles.

The first article pleaded that, subsequent to the 28th day of June, 1822, being the date of the sentence appealed from, and pending the appeal—to wit, on the 22d day of July, 1822—an act of parliament passed, which (after reciting that great evils and injustice had arisen from certain provisions of 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, rendering all marriages by licence, where either of the parties, not being a widower or a widow, should be under the age of twenty-one years, without the consent of the father of the minor, if living; or, if dead, of the guardian or guardians, lawfully appointed, or one of them; or, in default of a guardian or guardians, lawfully appointed, of the mother, if living and unmarried; or, in default of a mother living and unmarried, then of a guardian or guardians of the minor's person, appointed by the Court of Chancery, null and void—and after repealing the said provisions, as with respect to marriages thereafter to be solemnized, further) enacted, in the words following—to wit—"That in all cases of marriage had by licence before the passing of this act, without any such consent as aforesaid, and where the parties shall have continued to live together as husband and wife, till the death of one of them, or till the passing of this act; or shall only have discontinued their cohabitation for the purpose, or during the pending, of any proceedings touching the validity of such marriage; such marriage, if not otherwise invalid, shall be deemed to be good and valid to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

[314] The second article of the allegation pleaded that "the said Augustus Frederick Blyth, and Sarah Blyth his wife, continued together as husband and wife, until the commencement of the suit in this cause in the Court below—and only discontinued their cohabitation during the pending of the proceedings touching the validity of the marriage of the said Augustus Frederick Blyth and Sarah Blyth, formerly Soden, and in consequence of such proceedings."

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from a sentence of the Consistory Court of London, pronouncing and declaring a marriage had between Augustus Frederick Blyth, son of Samuel Blyth, the respondent, and Sarah Blyth, otherwise Soden, the appellant in this Court, null and void, under the provisions of 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, the old marriage act. The appeal has been duly prosecuted, and the usual libel of appeal is now followed up by an allegation on behalf of the appellant, the admissibility of which is the point at issue.

The allegation pleads, first, the existing law supposed to be applicable to this case of appeal; and, secondly, the facts requisite to bring it within the operation of that law. But how the law pleaded can be applicable to this case, and, consequently, how the facts can be relevant, I am still to be informed. If the act in question had passed pending proceedings in the Court below, and prior to a sentence pronouncing the marriage invalid, both the applicability of the law, and the relevancy of the facts stated in the plea, would be obvious. But [315] passing, as it did, after a sentence pronouncing the marriage invalid, the one should seem to be inapplicable, and the other irrelevant. For the very next following (the third) section of the act referred to, and in part recited, specially provides that "nothing contained in it shall extend, or be construed to extend, to render valid any marriage declared invalid by any Court of competent jurisdiction before the passing of the act." It should seem consequently that this marriage can derive no aid from "any thing contained" in the new Marriage Act—in which case the present plea, as being purely superfluous, must of course be inadmissible.

If, however, the sentence annulling this marriage be itself a mere nullity, as contended, by reason of the appeal, the marriage, I admit, is valid under the new act, notwithstanding such prior sentence of invalidity—is valid, that is, provided the parties were cohabiting up to the commencement of this suit in the Court below, as alleged, and which I am bound to presume that they actually were, for the purpose of deciding upon the admissibility of the present plea.

The real question, then, before the Court is simply as to the legal effect of an appeal in this particular—in other words, whether it hath, or hath not, the effect ascribed to it of rendering the sentence appealed from a mere nullity. If it hath, the present plea is highly relevant, and clearly admissible—if it hath not, it can have no bearing whatever upon the case, and must as clearly be rejected.

Now that such, an appeal entered, is its legal effect is a doctrine to which I can by no means sub-[316]-scribe. It is quite at variance with, and contradictory of, my preconceived notions upon this head, on which, I confess, that no change has been wrought by the arguments of the appellant's counsel. On the contrary, I still hold its legal effect to be a mere suspension, and not the annihilation, of the sentence appealed from. That this is the correct view of the subject is evident from these considerations—the sentence appealed from, if affirmed, that is, if it stands at all, stands as the sentence of the Court appealed from, not the appellate Court—the cause is remitted to the Court below; it is by the authority of that Court that the execution of the sentence is to be enforced; and it remains valid from the day upon which it was pronounced by the Court appealed from, and not from that upon which it was merely affirmed by the appellate Court. In a word, the sentence, on appeal, is dormant only, not extinct, and revives, on affirmance, with every consequence attached to it which would have attached had no appeal been interposed.

The authority adduced in support of the novel position, that an appeal is not merely "suspensio" or "recessio," as it is termed by the civilians primæ latæ sententiæ, but that it actually annuls it, is not more convincing to my mind than the argument; or, indeed, I should rather say, it assists in refuting it. It occurs in Ayliffe (Ayliffe's Par. 71), who defines an appeal to be "a judicial right, whereby the former sentence is for a while extinguished." Now the "temporary extinction" of a sentence is, to my apprehension, the same thing with its "suspension;" [317] it is only another mode of expressing the self same idea.(a)[1]

Entertaining these notions, for reasons already suggested, I reject this allegation. The appeal of course may proceed, notwithstanding its rejection. If, in the event, it should prove that the Court below has taken an erroneous view, either of the facts of this case as they appear in evidence, or of the application to those facts of the then existing law, it will be the duty of this Court to reverse its sentence: otherwise that sentence must be affirmed; for the appellant can derive no aid from "any thing contained" in the new Marriage Act, the retrospective clause in which I am of opinion in no degree affects the marriage in question in this suit.

Allegation rejected.

[318] SCHULTES v. HODGSON. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 1822.—Additional articles may be admitted in criminal suits, though not universally, or as a matter of course—in what cases—under what restrictions—and subject to what limitations.

(On the admission of additional articles.)

This was a cause of office, originally depending in the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Sarum, the nature and circumstances of which have been stated in a former part of these reports.(a)[2] The present question arose upon the admissibility of additional articles tendered on the part of the promovent, in consequence of the proctor for the defendant refusing to consent to a reform of the original articles (given in and admitted in the Consistory Court of Sarum) out of Court—as suggested by this Court (the Court of Arches), where the principal cause has been retained, at the hearing of the appeal.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. When this appeal was before the Court on a former

(a)[1] This whole matter is well summed up by Gail, who says "that an appeal extinguishes the sentence quoad præsentem causæ statum—but that quoad futurum statum, et litis exitum, it only suspends it." Vide Gail, Prac. obs. l. 1. Obs. cxliv. n. 1.

(a)[2] Vide page 105 of this volume, ante.

occasion, it suggested to the parties the propriety of amending the articles, by consent, out of Court, if irregular and defective, as urged by the appellant (the defendant in the original suit), in their then subsisting shape. This it did, as being of opinion that the appellant had forfeited his right to be heard in Court, in objection to articles, from the admission of by the Court below he had not appealed within the time prescribed by law; and to which, moreover, of course subsequent to their ad-[319]-mission, he had given a negative issue. The Court, in recommending this measure, had the interests of two parties in view—of the promovent, or rather the public, which is manifestly interested in the correction and suppression of offences of the nature of those charged upon the defendant; and of the defendant himself, who had complained, and not without reason, of being placed under a disadvantage with respect to his defence, from the vagueness, and want of specification, of the articles, both as to time and place. I am to remember that I have still the interests of the same two parties to look to, in considering the admissibility of these additional articles. For it seems that a refusal on the part of the defendant to consent to a reform of the original articles, as suggested by the Court (in which possibly he might be right, having merely his own interests to protect), has constrained the promovent to offer those additional articles, which the Court is now prayed, on behalf of the defendant, to reject.

The admissibility of these articles has been attacked, generally, if I understand, upon the broad principle of additional articles being universally inadmissible in criminal suits. I am aware, however, of no such rule as this, urged in argument by the counsel for the appellant; and, indeed, in Stone's case,(a) which has been referred to by the counsel for the respondent, additional articles were [320] actually admitted in a criminal suit, not indeed by this Court, but by the Consistory Court of London, under the able presidency, at that time, of the present Lord Stowell. I am of opinion, therefore, that additional articles may be offered, even in criminal suits. At the same time, they are not admissible as a matter of course, or indeed at all, without special ground for their admission—such, for instance, as this suit presents, in the circumstance of the articles having been admitted, in the first instance, most hastily and unadvisedly, in a Court not, it may be conjectured, much in the habit of dealing with cases [321] of this description. And even where admissible at all, additional articles must be such as to occasion, taken in conjunction with the original articles, no substantial breach of the rules of criminal pleading, in order to make good their claim to be actually admitted.

Now, it is matter of perfect notoriety that, in proceedings by articles, the articles must be brought in on the Court-day immediately subsequent to that on which the

(a) This was a proceeding by articles, against the Reverend Francis Stone, rector of Norton, otherwise Cold Norton, in the county of Essex, and diocese of London, in the Consistorial Episcopal Court of London, for advisedly maintaining or affirming doctrine directly contrary or repugnant to the Articles of Religion, as by law established, or some or one of them; and against the statute 13 Eliz. c. 12, intituled "An act for the ministers of the Church to be of sound religion."

The articles in this case were brought in on the 3d Session of Trinity Term, 1807, and were admitted, without opposition, on the 4th Session. On the 1st Session of Michaelmas Term following, an additional article was brought in, for the purpose of exhibiting in supply of proof of the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th of the original articles, a letter from the defendant to a Mr. Stanes, a bookseller at Chelmsford, pleaded to be of the defendant's hand-writing, and to have been sent from the defendant to Stanes, with some printed copies of a sermon imputed to the defendant in those articles and charged as containing the offensive matter proceeded against, such letter plainly inferring Mr. Stone to have been the author of that sermon.

The admission of this additional article being opposed by counsel for the defendant, the Court directed it to be reformed; but on the 4th Session of Michaelmas Term, 1807, it was admitted, as reformed, together with its exhibit, without further opposition.

In the event the articles were pronounced to be proved, and Mr. Stone was deprived; the bishop (Porteus) in person passing sentence, conformably to the 122d canon. See p. 296, ante.

defendant has appeared; and that, being so brought in, they must contain the charge and the whole charge. It is true that the articles, when brought in, may be reformed and amended under the direction of the Court, prior to their actual admission; but when they are once admitted, and issue is joined, either party, I apprehend, is bound by them. In particular, the promovent is not at liberty to drop in with charges one after another—with perhaps the single exception that offences ejusdem generis, subsequently committed, may be pleaded in subsequent articles. But further articles, as matter of course, containing new criminal charges, or even advancing collateral facts and circumstances in proof of such articles of the original set as are, in themselves and directly, criminatory, ought not to be admitted. And now to apply these principles to the question immediately before the Court:—

The 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the original set contained, in substance, the whole criminal charge. The first of these, the 5th, charges and objects that the defendant, being a clerk in holy orders, a priest, and vicar of Hagbourn, "within eight calendar months from the commencement of this suit (that [322] is to say), in the months of March, April, May, June, July, August, and September, last past, and in this present month of October, 1821 (being the month and year in which the original articles were brought in), committed the foul crime of adultery, fornication, or incontinency, with Rachael Harris; and that for all, some, one or more of the months aforesaid, he, the said defendant, had lived and cohabited with the said Rachael Harris, in one and the same house, in a lewd and incontinent manner." The 6th, in like manner, charges and objects that "during all and singular the several months in the years of our Lord 1819, 1820, and this present 1821, he, the said defendant, oftentimes committed the said foul crime with the said Rachael Harris; and that for all, some, one or more of the months in the said several years, had lived and cohabited with the said Rachael Harris, in the said lewd and incontinent manner." The 7th objects that, "In consequence of such intercourse, the said Rachael Harris had twice, or at least once, within the months and years specified in the last article, conceived or been with child by the defendant, and had been delivered of two children, or at least of one child, within the parish of Hagbourn, or some other parish or parishes; and that such two children, or at least one child, so begotten and born, are, or is, now living within the said parish of Hagbourn." These are the substantial criminal charges upon which issue was joined—and I am of opinion that such of the articles now brought in as contain other charges accumulative upon these, or even adduce collateral facts and circumstances, in corroboration of these charges themselves, so contained in the three origi-[323]-nal articles just specified, could, under no circumstances, be admitted. Such, however, of the additional articles as are in neither of these predicaments I propose to admit, under the special circumstances of this appeal—the substantial justice of the case as between plaintiff and defendant, at the same time, suggesting, and even appearing to require it.

Now, the two first additional articles are in neither of these predicaments. They merely plead two exhibits, in proof of the defendant's institution and induction to the vicarage of Hagbourn, in supply of proof of the first original article, which simply charged that the defendant was, and for some time past had been, vicar of Hagbourn. These articles, with the annexed exhibits, I accordingly admit. The exhibits themselves, too, being merely copies of, first, the act, or minute of institution, and, secondly, the mandate of induction might possibly even have been brought in annexed to a deposition, without being specifically pleaded at all.

But the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 7th additional articles, where they are not mere repleaders, either go into new matter of an earlier date, or object collateral facts and circumstances corroborative, and inferring the truth, of parts of the original articles directly criminatory. For instance, the 4th, with reference to the 7th original article (which itself refers back to the 6th) articles and objects that, in consequence of the defendant's criminal conversation with Rachael Harris therein objected, "she, the said Rachael Harris, was, in the month of December, in the year of our Lord 1816, delivered of a [324] female bastard child, in the house of the said defendant, situate at Hagbourn, &c." And it has been contended that the promovent is not precluded from a greater specification as to the two bastard children mentioned in the 7th original article, even though it may shew a criminal connexion earlier than that which is there laid. I entertain, upon this head, a different opinion. It appears to me that this is matter which, if chargeable at all, should have been charged in the original articles; and that the defendant is not bound to answer to it in this stage of the cause. This is not that specification, the want of which in the original articles was objected by the defendant, and to supply which (he, the defendant, having refused his consent to their reform out of Court), is the promovent's ostensible motive for tendering additional articles. So, again, the application of the overseers of Hagbourn to the magistrates, relative to the affiliation of these said bastard children—their appointment of a day for Rachael Harris, the mother, to attend, in order to being examined touching the same—her refusal, at the defendant's suggestion, to attend—her being consequently brought before a magistrate, on a summons—her refusal, still at the defendant's suggestion, to be examined—her consequent commitment for twelve months to Abingdon gaol—the defendant visiting her, and supplying her with money and provisions whilst she remained in the said gaol, and suffering her to return to his house upon the day of her discharge from the same—all pleaded in the 7th additional article—are not a mere reduction of the original, through the medium [325] of this additional article, into a less vague and more specific shape; but are a series of collateral facts, inferring the truth of matters directly criminal charged upon the defendant in the original articles; and consequently, in my judgment, for reasons to which I have already adverted, are not admissible in this stage of the cause. The 3d, 4th, 5th, and 7th additional articles must, I think, be rejected.

The 6th and 8th articles exhibit—the former, two original letters from the defendant himself, in relation to the facts pleaded, addressed to the deputy register of the Consistory Court of the Lord Bishop of Sarum—the latter, an original letter from the same defendant to his alleged paramour, Harris, whilst in Abingdon gaol. They are pleaded in supply of proof of the premises charged against the defendant in the 3d and 4th and 7th additional articles respectively. These articles, I think, may stand, after being reformed, by making them refer to the 7th and 8th original articles, instead of to the additional articles now rejected. The letters themselves are rather equivocal; but, however, valeant quantum. Their introduction in this stage of the cause may, for reasons suggested in the course of this judgment, be a little irregular; at the same time it is conformable to the precedent in Stone's case; and some latitude in pleading, with respect to exhibits, is allowable, as is well known, in all suits.

Upon the whole, then, I admit the 1st and 2d additional articles, together with the 6th and 8th, after being reformed as suggested, and reject the [326] remainder; with the exception of the 9th, which is the usual concluding article, and admissible of course.

Articles admitted as reformed.(a).

NORTHEY v. COCK. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1822.—Administrations pending suit never granted on motion, but by consent. The principles by which the Court is governed in granting administrations pending suit.

(On motion.)

This was an appeal from the Consistory Court of Exeter, promoted and brought by Emanuel Northey, of the parish of Stoke Damerel, in the county of Devon, and diocese of Exeter, against Richard Cock, of the parish of Liften, in the same county and diocese. It was described, originally, as "a cause of bringing into and leaving in the registry of that Court the letters of administration of all and singular the goods, chattels, and credits of Mary Row, late of Broadwoodwiger, in the county of Devon, widow, deceased, thentofore obtained by Richard Cock, the pretended cousin-german and next of kin of the deceased, and of shewing cause why the same should not be revoked and declared null and void—and why such letters of administration should not be committed and granted to Emanuel Northey, the lawful cousin-german, once removed, and one of the next of kin of the deceased."

[327] This cause was appealed, upon a grievance; on the Judge below having ordered, or decreed, the answers of the said Richard Cock to an allegation given and admitted, propounding the interest of the said Emanuel Northey, which had been denied by the said Richard Cock, to be full and sufficient answers to the said allegation.

The libel of appeal was admitted on the 1st Session of Trinity Term; and on the bye-day after that term (the respondent's proctor having given an affirmative issue to that libel, and confessed the appeal) the Judge pronounced for the appeal, and retained the principal cause—and therein decreed the said Richard Cock's answers to be insufficient, and assigned him to give in further and fuller answers on the 1st session of the next term.

On the 1st Session of Michaelmas Term the proctor for the respondent exhibited a proxy under the hand and seal of his party; and, by virtue thereof, admitted the appellant to be the cousin-german, once removed, but denied him to be a next of kin of the deceased.

On the 3d session the respondent's proctor propounded the interest of his party, and asserted an allegation—at the same time the proctor for the appellant exhibited the affidavit of a Mr. Edward Abbot, and moved the Court, after reference had to the contents of the affidavit, to grant administration to him (pending suit) of the effects of the party deceased in the cause.

The party upon whose affidavit this motion was founded, in substance, deposed that Mary Row, the party deceased, died on or about the 1st day of June, 1820, intestate—that Richard Cock, one [328] of the parties in the cause, who then resided in a house near the deceased's, immediately thereupon took possession of the same, and of cash to the amount of 285l. or thereabouts; and in a few days after, and before Emanuel Northey, the other party in the cause, and claiming to be of kin to the deceased in a nearer degree, could be apprized thereof in time to enter a caveat, obtained letters of administration of the goods of the deceased, as next of kin of the deceased, from the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Exeter, and in virtue of such administration sold or disposed of a leasehold estate of the deceased, and attempted to sell or dispose of other leasehold estates; and by such and other means possessed himself of property of the deceased, to the amount of 800l. or thereabouts. The appearer, after referring to the proceedings had in the Consistory Court of Exeter, and in this (the appeal) Court, went on further to depose that the estate of the said deceased consisted of leasehold and freehold property, money out on mortgage, bills, and other securities, the rents and interest of which could not be received, as well as of the money of which the said Richard Cock had so as aforesaid possessed himself, and still retained; and that, to the appearer's belief, the property would be deteriorated, and its security endangered, unless administration was granted thereof, pending suit. The appearer lastly deposed that he was no otherwise interested in the event of the suit, or with the parties, than as having married the sister of the said Emanuel Northey, and that he was ready to take upon himself the office of administrator, and to give any security required by the Court.

[329] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This application is irregular in every respect. It is an application for an administration pending suit, ex parte, founded upon an affidavit of the proposed administrator, brought in on the 3d (the preceding) session. Now an administration, pending suit, is never granted upon motion, unless by consent. If the parties are agreed, both that an administration is necessary, and who the administrator shall be, it may be granted on motion. In any other case, an act on petition must be gone into—the necessity for an administration, pending suit, must be shewn—and the Court must be satisfied as to the fitness of the proposed administrator—or must be placed in a condition to determine between the two (its most usual office upon such occasions), an administrator, that is, being proposed by each party.

The affidavit exhibited in this case certainly states that "the property will be deteriorated, and its security endangered, unless an administration thereof, pending suit, is granted." But this may be denied and disputed by the other party, if an opportunity be furnished him of so doing—and again, the indifferency of the proposed administrator, the point to which the Court principally looks, is put out of dispute, even upon that person's own shewing. For he deposes that "he is no otherwise interested in the event of the suit, or with the parties, than as having married the said Emanuel Northey's sister." But in proving himself to be one of the deceased's next of kin Northey must prove his sister to be another—and her husband substantially has her interest. In-[330]-stead, therefore, of being an indifferent, he is an interested, party—a party interested to an equal extent, at least so far as personalty is concerned, with Northey himself.

I have looked into the cases determined by my predecessor, and find that this Court hath been constantly in the habit of refusing to grant administrations, pending suit, merely to take property out of the hands of a litigant party in the actual possession of it. It hath always required it to be shewn that the property was in jeopardy —that the party sought to be dispossessed was irresponsible, and refused, or neglected, to furnish adequate and reasonable security. On the other hand, it hath as constantly declined putting a litigant party in possession of the property by granting administration pending suit to him, always granting it, where requisite, to a nominee presumed to be indifferent between the contending parties. I reject the present application upon both these principles. Cock, the party sought to be dispossessed, is not merely in the actual, but is also in the legal, possession of the effects; for it is stated to be under an administration, although that administration has since been called in; nor is there any proof before the Court (however the fact may be, as to which I determine nothing) that the security of the property is endangered by its continuing in his hands. And Mr. Abbot, the proposed administrator, as already observed, is, upon his own shewing, equally interested, and consequently, in this respect, is identified with Northey himself, the other party in the cause.

Motion rejected.

[331] LAWRENCE, Attorney of Thomas v. MAUD AND PICKWELL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1822.—In causes of interest, both cases being disclosed, it is advisable that each party should admit so much of the other's case as he may (the whole, if he may) consistently with, and without prejudice to, his own case. Illustration of this rule.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

This was a cause of interest between Frances Mary Thomas, wife of Philip Thomas, asserting herself to be the cousin-german once removed, and only surviving next of kin, and Mary Maud, wife of John Maud, and Sarah Pickwell, widow, asserting themselves to be the second cousins, and only surviving next of kin, of Elizabeth Harrison, late of the parish of St. Mary, in the town and county of Kingston-upon-Hull, spinster, the party deceased in the cause, who died, on the 26th of November, 1818, intestate, and as admitted on all hands, without father or mother, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, nephew, niece, or cousin-german.

The interests of the several parties were propounded respectively in two allegations.

On the part of Mrs. Thomas it was in substance alleged that Thomas Harrison, the deceased's paternal grandfather, had by his second wife, Elizabeth Dennison, two sons, Joseph and Peter—that Joseph, the elder, married Eleanor Ridgway, by whom he was the father of Elizabeth Harrison, the party deceased—that Peter, the younger, married [332] Elizabeth Pelham—that the issue of that marriage was a daughter, Elizabeth, married to James Ludlow—and that Frances Mary Thomas, party in the cause, was the sole surviving issue of James and Elizabeth Ludlow, and consequently was the deceased's cousin-german once removed, and only next of kin.

On the part of Maud and Pickwell it was also in substance alleged as above, with this distinction—that Peter (brother of Joseph, father of the deceased Elizabeth) Harrison was alleged, on the part of Maud and Pickwell, to have died unmarried, and consequently without lawful issue. The posterity of Thomas Harrison and Elizabeth (Dennison), the deceased's paternal grandfather and grandmother, being extinct by this event, it became necessary to recur a step higher, namely, to Thomas Harrison and Elizabeth (Bowser), paternal great grandfather and great grandmother of the deceased. The pedigree of Maud and Pickwell was then deduced as follows:—It was alleged that Thomas Harrison, the deceased's paternal great grandfather, left, by his wife Elizabeth (Bowser), a son, Thomas, the deceased's grandfather, and also a daughter, Hannah—that this daughter Hannah intermarried with Edward Ackers —that the issue of this marriage was a son, William, and a daughter, Sarah—that the son, William, intermarried with Mary Gilliam, by whom he became the father of Mary Maud; and that the daughter, Sarah, intermarried with Samuel Simpson, by whom she became the mother of Sarah Pickwell, parties in the cause. Consequently, upon this shewing, Maud and Pickwell [333] were second cousins, and next of kin of Elizabeth Harrison, the party deceased in the cause.(a)

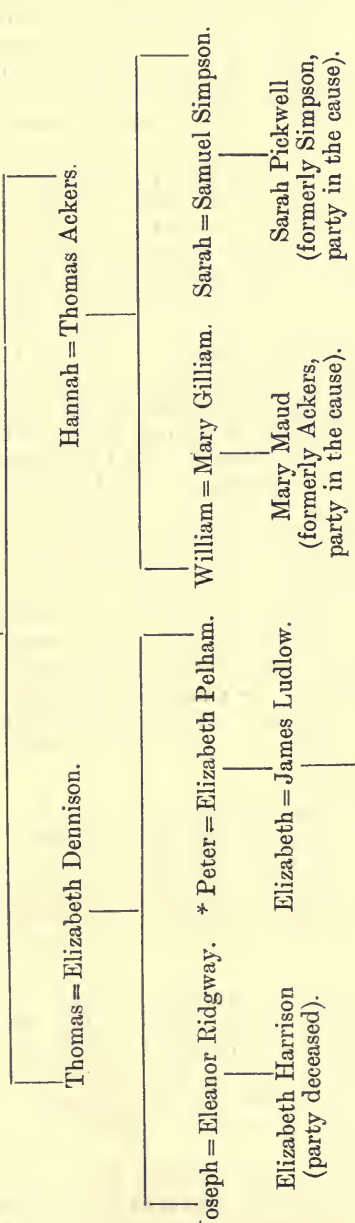
[334] In several of the latter articles of the allegation propounding the interest of Mrs. Thomas, extracts were made from certain letters and other documents, such letters and other documents being pleaded to be "in the hands of persons who would produce the same upon their respective examinations as witnesses in the cause." It was objected that these letters, &c. themselves, should be set forth, in order to enable the other parties to form a correct idea of the true import of the extracts made from them—and that the originals should be brought into the registry for inspection prior to the hearing of the cause.

The Court—Sir John Nicholl, after sustaining this objection, and directing the allegation to be reformed accordingly, proceeded as follows:—

(a) The PEDIGREES of the several parties, set out in brief, appear as follows:—



* It is evident that the sole point in dispute was the marriage of this Peter Harrison, alleged on the part of Maud and Pickwell to have died a bachelor—in which case Elizabeth, mother of Mrs. Thomas, if the daughter at all, could only be a natural daughter of Peter Harrison.

Now that the cases, on both sides, are disclosed, may not the inquiry, let me ask, be reduced within a very narrow compass? In a considerable part the case on each side is the same. Both parties allege that the deceased, Elizabeth Harrison, was the grand-daughter of Thomas Harrison, and his second wife, Elizabeth Dennison—that she was the daughter of Joseph Harrison, and Eleanor his wife, formerly Ridgway—that she had a brother, Richard Acklom Harrison, who died in 1813 unmarried. Upon this branch of the pedigree, therefore, there is no controversy—it is common to both parties—and no evidence is necessary on either side; for the Crown has not thought fit to intervene in this suit.

It is also agreed that the grandfather, besides the son Joseph, had two daughters, Elizabeth and [335] Hannah, who are also agreed to have died without issue—and further, that he had a fourth child, a son, Peter. That fact is alleged by both parties; and it is upon this son, Peter, that the whole case turns. On the part of Maud and Pickwell it is alleged that this son, Peter, also died without issue. Mrs. Thomas alleges that Peter married Elizabeth Pelham, and was her grandfather; that they had four children: Thomas, who died unmarried—Hermione, who married a person named Cargy, but left no children—Isabella, who died young—and Elizabeth, who married James Ludlow; and that she (Thomas) is the daughter and only surviving child of that marriage.

Now, if this case set up by Mrs. Thomas is proved, there is an end at once of the other case; for Mrs. Thomas is descended from the same grandfather with the deceased, and she and the deceased are cousins-german once removed. Maud and Pickwell only allege their descent from the same great grandfather, that is, only allege themselves to be second cousins, a degree more remote, and consequently excluded. Why, then, should both cases go on? or, in other words, why should not the present proceedings be confined to proving the marriage of and descent of Mrs. Thomas from Peter Harrison. If Mrs. Thomas proves that (and her case, I may say, is exceedingly strong, as it stands in plea), Maud and Pickwell can have no claim, and will be liable moreover to the costs occasioned by their opposition to the claim of Mrs. Thomas. If Mrs. Thomas fails to prove it, there is an end of her interest. She can have no concern with the case of Maud and Pickwell. She may leave that [336] question to be controverted by the Crown, if the officers of the Crown see any sufficient ground to interfere. But if Mrs. Thomas goes on to controvert the other interest—even in the event of substantiating her own superior interest—she forfeits all claim to be reimbursed, and can have no pretence whatever even to apply for her costs. Under these circumstances, is it not manifestly the interest of both parties that the case should be limited by an act of Court, to be settled by counsel on both sides, to that part of it which is the true and sole point of controversy, namely, whether Mrs. Frances Mary Thomas is, or is not, the lawful grand-daughter of Peter, younger son of Thomas and Elizabeth Harrison, the paternal grandfather and grandmother of Elizabeth Harrison, the party deceased in the cause? Recommending this measure (and a similar one, mutatis mutandis, in every case similarly circumstanced), for the present I dismissed these allegations.

CHASE v. YONGE. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1822.—Quære, whether any chancellor, commissary, official, or the like, can be permitted to put the executor, or one entitled to administration of the effects, of a party dying within his diocese, &c. upon proof, other than by oath in his own court, of such party having left bona notabilia in divers dioceses, sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court, before requiring probate or administration in the Prerogative Court.

This was a business of proving in common form the last will and testament of James Chase, late of the city of Norwich, deceased. A caveat, which [337] was found to have been entered against the same being proved, had been duly warned; and the Court, in the 1st session of the term, had decreed probate to the executor, unless the proctor who entered the caveat was prepared as upon this day, the 2d session, to set forth precisely his client's interest.

On the proctor for the executor now praying the Court to direct the probate to issue the adverse proctor alleged that "he appeared for the Worshipful and Reverend William Johnson Yonge, clerk, Master of Arts, official in and throughout the whole archdeaconry of Norwich, and denied the jurisdiction of the Court."

The Court—Sir John Nicholl. This is a perfectly novel attempt. Is the official (quasi such merely) at liberty to appear and deny the jurisdiction of this Court? I am very much inclined to doubt it. His "interest" I collect to be that accruing from his right to have the will proved in his jurisdiction, if there be no "bona notabilia:" but that this entitles him to put the executor, otherwise than by oath in his own Court,(a) [338] on proof of their being bona notabilia, before the will can be proved here, is what I much question. If every inferior ordinary be really at liberty to enter an appearance, and obstruct the grant of a probate or administration, whenever he thinks fit, till the question of bona notabilia, raised by himself, be first determined, the inconvenience to the public in the points of vexation, expence, and delay may be incalculable.

Let the appearance be taken de bene esse only and the matter stand over till the next session. If the official should elect (on being permitted) to proceed in this matter he does it, I will say, at the imminent peril of costs—provided the executor, that is, should succeed in founding the jurisdiction of this Court. But the sufficiency of the official's interest to raise a question about the jurisdiction of this Court, in the present shape at least, is a point as to which I am by no means satisfied.

On the next Court-day the proctor for the official alleged the caveat entered by him to have been withdrawn; and the Judge, at the petition of the proctor for the executor, directed the probate to pass the seal to his party, and condemned the official in costs.

[339] WILKINSON v. DALTON. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1822.—A witness who had been repeated and dismissed two years before, not permitted, under the circumstances, to be examined, at the end of that time, upon an article of the plea which she had not been designed to at the time of her production as a witness; and which, consequently, she had not been examined upon in the first instance.

In this case a proctor applied to be permitted to examine a witness (who had been repeated and dismissed) upon one article of the allegation, which she had not been designed to (said through mere inadvertence) at the time of her production.

Court. Has publication passed?

It was replied, by the adverse proctor, in the negative; but he stated that the witness in question had been repeated, in January, 1821, nearly two years back—and that, in this interval, several allegations had been admitted in the cause by which the character and complexion of the cause itself had materially changed.

Court. Under these circumstances I shall certainly not permit this witness to be examined as prayed—at all events, not without affidavits to explain both how the witness came not to be designed to this article of the allegation originally, and the necessity for her being examined upon it now. This is one of those applications which the Court listens to with great jealousy. A precedent of the kind, if established, might be abused to obvious ill purposes.

Application rejected.

[340] IN THE GOODS OF SIDY HAMET BENAMOR BEGGIA, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—Administration of the goods of a public functionary of the Emperor of Morocco decreed to a party specifically

(a) Vide Canons of 1603, canon 92, intituled, "None to be cited into divers courts for probate of the same will," which enjoins that "if any person cited, or voluntarily appearing, before any chancellor, commissary, official, or other exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, touching the probate of any will, or the administration of any goods, shall, upon his oath, affirm that he knoweth, or firmly believeth, that the party deceased, whose testament or goods depend in question, had, at the time of his or her death, any goods, or good debts, in any other diocese or dioceses, or peculiar jurisdiction within the province than in that wherein the said party died, amounting to the value of 5l., then shall such chancellor, commissary, or other, presently dismiss him; not presuming to intermeddle with the probate of the said will, or to grant administration of the said goods—but shall openly and plainly declare and profess that the said cause belongeth to the prerogative of the archbishop of the province; willing and admonishing the party to prove the said will, or require administration of the said goods, in the court of the said prerogative," &c.

empowered to take it on behalf of the Emperor of Morocco—on proof exhibited to the Court of the said Emperor's title (not questioned by the Crown, or otherwise) to the deceased's effects, in behalf of the national treasury, by the Mahomedan law.

Sidy Hamet Benamor Beggia, late consul of His Majesty the Emperor of Morocco at Gibraltar, died there, in the year 1821, intestate. The deceased was a native of Larache, in Fez, and consequently a natural-born subject of that Emperor. He died a bachelor, without father, mother, brothers, sons, daughters, uncles, aunts, sons of the aunts (by the father), or any other proper heir, by the Mahomedan law, leaving effects at Gibraltar, and in this country, to which the Emperor Muley Soliman became, under the circumstances, entitled, by the Mahomedan law, in behalf of the national treasury.

These facts being authenticated to the Courts of Tangier and Rabal, and decrees founded upon them, having issued from those Courts, declaratory of the law as above, the Emperor Muley Soliman commissioned two of his subjects (Haggi Thaer Al Hial Rebati and Haggi L'Arbi Mahanino) to proceed to Gibraltar, and act there, in his behalf, by taking possession of the deceased's estate and effects; appointing, at the same time, Mr. Judah Benoliel (the deceased's successor in the consulate at Gibraltar), his attorney, to receive the deceased's estate, in the first instance, and deliver it over to the said commissioners.

On the 24th of July, 1821, administration of the deceased's estate and effects was granted, by decree [341] of His Majesty's Court of Civil Pleas at Gibraltar, to the said Haggi Thaer Al Hial Rebati, and Haggi L'Arbi Mahanino, on behalf and as commissioners of His Imperial Majesty Muley Soliman, Emperor of Morocco; security being directed to be taken (and which was taken accordingly) under the special circumstances, to meet any claim of creditors or others, upon the deceased's estate, which might be made within a year and a day from that time.

The said commissioners, when about to depart from Gibraltar on their return to Morocco, did, by an instrument of procuration, or power of attorney, under their hands and seals, delegate to the aforesaid Mr. Judah Benoliel, his said Imperial Majesty of Morocco's consul at Gibraltar, all the powers vested in them under, and in virtue of, the aforesaid decree of His Majesty's Court of Civil Pleas at Gibraltar, and also all other powers and authorities which they possessed, as the commissioners of his said Imperial Majesty, to receive and take possession of all monies, estate, and effects whatsoever of the deceased; and to appear before any tribunal or court, whether ecclesiastical or secular; and to do all acts, matters, and things necessary or expedient, touching or relating to the estate and effects of the deceased in all places, countries, dominions, or jurisdictions whatsoever.

Under these circumstances, in proof of which several documents were exhibited, the Court was moved by counsel to decree administration of the effects of the deceased in this country (it being necessary that administration of those effects should be granted to some one, for the use of the party or [342] parties eventually entitled) to Mr. Judah Benoliel (on giving sufficient security), for the use and benefit of the Emperor of Morocco—the said Mr. Judah Benoliel, in addition to his other presumed claims to be administrator, stated above, being the sole public functionary of his Imperial Majesty in the British dominions.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. The facts upon which this motion is founded are, I think, sufficiently verified; but I am of opinion that a specific power or commission to some person to take administration of the deceased's effects here is still requisite—the Emperor of Morocco's commissioners, as the attorney of whom it is prayed that administration may be granted to Mr. Benoliel, of effects in this country, having been limited, by the express terms of their commission, to act at Gibraltar.

Upon the question of legal title to the deceased's effects, if any should be raised—as, for instance, by the Crown, or by relatives on the mother's side, who might be entitled here, though excluded by the Mahomedan law—it might be material to shew whether the deceased was an ordinarily domiciled person within the British dominions, or was only a temporary resident, as a mere officer of the Emperor of Morocco. But if no such question be raised, either on the part of the Crown or otherwise, this Court will be disposed to follow the example of the Court of Civil Pleas at Gibraltar; and to decree the administration to any party specifically empowered to take it, on behalf of the Emperor of Morocco.

Motion suspended.

[343] IN THE GOODS OF SIR THEOPHILUS JOHN METCALFE, BART., Deceased. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—Administration granted limited to certain purposes, of the goods of a party deceased, until his last will (stated by himself, a few days before his death, to be in India), or an authentic copy thereof, should be transmitted from India to this country.

[Referred to, Hewson v. Shelley, [1914] 2 Ch. 32. See further, Howell v. Metcalfe, 1824, 2 Add. 349.]

(On motion.)

Sir Theophilus John Metcalfe, late of Fern Hill, in the county of Berks, Bart., was the party deceased in this business. He died on the 16th of August, 1822, having, a day or two preceding his death, informed his relations and friends that he had made his will whilst in India, and that the same was then remaining there. The deceased was a widower, and left an only daughter, a minor of the age of fifteen years and upwards, the sole person who would have been entitled to his effects in case he had died intestate. He also left behind him two brothers, both respectively resident in India, and two sisters, Lady Ashbrooke and Georgiana Theophila Metcalfe, spinster, resident in this country. The deceased had himself resided many years in China; and had only come to this country in the month of April, 1820, for the benefit of his health, with intention of returning to China.

The property of the deceased in this country chiefly consisted of 10,000l. 3 per cent. consols; 7000l. India stock; 20 Globe shares; 4000l. London Dock shares; a bill accepted by the East India Company, and due in May, 1823, for 950l.; money at his banker's, and due from the East India Company (amount uncertain); furniture and effects at the deceased's residence at Fern Hill; and a freehold estate.

These facts were verified by affidavits of Edward Larken, of Bedford Square, in the county of [344] Middlesex, Esq., who had been agent for the deceased's affairs in England, and of Miss Metcalfe, the sister of the deceased; and the Court was prayed, under these special circumstances, to decree administration of the goods, chattels, and credits of the deceased, "Limited for the purpose of receiving and investing the interest and dividends due, or to become due, on the deceased's stock, &c.—and for receiving and investing the amount of the said bill—and for otherwise protecting the property of the said deceased to the said Edward Larken, Esq., until the last will and testament of the said deceased, or an authentic copy thereof, should be transmitted to this country."

Court—Sir John Nicholl. The Court is disposed, under the circumstances, to accede to this application, although it is one of a novel aspect. The deceased cannot be sworn to have died intestate; having, according to his own declaration, left a will in India. An administration pendente lite is out of the question, as no suit in this Court relative to the deceased's affairs is, or ever may be, depending. Nor can there be an administration as, during absence out of the kingdom, or the minority, of an executor, or the like; for, non constat who the executor is, or even whether there be an executor. At the same time an interval of considerable length must elapse before the deceased's will can be forwarded from India—in which interval it may, as stated and sworn, be very material that some person should be authorized as well to receive and invest the interest due and accruing upon the deceased's stock, &c. as to act, generally, for the protection and management of his [345] property in other particulars. Under these circumstances, considering the reasonableness of the application and that all parties apparently interested are consenting, I think that I am bound to comply with this prayer.

Motion granted.

COATES v. BROWN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1822.—The obligation to pay costs, pursuant to a monition for payment, held, under the circumstances, not to be dispensed with by the party to whom they were due, having bound himself to waive them, by an instrument executed out of Court.

(On petition.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The present application to the Court has risen out of a question at issue between the same parties, respecting its jurisdiction, determined here in Trinity Term, 1821.(a) The Court upon that occasion pronounced for its jurisdiction—and condemned Mr. Coates, one of the parties to the present petition, who had denied it, in costs. Mr. Coates, in the first instance, appealed from that sentence; but subsequently abandoned his appeal. Upon this abandonment of the appeal and consequent remission of the cause to this Court, the [346] costs here were taxed: a monition was extracted for payment of them, and was duly served and re-[347]-turned. Such costs, however, being still unpaid, the Court was about, in Easter Term last, to en-[348]-force obedience to its monition by the usual process, when the party monished prayed to be heard, upon his petition, against being put in contempt—undertaking, of course, to furnish special grounds to induce the Court in effect to revoke its sentence condemning him in costs. Whether he has redeemed that implied pledge, or not, in a manner satisfactory to the Court, is what it has now to determine.

The petitioner Coates then alleges, not that he has paid these costs, but that Brown, the other petitioner, has released him from the obligation of payment; and consequently has discharged him from that of obeying the monition. The act on his part states that, pending an appeal from the sentence of this Court, pronouncing for its jurisdiction, &c. the parties, Coates and Brown, mutually agreed [349] to settle

(a) Brown v. Coates. Trinity Term, Bye-day, 1821.—Question of jurisdiction—pronounced for—and party disputing it, condemned in costs.—Quære, whether the mere holder of a will, monished to bring it in, at the suit of one entitled to administration with that will annexed, has any right to insist on proof of "bona notabilia," in the first instance, and prior to bringing in the will.

(On petition.)

This was a cause or business of bringing into, and leaving in, the registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, the last will and testament of Thomas Brown, late of Ivington, near Leominster, in the county of Hereford, deceased, who died in the month of February, 1820, promoted and brought by Francis Heywood Brown, son of the deceased and one of the residuary legatees named in his said will, against Benjamin Coates, of Eyton, near Leominster aforesaid.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This, in substance and effect, is a question respecting the right of the Court to grant administration, with the will annexed, of the goods of Thomas Brown, late of Ivington, in the county and diocese of Hereford, the party deceased in the cause. In Michaelmas Term last [1820], a monition issued at the suit of Francis Heywood Brown, the son, and one of the next of kin, and one of the residuary legatees named in the will, of the said deceased (the surviving executors having renounced), against Benjamin Coates, of Leominster, in the county of Hereford, the actual holder of the will, respectively parties in the cause, to bring into and leave the same in the registry of this, the Prerogative, Court. Mr. Coates appearing to that monition under protest, and, questioning the Court's right to interfere in the premises, its jurisdiction is propounded on the one side and denied on the other, through the somewhat informal medium of an act on petition; the merits of which the Court has now to determine.

In this act on petition it is stated, in substance, on the part of Brown, who propounds the jurisdiction of the Court, that the deceased had property in the diocese of Hereford and elsewhere sufficient to found its jurisdiction; for that one Cooper, resident within the jurisdiction of the dean and chapter of Westminster, was and is justly and truly indebted to the estate of the said deceased to the amount or value of upwards of 5l., being the balance of the purchase money of certain lands at Ivington, bargained and sold by the said deceased to Cooper in the year 1818. On the contrary, it is denied on the part of Mr. Coates, who disputes the jurisdiction, that any such debt as that alleged is or can be due from Cooper to the deceased's estate; for that the deceased had assigned over all his property, and these lands at Ivington with the rest, to him, Coates, and a Mr. Carpenter, his creditors, among others, to a considerable amount, in trust for the general benefit of his said creditors, in the year 1816, by a deed of lease and release, which is exhibited, annexed to the act; and consequently that the pretended bargain and sale of these lands to Cooper in 1818 was and is invalid; and can found no just demand against Cooper for 5l. or any other sum. The their disputes and differences out of Court; and that, in virtue of that arrangement, a deed or indenture was made and executed by and between the said parties on the 2d of January, 1822—in which Coates, the one party, undertook to abandon the appeal—and Brown, the other party, engaged to pay the costs on both sides already incurred, as well in the Court of Appeal as in this, the Prerogative Court, touching and concerning the subject-matters in dispute. And it further states that Brown, at the same time, with two sureties, gave a bond to Coates in the penal sum of 500l., conditioned for his due performance of the several covenants contained in the deed. The reply to that statement, on the other part, is that these instruments, this deed and bond, were obtained from Brown unduly, and upon false suggestions at the office of Coates, himself a solicitor, whose clerk had drawn them up—that Brown, a farmer, unacquainted with business, executed these instruments under no professional advice; and consequently that these instruments, the deed and bond, themselves, by reason of the premises, are null and void.

Now, such being the substance of what is alleged upon both sides material to the question before the Court, it appears to me, upon the very face of this act, that sufficient grounds are not laid for inducing the Court to abstain from enforcing obedience to its monition by the customary process. Obedience to a monition for payment of costs must be by their actual payment; and compelling it is less, I think, a matter of discretion in the Court, upon this state of facts, than it is matter of right, demandable ex debito justitiæ, by the petitioner, at whose suit the [350] monition rejoinder to this on the part of Brown is a denial of the validity of the assignment to Coates and his co-trustee in 1816, and a re-assertion of the validity of the conveyance to Cooper in 1818 of the lands at Ivington, under circumstances which are stated at great length, but into which it is not necessary for the Court to enter. Such is the substance of those parts of the act material to the question of jurisdiction in this case, both on the one side and on the other.

Now the first question which presents itself in the case, upon this view of it, is whether a mere creditor or trustee or actual holder of a will, or one even who is all these together, which is Mr. Coates's situation, has any right to dispute the jurisdiction of this Court under circumstances like the present. He has no pretence whatever to be administrator; consequently it should seem that his right to moot any questions about what jurisdiction administration shall be taken in is extremely problematical. I very much doubt whether Mr. Coates has any persona standi, in opposition to a call to bring in this deceased's will; strongly inclining to think his putting the other party on proof of "bona notabilia," prior to giving it up, under these circumstances, is a proceeding alike without any foundation either in principle or in precedent.

But for argument's sake, admitting Mr. Coates to have this right ever so incontestably, is there not sufficient upon the merits in this case—sufficient evidence, I mean, of bona notabilia—to justify me in compelling him to bring in the deceased's will? I am of opinion that there is. The validity of this trust deed and the true nature and effect, if valid, are questions which the Court can neither be required to investigate nor is competent to determine. Abstract this from the case, however, and it is not denied that the deceased left "bona notabilia." In the meantime the Court has these admitted facts, that the deceased in his lifetime bargained and sold an estate at Ivington, over which consequently he had, or at least assumed, a disposing power to one Cooper, resident without the jurisdiction of his diocesan, the Lord Bishop of Hereford; and that there actually subsists, on the part of his estate, a claim against Cooper for a sum exceeding 5l., in respect of and due as upon that purchase. And this in my judgment is fully sufficient evidence of bona notabilia to warrant the Court's compelling this party to give up the will pursuant to its monition. Upon the final effect of the complicated transactions detailed in this act on the property of the deceased, it will be for a Court of Equity to determine, if Mr. Coates thinks fit to proceed in equity, for his rights as a creditor and trustee under this deed. Mean time what is suggested on Brown's part is ample, I think, to found the Court's right to grant administration in this case, and consequently its right to compel Mr. Coates to bring in this will, encountered as it is by nothing of an opposite nature which this Court, I repeat, can be required to investigate; or which, if it does, it is competent to decide upon.

Protest over-ruled with costs.

itself, in the first instance, was extracted. This indeed is questioned by the other petitioner merely as with reference to the contents of a deed, not only executed out of Court, and forming no part of the proceedings here, but the validity of which, at all, is disputed and denied upon Brown's part. Consequently, the validity of this deed, independent of every other consideration, is a preliminary question; and is to be proved, in the first instance, before the Court can be required, or can even be expected, to found any proceeding upon it. But this Court is not competent to decide upon the sufficiency of the consideration for instance, and the validity in this and other respects of the deed, even were it inclined to go into the question of its validity. The circumstances, too, under which it was executed, are not proper to be investigated here at all—still less in the shape which this proceeding has assumed, that of a mere act on petition, supported by voluntary affidavits. The deed relied upon by Mr. Coates is either valid or invalid—in the latter case it is, at best, good for nothing, and can found no prayer which the Court would be warranted in acceding to—even in the former it is still, I think, incumbent on the Court to enforce its decree, the more especially as, in taking that part, it can scarcely inflict upon Mr. Coates any permanent injury. For any application to this Court, on the part of Brown, with respect to these costs, being a direct breach of his covenant, Mr. Coates may proceed against him upon that breach in the proper forum, in the certainty, if the deed be valid, of obtaining an adequate compensation in damages. He has even a bond, with sureties, from [351] Brown, conditioned, in a large penal sum, for the performance of his covenants—so that these instruments, this deed and bond being valid, as he insists, Mr. Coates, I repeat, can be, ultimately, no loser by the Court's declining, in effect, to rescind its sentence—a departure from its regular practice, which the facts stated in the present petition are not, in my judgment, of a nature to warrant or excuse.

The result of these several considerations is briefly this. A monition having issued —that monition not being obeyed—and the party who obtained it praying the further aid of the Court to enforce obedience, the Court, I think, in spite of what has been alleged and argued to the contrary in this case, is bound to grant that aid. Obedience to a monition for payment of costs can only be rendered by payment of costs; if enforcing it, in this instance, is a breach of the alleged deed, Mr. Coates must seek his remedy over against Brown and his sureties in another jurisdiction, which is competent to investigate and decide upon the validity of this deed and the accompanying bond. Upon these plain considerations I reject the prayer of this petition, and with costs. The costs, indeed, follow that rejection quite as a matter of course. Brown can, with no propriety, be said to have obtained his original costs, if the costs of enforcing the payment of these are withheld from him. In taxing costs, the expence of the monition for payment is always added; and if the monition is not obeyed in the first instance, the further expence seems to fall by a just and even necessary consequence upon that party through whose neglect or refusal to obey, in the first instance, it has been incurred.

[352] Such being the sound general principle, and there being nothing in the character or circumstances of this particular case to exempt it from the operation of that principle (if not, quite the contrary), I reject Mr. Coates's prayer, and condemn him in the further costs of the present petition.

HUDSON v. BEAUCHAMP. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1822.—A witness shall be compelled to answer as to whether he is or is not responsible, in some way, for the party's expences in whose behalf he is examined explicitly.

(On motion.)

The following interrogatory, among others, was administered to John Stayner, a witness produced and examined on behalf of Humphry Hudson, one of the parties in this cause.

"Will you positively swear that you have not advanced any sum or sums of money to the said Humphry Hudson, or to any one on his behalf, for, or in relation to, carrying on the proceedings in this cause? Are you not in some, and what, way responsible for the expences of this suit?"

The witness Stayner had answered this interrogatory as follows:—

"He will swear positively that he has not advanced any sum of money to the said Humphry Hudson, but, as his son-in-law, has advanced money to Mr. Glennie, and to Messrs. Milne and Parry, lawyers, on his behalf, in relation to carrying on the proceedings in this cause; and he submits to the judgment of this Right Honorable Court that he is not bound to answer whether he is or is not re-[353]-sponsible for the expences of this suit, and as to which he has given no undertaking."

This answer was objected to for insufficiency, and the Court was moved by counsel to decree a monition against the witness to answer the interrogatory whether he is or is not responsible for the expences of the suit more fully.

On the other hand, it was said, as against the issue of the monition, that the witness had answered the interrogatory sufficiently already by implication—that the witness could only be responsible for the expences of the suit, in consequence of having given an undertaking to that effect; which undertaking, however, he denied himself to have given upon oath. But (Per Curiam.) I think that this witness is bound, and may be compelled to answer the interrogatory in question explicitly; and, consequently, I direct the monition to issue as prayed.

Motion granted.

LOCK v. DENNER. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1822.—In a testamentary suit a variety of slight circumstances are pleadable where the case set up by the other party is charged by the party pleading as a case of fraud. General rules as to pleading in such cases.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Sarah Lock (wife of the Rev. Samuel Lock, D.D., late of Farnham, in the county of Surrey) was the party deceased in this cause. On the 4th Session of Easter Term an allegation was [354] given in on the part of the husband and sole executor, propounding a certain paper writing, bearing date on the 13th of June, 1821, as the last will of the deceased. The present question arose upon the admission of a plea, responsive to that allegation, given in on the part of Thomas Denner, a nephew of the deceased, and admitted to be a contradictor to the said will.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The case made for the husband, to which the plea before the Court is responsive, is long and special. Its general outline is as follows:—It pleads his marriage with the deceased, then Sarah Clinch, widow, in 1810—that the deceased, in virtue of a marriage settlement which is exhibited, held the power of disposing of her property, then amounting to between twenty and thirty thousand pounds, by will—that, accordingly, in 1816, she made and executed a will through the agency of Mr. Hollest, of Farnham, her solicitor, bequeathing the bulk of her property to her husband, Dr. Lock, party in the cause—that, in 1819, whilst her said husband was under pecuniary difficulties, and even consequent personal restraint, Mr. Hollest prevailed with her, by representations that her property if left to him would go merely to benefit his creditors, to make a new will of a different tenor and effect, being that virtually propounded by her nephew, Denner, the other party in the cause—that the deceased, almost immediately, repented of having made this new will, and repeatedly expressed to her female attendant, Luff, to Astlet, her coachman, and to her sister, Mrs. Dean, her displeasure at the [355] part taken by Hollest, and her determination to make and execute a third will coinciding in substance with the first—that at different times she was on the point of invoking the aid, in this respect, of different attornies at Farnham, or in its neighbourhood, but was still prevented by some untoward accident, until she became too ill to carry her intentions into effect through the agency of a professional adviser; finally, that on the 13th of June, 1821, the day before that on which she died, the husband, at her earnest intreaty, wrote and prepared the will now propounded in his behalf; and that the deceased executed the same, by her mark, being, at that time, of sound and disposing mind and memory, and perfectly cognizant of the contents of the instrument; and that she so executed it in the presence of three witnesses, who subscribed their names as such to a common attestation clause. It is also pleaded that the deceased was, on several occasions happening between the latter end of 1819 and the spring of 1821, observed to be writing memoranda upon small pieces of paper, four of which memoranda of a testamentary nature pleaded to have been found after her death among her private papers of moment and concern, are exhibited; strongly inferring the probability, à priori, that the deceased would do what she is pleaded to have actually done, namely, make or execute a will, giving and bequeathing her property to her husband.(a)

[356] The above is a general outline of the husband's case, which, as I have already said, is long and special. The adverse case set up in this plea is that the husband obtained this will from the deceased when in extremis and in a state of utter incapacity, mental and bodily, by gross and direct fraud; and, in proof of this, it branches out into a great variety of particulars, to the relevancy of many of which it is that the principal objections urged to the admission of the plea in its present state have been addressed. In particular the plea charges that the testamentary memoranda exhibited on the part of the husband, and strongly inferring, as I have just said, the probability of a will in his favour, if genuine, are mere fabrications or forgeries; it even expressly alleges that the deceased, who is stated [357] to have been a coachman's widow, and in early life a domestic servant, was at all times, and down to the time of her death continued to be, so illiterate as to be incapable of reading any written instrument, or of writing more than her names; which she had been taught to do, with great difficulty, by tracing over the letters, previously written for her, of which her Christian and surname were composed.

Now, where a direct fraud is charged in a suit of this description, as in the present instance, the party charging it has, or should have, a latitude of pleading, hardly to be conceded in any other instance. Cases of fraud, if tolerably well concerted, are, generally speaking, only to be detected and defeated by inductions of particulars, many, perhaps, apparently trivial: so that to exclude these from a plea of this description would tend, in effect, to encourage fraud, by affording it, that is, its best chance for impunity. The sum or substance of the objections taken to this plea is that facts are alleged in it which bear too slightly, it is said, upon the point at issue to have any claim to be admitted. But in such a case it is difficult to say that any facts bear too slightly upon the point at issue which bear at all—for, of course, I do not mean to say that facts are pleadable which are, wholly, either immaterial, or irrelevant.

These observations, I think, go to dispose of nearly the whole substantial matter into which the objections urged against the admission of this allegation, in its present form, are resolvable. The Court will advert, however, briefly to one or two of these, by way of illustration of the general prin-[358]-ciples which it conceives applicable to the pleadings, generally, in cases of this nature.

For instance, it is said that the deceased's antenuptial history—her situation in early life as a domestic servant, and subsequent marriage to a coachman, has nothing to do with the case, and ought not to be pleaded. I entertain a different opinion. It is pleaded that the deceased was so illiterate as to be incapable of writing—in proof, this, that the testamentary memoranda exhibited, as I have said, on the part of the husband, are, what they are alleged to be, mere fabrications or forgeries. Now, it neither is nor can be denied that this illiteracy of the deceased is pleadable, as being a material fact in the cause. And being so, I am of opinion that her early history and connections are also pleadable as auxiliary evidences of that fact; to the Court's belief of which, without some intimation of these, her circumstances in after life would naturally present a serious, not to say insurmountable, obstacle.

Again—that the husband was under difficulties, and even, notwithstanding his clerical profession, a bankrupt, in the year 1819—that the deceased's goods, and household furniture, secured to her separate use by her marriage-settlement, were repeatedly taken in execution for his debts—that the husband, not merely by undue influence, but by harshness and severity, induced, or compelled, the deceased to sanction his applications to her trustees for advances of money—and that such accordingly were made to him by the said trustees at different times, to the amount of upwards of 12,000l.—all this, it is said, is foreign to the question of whether [359] the deceased executed this will, and is advanced in the plea for no other purpose than to discredit the husband, and by consequence to produce an impression on the mind of the Court unfavourable to his case. If the Court viewed these allegations in this light, it would instantly reject them. But I am inclined to consider them in another point of view. The will of 1819 is virtually set up in opposition to this propounded by the husband; it therefore appears to me that they are material to the real issue in the cause; for they go as well to negative that part of the husband's plea which charges the will of 1819 to have been wrung from the deceased by importunities and false suggestions, as to shew the improbability, under all the circumstances, of the deceased's revoking that will, and disposing of her property, as she is alleged to have done, without restriction or limitation, in her husband's favour.

It is pleaded again that, when the deceased had occasion to communicate with any person by letter, she invariably employed some friend or relative to write such letter for her, to which she usually subscribed her names. The pleading of this fact is not objected to, but an objection is taken to the number of letters so written and subscribed, annexed as exhibits, being altogether no fewer than eighteen, addressed at various times to her nephew Denner, party in the cause. It is observable, however, that these exhibits answer a double purpose. So far as the bodies go, they are material in support of the deceased's incapacity to write, and invariable employment of a third party to conduct her epistolary correspondence; an inference [360] which could not be fairly deduced from merely one or two exhibits of this description. So far, again, as the signatures are concerned, these are serviceable in another way. For it is pleaded that the testamentary memoranda exhibited on the part of the husband will appear, on a careful comparison, not to have been written by one and the same party who signed these exhibits; that party being expressly so pleaded the deceased in the cause. Now, if evidence of hand-writing by comparison be admissible at all, which it is too late to make a question of, at least in these Courts, the more numerous the standards of comparison furnished are, the more satisfactory that evidence is likely to be. So that, considering the double use to which these letters are applicable, I am not disposed to think the number exhibited, under the circumstances of this case, considerable as it is, altogether excessive or objectionable.

Again, it is pleaded that Sarah Luff and Betty Limpus, two of the subscribed witnesses, have repeatedly declared that they were desired to attest the pretended will by the husband, Dr. Lock—that the witness, Limpus, placed her mark, without knowing the nature of the instrument which she was attesting—and that no conversation whatever respecting a will, or the contents thereof, passed between the deceased and those about her at the time of the pretended execution, she being then in a dying state. The objection taken to this part of the plea is, that it goes merely to introduce "declarations," which the Court has been told it is hazardous to admit, and which, when admitted, are of little import. As evidence of fact, I grant this to be true [361] of declarations; but I understand them to be pleaded in this case as evidence to character; and as evidence to character, it is a known rule that declarations are receivable in all cases. It has always been held that the credit of a witness might be impeached, by shewing him to have made statements out of Court contrary to what he has sworn. For the purpose of impugning the testimony (presumed) of Luff and Limpus, these "declarations" may clearly be pleaded, and must go to proof.

Lastly, it being pleaded that Luff, upon quitting his service, was established in business as a milliner by Dr. Lock, near his own house, at Farnham; and that he pays or is responsible for the rent of her shop—this also is objected to as having no bearing upon the question. The husband, it is said, might surely advance an old servant of his deceased wife, without being suspected of bribing her to give false evidence, even though she happens, necessarily, to be a witness in his cause. To some extent I admit this; and if the witness referred to in this article were a mere casual witness, in an ordinary cause, I should be disposed to reject it. But the features of this case are somewhat extraordinary; in particular, here is a charge of gross and direct fraud—of gross and direct fraud to which, if it be, Luff must be privy, from the whole complexion of the husband's plea. She is not only a subscribed witness to the will, real or pretended, but she is vouched as a witness to nearly every material fact in the allegation which propounds it. Now, I do think that every circumstance, however slightly and collaterally only, affect-[362]-ing the credit or character of such a witness in such a case, may be fairly pleaded.

Upon the whole, then, the Court is disposed to consider the entire substance of this allegation admissible. As the present, however, is a case which must necessarily spread out into a great quantity of matter, it is peculiarly desirable to compress the allegation into the narrowest possible compass within which all the relevant facts can be fairly and adequately stated. It appears to me that it is objectionable in this particular in no common degree, and that it may be materially reduced in bulk, without any substantial curtailment, by the process which I am about to suggest. Its actual application would possibly be attended with little benefit in the present case, as nearly the whole extra expence occasioned by the diffuse mode of pleading practised in this instance may have been already incurred. Still, it may be fit that the Court should suggest it; in order to recommend its application in future similar cases.

In the first place, then, this allegation would be materially compressed, without any curtailment in point of substance, by omitting to recite the articles contradicted. The mere recitation of one article only of the former plea, contradicted in the present, occupies, I observe, five sides of paper. This is quite unnecessary and very objectionable, especially where it runs to this extreme length. It would be quite sufficient to plead, generally, that in opposition to such or such an article of the plea given in by the other party, the party proponent alleges and propounds, &c., and so to go on pleading contradictory facts.

[363] But, secondly, this allegation might be still further usefully abridged by not pleading, seriatim that is, contradictory facts even, which the party can produce no witness to, and in respect to which he can entertain no reasonable hope of deriving any benefit from the answers of the other party. For instance, the 21st article of this allegation is made to extend over several sheets of paper, by the statement, furnished by the party who propounds it, relative to the immediate factum of the disputed instrument, being negatived seriatim. As thus—that the said deceased "did not, upon the said 5th of June, 1821, the day of the date thereof, give verbal instructions and directions to the said Samuel Lock, party in this cause, to make and prepare her will—nor did the said Samuel Lock make and prepare a will for the deceased to execute, pursuant to such instructions and directions—nor was the same, after being prepared for execution, read over to, or by, the said Sarah Lock, deceased—nor did the said deceased know, or understand, the contents thereof, and like and approve of the same—nor did she (being from weakness incapable of subscribing her name) set her mark, and affix her seal thereto, or publish and declare the same as and for her last will, &c. &c." The party tendering the allegation plainly relies for success upon being able to prove, not this string of negatives, but the one affirmative fact pleaded at the conclusion of the article, inconsistent with the whole adverse statement respecting the factum of the alleged will—namely, that the said deceased "was, on the said 5th day of June, 1821, had been for some time before, and always afterwards continued to be, of unsound mind, memory and understanding, and utterly incapable of [364] any serious or rational act, requiring thought, judgment, and reflection." And this being so, I apprehend that it would have been quite sufficient for the party to have pleaded this one affirmative fact without pleading the string of negatives which precedes it at all, or at least without pleading these negatives seriatim, and in detail.

And here I may further observe that it is at best useless in pleading, generally speaking, to contradict, in detail, any statement which can only be spoken to by witnesses vouched to sustain it in the adverse plea. The party pleading in such case either does, or does not, make his vouchees witnesses. If he does, the other party can get at their evidence much more usefully to himself by cross-examining these, than by re-producing them upon a counter-plea; and merely to counterplead, without re-producing them (these being supposed the only capable witnesses to the statement), would answer no end. If, on the other hand, the party pleading does not make his vouchees witnesses, still the omission of a formal counter-plea, as to the particular statement, can do no injury, generally speaking, to the other party: for if persons are vouched in a plea, without being made witnesses, the party vouching them not merely fails in proof, but the ordinary, at least, inference is, that the persons vouched would, if made witnesses, have contradicted the plea. I can easily conceive the above liable to many exceptions—still I apprehend it to hold, as a general rule.

With these observations, which may be applied or not to the reform of this particular allegation, at the discretion of the counsel on both sides, as for the present, I admit the allegation.

[365] BELL v. ARMSTRONG. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, Bye-Day, 1822. —A next of kin, who has acquiesced in probate taken in common form, and has even received a legacy due to him as under a will, may still be at liberty to call in such probate, and put the executor on proof of that identical will per testes, first bringing in the legacy so received.

(On petition.)

William Bell, formerly of Upper George Street, Portman Square, but late of the Nunnery, at St. Margaret's, in Buckinghamshire, was the party deceased in this cause. He died in July, 1818; and in December, 1820, probate of his will, dated the 14th of April, 1817, was taken, in common form, by Richard Armstrong as sole executor and residuary legatee.

In April, 1822, a citation issued at the suit of John Bell, the brother, and only next of kin, and one of the executors and substituted residuary legatee named in a former will of the deceased dated the 21st of November, 1815, against the said Richard Armstrong (respectively parties in the cause), to bring in probate of the latter will, that of April, 1817, and shew cause why the same should not be revoked; and why the will itself should not be pronounced null and void. Mr. Armstrong appeared to this citation, under protest; and the present question arose upon the merits of that protest, subsequently extended into an act, which act had also been written to on the part of the next of kin.

For the party cited it was, in substance, alleged that William Bell, the deceased, left his house in the neighbourhood of Portman Square, for the benefit of his health, in the beginning of March, 1817, and took up his residence at that of George Saunders, with whom he had been long previously [366] acquainted, in the neighbourhood of Hemel Hempstead, where he died, in July, 1818, having first duly made and executed his last will, dated 14th April, 1817, wherein he appointed Richard Armstrong, the party cited, his sole executor and residuary legatee—that the said Richard Armstrong, on or about the 15th of March, 1817, communicated to John Bell, the other party in this cause, then resident in Cumberland, intelligence of such his brother's removal; having previously (to wit, on or about the 11th day of February, 1817) acquainted him with his said brother's precarious state of health, and incapacity to manage his affairs (an incapacity from which he afterwards, for a time, recovered), and advised him to come to town, as upon that account—that after the deceased had made his will as aforesaid (namely, about the 22d or 23d of April in that year), the said John Bell arrived in London, and was informed by the said Richard Armstrong (till then personally a stranger to him) that the said deceased had made his will since he had been at the house of the said George Saunders; and, at the same time, was recommended by the said Richard Armstrong, to go down to the said George Saunders's, in order to see and communicate with his said brother—that the said John Bell accordingly went to, upon the following day, and remained at, the said George Saunders's till the next morning; on which occasion he had full opportunity of seeing and conversing with his said brother, and of making any inquiries he might think fit relative to his said will, or upon any other subject—that in the latter part of 1817 the deceased, having sustained a relapse, was gradually reduced to a state of imbe-[367]-cility, in which state certain pretended codicils to the will of 1817 were procured from him, the validity of which, respectively, was contested by the said Richard Armstrong in two suits lately depending in this (the Prerogative) Court, described, respectively, as Maddy and Scott v. Armstrong, and Armstrong v.

Saunders—that the first of such suits was depending from August, 1818, to February, 1820, when the codicil propounded in it was pronounced to be null and void; shortly after which the second commenced, but was voluntarily abandoned by the party defending it towards the close of the said year (a)[1]—that, in the December of that year, probate of the said will was taken by the said Richard Armstrong, of which he remained in the undisturbed possession till May, 1822—that shortly after the said deceased's death the said John Bell came to London, and was informed of the said will, and pretended codicils; when, and afterwards, he expressed his entire acquiescence in the said will, and his hope that the said Richard Armstrong would succeed in his opposition to the said pretended codicils—that the said John Bell had full [368] knowledge of all the proceedings had in this (the Prerogative) Court in the two suits aforesaid, respecting the validity of the said codicils, and had ample opportunity of, at the same time, disputing that of the said will, had he been so disposed—that the existence of a copy of the deceased's former will of November, 1815, in which the said John Bell was named an executor and the substituted residuary legatee, was communicated to the said John Bell immediately after the deceased's death, who then declined having the same brought forward—and, lastly, that the said John Bell had taken and accepted, from the said Richard Armstrong, after probate, the balance (a)[2] of a legacy of 500l. bequeathed to him by that very will, the validity of which he was now seeking to overthrow. Under these circumstances it was prayed that the Judge would pronounce for the protest and dismiss the suit.

In opposition to this prayer it was, in substance, alleged, for the party who took out the citation, that the said deceased did not leave his house of his own accord, as for the benefit of his health or otherwise, at the time specified on behalf of the other party, for that of the said George Saunders; but that he was carried away, for sinister purposes, in pursuance of a plan formed by, and between, [369] Richard Armstrong, the other party, and the said George Saunders, to get the said deceased into their power and possession, and to take advantage of his childish and imbecile state, in order to obtain a will from him in their favour—that the pretended will of April, 1817, was not duly made and executed by the deceased; and that the same was prepared from instructions furnished by, and in the hand-writing of, the said Richard Armstrong—that the said John Bell, at the time of his visit to his said brother at Hemel Hempstead, although aware that he had made a will, was ignorant of the contents thereof, and in whose favour the same was made—that he had no adequate opportunity of communicating with his said brother, whom he found in a very weak and imbecile state both of mind and body, on that or any other subject, upon the occasion of such visit, by reason that the said George Saunders, his wife, or one of his family, was about the deceased nearly the whole time the said John Bell was with him; and that he was the less anxious upon that head, as confiding in the assurances of the said Richard Armstrong that his, the said John Bell's, interests should, at all events, be consulted and provided for—that if the said John Bell ever expressed an acquiescence in the provisions of the said pretended will, or a wish that the said Richard Armstrong might succeed in his opposition to the said pretended codicils, he did so in the expectation, created by the assurances of the said Richard Armstrong, that if he succeeded he would divide the said deceased's property among, or would otherwise most materially benefit with it, the family of the said deceased; for which family,

(a)[1] By the will of 1817 the residue, after payment of legacies (among which were legacies to George Saunders and his family, to the amount of 1500l.), was bequeathed to Richard Armstrong. That residue was now alleged, in real and personal property, to amount in value to 17,000l. By the first codicil the residue was purported to be given equally between Armstrong and Saunders—and by the second the whole of the residue was given to Saunders and his family, and only a legacy of 1000l. to Armstrong. The first of these codicils was dated in July, 1817—the second (the codicil, that is, first propounded, viz. in the suit of Maddy and Scott v. Armstrong) in March, 1818.

(a)[2] Namely, 200l. The sum of 300l. on account of the legacy of 500l., to which he was entitled under the will, had been advanced to him, pending the suit, by the administrator pending the suit, who was authorized in that behalf by the said Richard Armstrong, jointly with the other parties to the suit, Maddy and Scott.

he some-[370]-times declared that he was "fighting," and not for his own particular emolument—that the said John Bell had no knowledge whatever of the will of November, 1815, or the copy, prior to the month of June, 1821, when the latter, the copy, was communicated to him by William Harding, by whom the same had been taken or made, at the express instance of the deceased, in the year 1816.(a)[1]

In a rejoinder, on the part of Mr. Armstrong, it was denied that he the said Richard Armstrong had ever expressed himself in a manner which ought to, or could, have led the said John Bell to believe that he would divide the deceased's property among his relatives, in the event of succeeding in his opposition to the pretended codicils; but it was alleged that the said Richard Armstrong, having deter-[371]-mined to oppose the said codicils, did make an offer to the said John Bell to share the whole property in the event of being successful, provided the said John Bell was willing to incur, jointly with him, the trouble and expence of opposing the said codicils; which offer, however, the said John Bell declined to accept; expressing at the same time his entire concurrence in the bequest of the property (as his said brother had thought proper to make it) to the said Richard Armstrong.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. William Bell died in July, 1818, leaving a widow,(a)[2] and John Bell, his brother, and only next of kin. In the month of December, 1820, probate of his will, dated on the 14th of April, 1817, was taken by Richard Armstrong, the sole executor named in it, in common form, with the perfect cognizance, it must at least be admitted, of the deceased's brother, Mr. John Bell. In the month of April, however, in the present year 1822, a citation issued at the instance of this brother, calling upon the executor to bring in probate of this will so taken, and to shew cause why the same should not be revoked, and declared null and void. Mr. John Bell, the applicant, appears not only in the character of the sole next of kin of the deceased, but in that also of one of the executors, and the substituted residuary legatee, in a former will of the de-[372]-ceased, dated in November, 1815, a copy of which (for non constat what has become of the original) is annexed to his affidavit of scripts.

To the citation so taken out the party cited has appeared under protest—alleging grounds upon which he insists that the brother has forfeited his right of putting him on proof of the will, per testes. These alleged grounds have produced a counter-statement from the brother, upon which the executor has rejoined; and the question for the Court to determine is, whether, under the circumstances stated upon the one side and upon the other, the brother is, or is not, barred from putting the executor on proof, per testes, of the will. Now,

Next of kin, as such merely, are entitled to call for proof, per testes, of any deceased's will, of common right. If, indeed, the executor propounds and proves it per testes, of himself, which he may do—duly citing the deceased's next of kin to "see proceedings," all next of kin, so cited, generally speaking, are thereby for ever barred. Nay, if he so propounds and proves it against certain only of the deceased's next

(a)[1] The original of which said will, after being so copied, was deposited in the deceased's iron chest, the key of which was alleged, by the next of kin, to have been taken from the deceased's pocket by Elizabeth Saunders, wife of George Saunders, in the latter end of June, 1817, and to have been delivered to the said Richard Armstrong, for the purpose of opening the said chest—that the said Richard Armstrong came to London therewith, and went to the house of the said deceased; a few days after which the said chest was carried from the deceased's dwelling-house to the house of the said George Saunders, in one of his carts—lastly, that on the said William Harding making inquiries of the said Richard Armstrong concerning the said will, a few days after the deceased's funeral, the said Richard Armstrong said that "it had not been found." The answer to these allegations, on the part of Mr. Armstrong, merely was, that the key of the said chest "had been in his possession in or about the month of June, 1817, but that it had been returned to Saunders, without being made use of, or the chest having been opened by him, the said Richard Armstrong."

(a)[2] This widow was admitted to have been under restraint, as non compos, from a period anterior to the death of the deceased in the cause. What, the Court inquired, in the course of the argument, was to prevent her, or some one in her behalf, from calling in the probate, and putting the executor on proof of the will?

of kin, without having cited them all, the others, even though uncited, if to a certain extent privy to, and aware of, the suit shall not put the executor on proof, per testes, of the will, so once already proved, a second time. This was the case of Newell and King v. Weeks, decided here in Hilary Term, 1814,(a)[1] the principle of which has been recognized, and acted upon, in other instances.

But no such bar to the exercise of this common [373] right on the part of the next of kin exists in the present case that I am able to discover. The will itself has never been propounded—its validity has never been put in issue by any party. In the suits respecting certain supposed or pretended codicils, lately depending in this Court, no party was before it who had an interest to controvert its validity. Not the supporters of the codicils respectively—on the contrary, the will was the very basis of the instruments which they were seeking to substantiate. The brother, again, had no inducement to intervene in the suits touching the validity of these codicils—if the codicils or either of them, were established, there was an end of any possible interest that he could have to impugn the will. But the codicils being both set aside, he has a manifest interest to impugn it—an interest which I am not of opinion that he is barred from pursuing, by what the executor has alleged, giving him credit even for the truth of the whole of his protest.

Much is insisted in the protest on the brother's acquiescence in the executor's taking probate of the will. Now, without at all adverting to the grounds upon which that acquiescence is said to have been founded, I may observe that a mere acquiescence (that is, an acquiescence accounted for by no special circumstances) on the part of the next of kin, to an executor's taking probate, is no bar whatever to his calling it in and putting the executor on proof of the will. If it were, no probate could be called in by a next of kin, unless immediately upon its becoming known to him that probate had been taken—the very contrary of which is matter of every day's experience.

[374] Nor, again, is acquiescence a bar, even though accompanied, as in this case, by receipt of a legacy, under the very will sought to be controverted. This has been determined in a great variety of cases. For instance, in that of Core and Spencer, which occurred here in 1796, where Spencer, the executor, was cited to bring in the probate of a will taken in 1788, eight years before, at the suit of Core, whose mother had received an annuity under that will for five of the eight years, and she, Core herself, her mother dying at the end of the fifth year, for the remaining three. Spencer, in that case, appeared under protest, as the executor has in this, and contended that Core was barred from putting him on proof of the will. But the Court thought otherwise, and over-ruled the protest. That, however, was an infinitely stronger case to build this argument upon than the present, if mere acquiescence and receipt of a legacy could bar. In the judgment delivered by my predecessor,(a)[2] in the case of Core and Spencer, he adverted to various cases,(b) all authorities to the same point. At the same time it was held in every one of these (and indeed they were principally cited, in that case of Core and Spencer, for the purpose of shewing) that the legatee must bring in his legacy before being permitted to contest the will—under the authority of which, I hold that I am bound, in overruling this protest, to direct the legacy to be brought in before the brother proceeds. The bringing in of his legacy will be a test of the since-[375]-rity of his opposition to the validity of the will; and will prove it to be not merely vexatious. At the same time it will be a security to the executor, in case of the next of kin being condemned in costs: for I hold that a next of kin (or the executor of a former will, for the same reasons apply in both cases) who calls in a probate once taken, even though in common form, and puts the executor upon proof, per testes, of his will, does it at the peril of costs—his ordinary exemption from liability to costs upon such occasions not extending to one of this particular description.

The case of nearest resemblance to the present, in which a protest was admitted, and the executor dismissed, is that, which has been cited in the argument, of Hoffman and White v. Norris (see 2 Phillimore, 230). At the same time, though similar to it in one important feature, it is distinguished from it in a great variety of particulars. It is true that in that, as in this, case the will had never been propounded, and probate had been taken only in common form. In that case, however, there had been an acquiescence, not even attempted to be accounted for by any special circumstances, of nine years. In a suit, too, in Chancery, arising out of that will soon after probate, Hoffman, the next of kin taking out the citation, in his answers had admitted both the will and the probate (b)—a decree in Chancery had followed, operating upon a lapsed legacy in that will—and under that decree (not as upon an intestacy) Hoffman had persisted in acting [376] for five years together—namely, by receiving, during all that time, interest upon a portion of such lapsed legacy, to which he was entitled in his character as next of kin. The will itself, again, had been written by the deceased himself, all propriâ manu, nearly five years before his death, in India—and not a circumstance was even suggested which could excite a reasonable suspicion or doubt of its genuineness and validity in that case. Here, on the contrary, independent of other obvious distinctions, the will itself is by no means devoid of suspicion, on the face of the transaction; although (if I have a right impression of the general complexion of the evidence taken in the suit respecting the validity of the codicil) there may be no great prospect of the next of kin opposing it successfully. It is admitted that the deceased, at the time of executing the will, was in a state of considerable general debility—the instructions are in the hand-writing of the executor, and party principally benefited—lastly, a codicil made, after no very long interval, has been actually set aside by the Court on the score of the testator's incapacity. Nor is the situation, both local and pecuniary, of the next of kin, Mr. John Bell, a small farmer in a remote district, the county of Cumberland, a circumstance by any means to be left out of the account. Upon these considerations I over-rule the protest—but shall feel myself bound to dismiss the executor from the effect of the citation, if the legacy be not brought in, so that the suit may proceed within a reasonable time.

Protest over-ruled—question of costs directed to stand over till the final hearing of the cause.

[377] POPPLE v. CUNISON AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, Bye-Day, 1822.—"Instructions for a will," so headed and indorsed, and how imperfect soever in themselves, if proved to have been signed by a deceased (even many years before her death) with intent to render them operative pro tanto, in the event of her dying without any further act done, are entitled to probate.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Jane Faulding, late of Coventry Street, in the parish of St. James, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, widow (the party deceased in this cause), died on the 8th day of August, 1822, leaving behind her two sisters, and several nephews and nieces, the children of three deceased brothers, entitled, in distribution, to her personal estate and effects, in the event of her being pronounced to have died intestate.

The following testamentary paper, purporting to be instructions for a will of the deceased, bearing date the 13th of October, 1819, was propounded on behalf of Mary Popple, widow, a principal annuitant, or legatee, named in the same, one of the deceased's sisters, and was opposed on the part of Ann Cunison, widow, the other sister:—

"13th October, 1819.

"Instructions for the will of Mrs. Jane Faulding, of Coventry Street:—25l. per year to Maria Wilson, widow of William Wilson, for life, and after her decease the sum of 500l. to be equally divided between William, Thomas, and Eleanor, three of the children of the said Maria Wilson, to be paid within twelve months after her decease, with interest in the mean time; to Ann Cunison, of Brehwood, sister of Mrs. Faulding, 25l. per year for her life, and after her death the sum of 500l. equally to be divided between her children, to be paid within twelve months after her decease, with [378] interest in the mean time; 100l. a-piece to Eleanor, Mary, Jane, and Fanny, daughters of Mrs. Faulding's late brother, Andrew Wilson, late of Stifford, to the period within twelve months after Mrs. Faulding's decease; to Mary Ann Wilson, daughter of Mrs. Faulding's late brother John Wilson, her watch, trinkets, and clothes; to Mrs. Mary Popple, sister of Mrs. Faulding, an annuity of one hundred pounds per annum for her life, to be payable quarterly, on the usual quarterly days, and as to the residue of Mrs. Faulding's property, the disposition thereof to be deferred for the present; the sum of 5l. each to Mrs. Maria Tipping, of Saint Martin's Lane, Elizabeth, Sarah, and Caroline Reed, of Grafton Street, Fitzroy Square, to purchase mourning rings; to Miss Sophia Stratton, of Kennington, the sum of fifty pounds, to be paid at her age of twenty-one years. "JANE FAULDING."

(Indorsed)

"13th Oct. 1819,

"Mrs. Jane Faulding,

"Instructions for Will."

The allegation propounding this paper pleaded to the following effect:—

1. The first article pleaded that the deceased died on the 8th of August, 1822, at the age of about sixty years, in consequence of an apoplectic stroke on the 5th of August, three days preceding; and that from such period to that of her death she, the deceased, was so greatly affected as to her speech and bodily powers as to be unable to make herself understood by the persons about her.

[379] 2. The second article pleaded that the deceased, for the last eight or nine years of her life, had been intimate with Mr. Christopher Bedingfield, an attorney at Gravesend—that, on the 13th of October, 1819, she advised confidentially with the said Christopher Bedingfield, on the subject of her will, who, in her presence, and pursuant to her instructions, drew up the paper writing propounded in the cause—that the deceased approved of the same and "was apprized that by executing the said paper it would operate as her will in the event of her dying without doing any further testamentary act"—and that, in testimony of such approval, and with intent to render the said paper writing operative in such event, she subscribed the same, and after so doing delivered it to the said Christopher Bedingfield for safe custody.

3. The third article pleaded that, about six months after the above, Mr. Bedingfield called upon the deceased at her house in Coventry Street, and inquired "whether she had determined as to the disposition of the residue of her property;" to which the deceased replied that "she had not then, but would speak to him about it at Gravesend," where she promised to make him a visit shortly.

4. The fourth article pleaded that the deceased actually went on a visit to Mr. Bedingfield, at Gravesend, in August, 1821; but that Mr. Bedingfield misapprehending, from something said by the deceased, that she had been consulting another solicitor on the subject of her will, and being unwilling to obtrude his professional assistance, never mentioned the subject of her will, and that nothing relative to it ever passed between him and the deceased either then or subsequently.

[380] 5, 6. The fifth and sixth articles pleaded merely the hand writing of the signature, and the custody of the paper by Bedingfield from the day upon which it was written till after the death of the deceased.

The admissibility of this allegation was denied, as pleading facts incapable of sustaining the paper propounded. It was said the paper is imperfect as a will in every respect—it is a mere list of legacies, leaving the residue of the deceased's property undisposed of—it appoints no executor—it is headed and it is indorsed "Instructions for a will" merely. To sustain such a paper under the circumstances of the case would require more stringent proof of the deceased's intending it to operate than evidence taken upon this allegation is likely to furnish. The single witness vouched to the material part of the allegation is Bedingfield. All he can be expected to say is that the deceased gave these instructions—that she signed them—and "was apprized" (not stating how, or by whom, or under what limitations) that the instructions so signed would, in a certain event, operate as her will. The just inference from no more being pleaded is that Bedingfield knows, and can say, no more; and it was argued that it would be extremely mischievous, on general principles, to pronounce on such evidence for a paper so imperfect; the very existence of which the deceased had apparently not adverted to for years, and perhaps had forgotten.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. I think it is too much for the Court, in this stage of the cause, to anticipate with the counsel against [381] the admission of this allegation what may be the final effect of Mr. Bedingfield's evidence upon the allegation. That evidence may be such as to leave the case pretty much in the condition in which he has sought to place it: on the other hand, it may so satisfy the Court, as to the deceased's persuasion, that this paper would operate, pro tanto, in case of her dying otherwise intestate, as to render it the duty of the Court to pronounce for it, even in its apparently imperfect state. I think therefore that I am bound to let in this evidence, by admitting the allegation. It will be open to the other party, by cross examining, to sift and probe this gentleman as to the grounds of his belief that the deceased's persuasion was that just described, assuming him so to depose—a process which will enable the Court to judge of the extent and degree, to and in which this persuasion was felt by the deceased—assuming her again, that is, to have felt so persuaded at all. If the result should be a conviction, on the mind of the Court, that the deceased signed these instructions, not merely to authenticate them as instructions, but to give them dispositive force and effect, in case of her doing no farther, or other, testamentary act, it will be imperative on the Court to carry her intentions into effect so far, by decreeing administration with these instructions annexed. If the evidence fail to produce that conviction, the party must be pronounced to have died wholly intestate, and a general administration must accordingly be decreed. Without, therefore, at all anticipating what may be the final judgment of the Court in this cause, it is, for these reasons, one which I think myself not au-[382]-thorized to put a stop to, in limine, by rejecting this allegation.

Allegation admitted.(a)

(a) This allegation was admitted on the bye-day after Michaelmas Term (4th of December), 1822. On the 1st of January following, 1823, Mr. Bedingfield died, without having been examined upon it. On the fourth Session of Hilary Term, the 13th February, a second allegation was given in on behalf of Mrs. Popple, the party who propounded the instructions, pleading the death, character, and hand-writing of Mr. Bedingfield; and, further, in substance, pleading that a copy of the allegation admitted (as above) propounding these instructions had been sent, in the first instance, to Mr. Bedingfield, and that Mr. Bedingfield after examining the same with his clerk, Mr. Pearson, had returned it to the proctor of Mrs. Popple duly settled and approved, with the following indorsement:—"18th November, 1822, examined and settled allegation re Faulding with Mr. Pearson." Annexed to this allegation was the draft allegation itself, so settled and approved, and so indorsed by Mr. Bedingfield. The admission of this allegation was also opposed on the part of Mrs. Cunison.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. I admit so much of the allegation as pleads the death, character, and hand-writing of Mr. Bedingfield, the writer of the instructions. The party pleading is entitled to the admission of this part of her allegation. The loss of Mr. Bedingfield's evidence may be fatal to her case; he may have been, and probably was, the only person who could speak to the deceased's intention that these instructions should operate, in a certain event, as her will. At the same time I cannot assume that Bedingfield was the single witness capable of speaking to this, though no other person is vouched—evidence upon this head may be to be had in some other quarter. The suit therefore may still proceed, notwithstanding the loss of Bedingfield's testimony; in which case the death, character, and hand-writing of that gentleman, he having been the writer of the paper propounded, may, and should, be pleaded and proved.

The rest of this allegation I think inadmissible. Its purpose obviously is to impress upon the Court that Mr. Beding-[383]-field's evidence, if taken, would have sustained the plea. But the Court will infer that, generally, without this part of the allegation now tendered—and with it, it can do no more—so that rejecting this part of it is no real disservice to the party who presses for its admission. The Court may fairly, and will, presume that the original plea was drawn up from instructions given by the solicitor, and that his evidence, if taken upon, would in the main, and generally speaking, have supported the plea. The Court's pronouncing for these instructions, indeed, upon that presumption alone (if the loss of Bedingfield's evidence is really incapable of being supplied, aliunde), is another question.

Allegation admitted as reformed.*

* This cause came to a final hearing on the fourth Session of Trinity Term (1823), on the evidence taken upon the original plea, and upon this allegation as reformed. But there being, in consequence of the death of Mr. Bedingfield, no evidence whatever upon the material parts of the original plea, namely, that, propounding the instruc-

WARBURTON v. BURROWS AND PINFOLD. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, Bye-Day, 1822. — An unexecuted will pronounced for — the presumption against it arising from the testator having delayed to execute it for two months after it had been fair copied for execution, being held to be rebutted by circumstances going to shew that it had received his final approval, and that such delay merely proceeded from a habit of procrastination—the testator having, at last, died suddenly by apoplexy.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

William Chillingworth by his will, bearing date the 19th of February, 1811, executed in the presence of three witnesses, gave and devised certain leasehold and freehold estates, situate and being in the parish of St. Giles, Oxford, to his niece Mary Warburton. The rest and residue of his estate, after legacies of 500l. each, to his brother [384] Mr. Thomas Chillingworth, and his brother-in-law Mr. George Warburton, the testator bequeathed to his nieces, the said Mary Warburton, and her sister Hannah Warburton (both of whom the will recites to be then living with him), in equal moieties.

In the month of November, 1821, the deceased gave instructions for a new will, the draft of which, being prepared, was read over to and approved by him, and was fair copied for execution on the 21st of December following. The purport of this instrument was to substitute the testator's niece, Hannah Warburton, for her sister Mary, as devisee of the freehold and leasehold estates—to revoke the legacies of 500l. each to his brother and brother-in-law, Mr. Thomas Chillingworth and Mr. Warburton,(a) and to constitute his niece, Hannah Warburton, sole residuary legatee. But on the 20th of February following the deceased died without having executed the same.

The present question arose upon the admission of an allegation, propounding this unexecuted will on the part of Miss Hannah Warburton. It was opposed by Messrs. Burrows and Pinfold, joint executors of the will of 1811, on the ground that the deceased could not be presumed, from the statement furnished by it, to have given the unexecuted paper his final approbation, as nearly two months elapsed between the time of the paper being ready for execution and the death of the deceased, without the allegation assigning, as they contended, any satisfactory reason for this delay.

[385] The allegation in substance pleaded—

1. That subsequent to the will of February, 1811, giving and devising as above, to wit, in February, 1812, the testator's niece, Mary Warburton, intermarried with Edward Bowle Symes, and that the said testator, upon occasion of that marriage, settled by deed upon his said niece the sum of 2000l., payable within the space of twelve calendar months from his decease.

2. That the deceased, having a mind and intention to alter his will in favour of his niece Hannah Warburton, particularly in consequence of the provision made for her sister Mary Warburton, by deed, as above, gave instructions to his solicitor to prepare a new will for him, in or about the month of November, 1821—that his said solicitor prepared a draft will accordingly, which was read over to, and approved by, the said deceased, and was fair copied for execution on the 21st of the following December.

3. That soon after the said fair copy had been so prepared for execution his said solicitor discovered, in conversation with the testator, that he had omitted to specify in his instructions a leasehold estate, situate in Broad Street, Oxford, which he had then lately purchased—whereupon the said testator caused the words, "And also all that my other leasehold tenement, &c. in Broad Street, Oxford," to be interlined (in order to supply a similar omission) in the said fair copy or will. That after the said interlineation the testator was two or three times apprized by his said solicitor, who was in the habit of occasionally calling upon him, that his will was ready for execution —that, in particular, he was so [386] apprized one day about a fortnight before his death, when his said solicitor proposed to go home and fetch the will, in order to its being then, presently, executed; upon which the said testator declared that "there was no hurry," and that "he would execute the same another time."

tions, the Court pronounced against these, and decreed a general administration to the sister Mrs. Popple.

The costs, on both sides, were directed to be paid out of the estate.

(a) Quære, whether the latter of these, if not both, had not died in the interval between the two wills?

4. The fourth article pleaded the deceased's sudden death, by apoplexy, on the 20th of February, 1822. And,

The fifth was the usual concluding article, praying the Judge to pronounce for the force and validity of the said unexecuted paper.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. William Chillingworth, the party deceased in this cause, made a will in favour of his nieces, Mary and Hannah Warburton. Mary, the elder, was principally benefited, though the sisters were joint residuary legatees. This was in 1811; at which time it appears by the will that both sisters were living with him. In the following year, however, Mary Warburton marries; upon which occasion the deceased settles 2000l. on her, by deed, payable within twelve months after his decease.

Now, this circumstance of the settlement renders it highly improbable that the deceased, at any time subsequent to it, meant to abide by the will of 1811. The settlement was a part execution of the benefit intended for Mary Warburton by the will of 1811. Still, the fact is that no step is taken by the deceased to alter this will of 1811 until 1821, that is, for ten years, when a new will is prepared; and is actually copied out for execution, under circumstances which satisfy me that the testator's mind was, at that time, [387] fully made up to the provisions which it purports to contain.

But this paper is still unexecuted after a lapse of two months, when the deceased dies, and the question is whether the circumstances stated in the allegation are sufficient to repel the legal presumption against it, arising from this delay of the testator to execute this instrument. Upon the whole, I am inclined to think that they are sufficient. The interlineation as to "the leasehold messuage in Broad Street, Oxford," is evidence that the testator adhered to the instrument up to that time. And although, when pressed to execute it about "a fortnight before his death," his declining so to do is a fact from which, per se, the legal inference undoubtedly is that he was wavering and undecided, still, viewed in connection with the circumstances of the case, and the deceased's declarations at the time, it suggests another inference: these, I think, warrant the Court's imputing it to a mere habit of procrastination, and negative any suspicion to which his deferring its execution might otherwise give rise, that the instrument had not received his final approval. The deceased, upon that occasion, suggests no doubt, nor intimates any wish to reconsider—he merely puts off, to a more convenient season, the completion of the instrument—he says, "There is no hurry"—he "will execute it another time." Lastly, the deceased is pleaded to have died suddenly, by apoplexy, on the 20th of February in the present year. Now, these circumstances, considering the high probability that the deceased should alter his will in favour of his niece Hannah, in consequence of the marriage-[388]-settlement upon her sister Mary—considering how deliberately these instructions were given and approved—considering how little this instrument wants of being a perfect will and the late declaration of the deceased that he "would" render it such, although there was "no hurry"—I am disposed to hold that the Court may conscientiously pronounce for the validity of the paper propounded, if the alleged facts are proved; on the ground that the deceased had given it his final approval, and was only prevented from formally executing it by the intervention of sudden death. Accordingly, I shall afford the party who propounds it an opportunity of substantiating her case by admitting this allegation.

Allegation admitted.(a)

[389] LEMANN v. BONSALL. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1823.—The factum of a nuncupative will requires to be proved by evidence more strict and stringent than that of a written one, in addition to all the several requisites to its validity, under the Statute of Frauds, being duly proved, to entitle it to probate.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit respecting the validity of a nuncupative will. Nuncupative wills are not favourites with courts of probate; at the same time, if duly proved, they are equally entitled to be pronounced for with written wills.

(a) This cause came to a final hearing on the 4th Session of Hilary Term, 1823—when, the allegation being held to be proved, the Court pronounced for the unexecuted will.

Much more is requisite, however, to the due proof of a nuncupative will than of a written one in several particulars. In the first place, numerous restrictions are imposed upon such wills by the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 19); the provisions of which must be, it is held, strictly complied with to entitle any nuncupative will to probate. Consequently, the absence of due proof of strict compliance with any one of these (that enjoining a rogatio testium, for instance (b)) is fatal, at once, to a case of this species. But, added to this, and independent of the Statute of Frauds altogether, the factum of a nuncupative will requires to be proved by evidence more strict and stringent than that of a written one, in every single particular. This is requisite in consideration of the facilities with which frauds in setting up nuncupative [390] wills are obviously attended—facilities which absolutely require to be counteracted by Courts insisting on the strictest proof as to the "facta" of such alleged wills. Hence the testamentary capacity of the deceased and the animus testandi at the time of the alleged nuncupation must appear, in the case of a nuncupative will, by the clearest and most indisputable testimony. Above all, it must plainly result from the evidence that the instrument propounded contains the true substance and import, at least, of the alleged nuncupation; and consequently that it embodies the deceased's real testamentary intentions, though not so reduced into writing during his or her life as to be capable of being propounded as a written will. For unless the Court is morally certain, by pronouncing for it, of carrying these and no other into effect, it is obviously its duty not to give any alleged will, much less a nuncupative one, the sanction of its probate.

The deceased in this cause was Elizabeth Jones. She died a spinster somewhat advanced in years, in the service of Lord Lisburne, at Crosswood, near Aberystwith, in Cardiganshire, where she had lived, during the last nine years of her life, as housekeeper. The deceased had paid a visit to London in the July preceding her death, returning to Crosswood on the 4th of August. In travelling home she caught a violent cold, terminating in fever, by being exposed to a severe shower on the outside of a stage coach; of which she died in less than three weeks, namely, on the evening of the 18th of August. Her next of kin are a niece and a nephew, if indeed the latter be still living. For this nephew went to South America some years back; neither does it seem to be [391] known whether he is living or dead, nor whether, if the latter, his death did or did not precede that of the deceased in the cause. The niece of the deceased is Mrs. Lemann, the party opposing this will.

Bonsall, the other party who propounds it, and whom it purports solely to benefit, is a young woman of five or six and twenty. She is daughter of Lord Lisburne's game-keeper, at Crosswood, who lives in a cottage upon the estate, distant about half a mile from the mansion-house. This daughter, Mary Bonsall, was hired by the deceased, in the May preceding her death, to clean the house and perform other menial offices, and in fact was the only under female servant at Crosswood from this period to that of the deceased's death, Lord Lisburne's family being abroad. She and a nurse attended the deceased during her last illness.

The words constituting the will propounded are alleged to have been spoken in the Welch language. They are to this effect:—

"Listen you all what I Elizabeth Jones do say—it is my last prayer to give all I possess to the little girl here, Mary Bonsall, and I do not want to see any of my family."

The principal witness to the factum of this will is William Davies, who is described as a farmer, aged fifty-five years, and whose evidence is in substance as follows:—After stating his intimacy with the deceased (whom he says that he used to mend pens for, and assist in writing to Lord Lisburne, &c.), and that he resides within three fields of the house at Crosswood, he goes on to depose that on Thursday, the 17th day of August, 1820, as he well remembers, having heard that the deceased was very ill, he and his wife, Jane Davies, went to see [392] her at Lord Lisburne's house, at Crosswood, about seven o'clock in the evening. They went into her bed-room and found the deceased in bed. She appeared to be in great pain, and the deponent saw, by her countenance, or at least he thought from the appearance of it, that she was going to die—her little girl Mary Bonsall (so called it seems from her diminutiveness in point of size, and not as with reference to her age) was in the room with her, as also, the deponent thinks, was Jones the nurse. The deponent's wife shook hands with the deceased, and the deceased said that she was glad to see her; but she spoke with great difficulty, and appeared to be in a good deal of pain, and Mary Bonsall was cleansing her mouth from the phlegm, a considerable quantity of which appeared to be about her mouth, and to impede her utterance. The deponent, seeing the situation of the deceased, did not intend to speak to her; and he accordingly took a chair, and sat down in a corner of the room; but, in a short time, the deceased beckoned him to her, and gave him her hand, and then, addressing the deponent and his wife, desired them to remember her in their prayers—adding some words of ejaculation in the Welch language. The deponent asked her if she had any relations, and, upon her answering "a niece and nephew," inquired whether she would permit him to write to either; but the deceased replied that she did not wish to see either of them. She also said something to the effect that the little girl (meaning Mary Bonsall) was the only person that she wanted to see. The deponent then left the room, and, when just outside the door, called to his wife to accompany him home, as the harvest people would want their supper. The deceased asked what they [393] were saying, and, on the deponent's wife saying that she was wanted to go home, the deceased made her promise to see her again the next day. Just then the deceased or Jones (the deponent forgets which) called to the deponent to come back; and, on his returning, the deceased, in the presence of deponent his wife, and Jones the nurse, expressed herself to the following effect:—"Listen you all, &c." This deponent adds the Welch words made use of by the deceased, as nearly as he can recollect them. He says "that the deceased uttered these words in a very serious manner, and apparently quite of her own accord, and in a much firmer tone than any thing she had before said on that evening; and the deponent verily believes that she seriously meant them to remain as her will, and that her property should go as thereby expressed. She did not say anything else to the persons present in allusion to her will that the deponent remembers; but he understood that, by the words deposed of, she meant to desire him, and the other persons present, to take notice, and remember that what she then said was her will, and to bid them bear witness that it was so." He further says that "he verily believes the deceased to have been, at the time of which he has just deposed, of sound mind, memory, and understanding. He saw nothing to the contrary—he did not observe a single word amiss that she said, though she was very ill as to bodily health—she seemed perfectly to know and understand what she said and did." This witness speaks to nearly the same effect, upon interrogatories which have been addressed to him on the part of Mrs. Lemann—and is confirmed, in substance, by the other witnesses, Jane Davies [394] (his wife) and Jones, who duly attested the words so uttered by the deceased, after the same had been reduced into writing by the deponent Davies himself, about breakfast time the following morning.

Such is the sum of the evidence tendered in support of this instrument; and I think that it results from that evidence, if not wholly discredited, that it is a good nuncupative will, any thing in the statute of frauds, at least, notwithstanding, provided the words, "Listen all of you what I, Elizabeth Jones, do say," are to be deemed a sufficient "rogatio testium" within the statute. The Court is by no means prepared to say that they are not to be so deemed: but this is a point upon which it would be understood to decide nothing, as the question respecting the validity of this will may be satisfactorily disposed of upon other, and different, considerations. For when the Court looks attentively to the evidence, of which the sum has already been stated, to the factum of this instrument, it is bound to pronounce, especially as contrasted with the adverse testimony, of which I shall say a word, presently, respecting the deceased's capacity at the time of the alleged nuncupation, that it is, in the highest degree, unsatisfactory, and that in the most material particulars.

1. And, first, that the correct substance of the words spoken by the deceased, admitting her to have uttered something of the sort, is embodied in the instrument now propounded to the Court, is very questionable upon this evidence. They are uttered but once—no repetition of them is demanded—no explanation is either given or required. No questions are put, such as "Were these your words?" or [395] "Do I rightly understand you?" or "Are such your wishes with regard to the disposal of your property?" No pains, in short, are taken to sift and probe the deceased's intentions on this head—no precaution of the kind is pretended to have been used. The deceased, however, to say nothing, at present, as to her mental capacity, was, at this period, in a state of bodily infirmity, which must be presumed to have rendered it difficult to collect the true import of what fell from her at all; much more that of a period of this length, only once enunciated. Her dissolution, then rapidly approaching, actually took place within little more than twenty-four hours of that time; and Davies, it will be seen, admits that she "spoke with great difficulty," and that Bonsall was employed in cleansing her lips, from time to time, of phlegm which collected about them so as to "impede her utterance." And yet the omission, or misapprehension, of a single monosyllable, would alter the whole tenor and effect of the will, as propounded. For instance, instead of "all I possess," absolutely, read "all the clothes I possess," or "all I possess here," and the whole effect of the nuncupation is different. It must be admitted, however, that either of these would be a more probable bequest from the deceased to a girl in Bonsall's condition, than that of her whole funded and other property, estimated at 15 or 1600l., the savings of a life of parsimony. But the Court, I have said, is bound not to pronounce for a nuncupative will, under any circumstances, without being assured that it is the true substance and import of the alleged nuncupation which presents itself to it for probate to a moral certainty—a species of assurance on this head, [396] which, I am bound to say, is not afforded to it by the evidence in the present case by any means.

And here I may further observe by the way that, so far as the probabilities of the case in general are concerned, these are decidedly hostile to the will. The intention of the deceased to make any will is rendered very unlikely by the circumstance that although her illness was gradual, and she was early impressed with a sense of its probable termination, yet still that she neither expressed nor hinted at any wish to dispose of her property, as by will, at all. And her intention of making a will to the effect of that propounded will appear less likely still, when I say that, independent of proofs of regard for Mrs. Lemann evinced by the deceased during her late visit to London, the evidence satisfies me that she had a strong dislike to the Bonsalls, generally, although perhaps slightly partial to this girl, Mary Bonsall, for services rendered to her in her last sickness. The circumstance so much relied on of her declining to send for Mrs. Lemann in her last sickness, she, Mrs. Lemann, being a wife, a mother, and resident 200 miles off, in London, might have proceeded from a feeling the very contrary to that which it has been ascribed to, namely, disaffection to her niece.

2. But, secondly and principally, how does the evidence stand with respect to this deceased's capacity at the time of the alleged nuncupation? Without going minutely into the evidence on this part of the case, it will be sufficient to state the decided impression of the Court as to its general result.

The nuncupation, it will be remembered, is alleged to have taken place on the evening of the 17th of [397] July, the deceased having died on the following evening. Now it is proved completely, to my satisfaction, by the evidence of four witnesses above exception, of Mr. Williams's, senior and junior, the apothecaries, of Mr. Jones, a clergyman, who attended to pray by her on the evening of the same 17th of July, and of M'Cullock, the butler, who was in the house with the deceased during all her sickness, and positively deposes to having seen her four or five times in the course of that day, that at the time of the asserted nuncupation the deceased was delirious and incapable. Williams, senior, deposes to professional visits at Crosswood, on Monday, the 14th; Tuesday, the 15th; and Wednesday, the 16th of July; and to finding the deceased, on the last of these days, in a state of at least incipient delirium. This deponent, being otherwise engaged, did not see the deceased after the 16th—she was visited on the 17th and 18th by his son, and fellow deponent, Williams, junior, who speaks of her, upon both those days, as thoroughly delirious and incapable. Williams, junior, and Mr. Jones, were with the deceased, together, on the evening of the 17th, a very short time only before the asserted nuncupation; and they concur in representing her in the state which I have just described, at that time, in which they are confirmed by M'Cullock. The witnesses last named, I should observe, are examined upon an allegation given in by the next of kin, pleading the deceased to have been in a state of mental incapacity for about four days before, and down to the time of her death. And yet not only Davies and his wife, and Jones the other witness, depose (upon Bonsall's allegation) pretty unreservedly to her capacity on the evening [398] of the 17th, the time of the nuncupation; but this last, Jones, who nursed her through her illness, ventures to swear, in answer to an interrogatory, that the deceased at no time during her illness appeared to her to be insane. She says "there did not seem to be any thing the matter with her mind prior (at any time prior, that is) to her death. Respondent never saw her delirious—nor ever heard her talk in a wild or irrational manner."

Now this evidence on Bonsall's part, as to the deceased's capacity, is not only plainly and palpably untrue, but it induces a strong suspicion that her case is a fraudulent one altogether. And this suspicion is confirmed to my mind by the following consideration:—The deceased, who is represented on the evening of this 17th as breaking forth into this nuncupation, just as Davies and his wife, with whom she had no particular intimacy, had taken leave, all of a sudden, and without any previous intimation, is made to express herself, at the same time, in a manner highly technical; even reciting her name—"Listen you all what I Elizabeth Jones do say." But that the deceased should have practised this formality of a rogatio testium, unless previously suggested to her, is exceedingly unlikely. How was she to become aware of any "rogatio testium" being necessary? Davies's knowledge of this, on the contrary, is easy enough to be accounted for. He, it seems, was a person of some experience in this matter; for he says that his mother had made a nuncupative will, which "came to nothing," by reason of a certain informality. He therefore might, well enough, be acquainted with the several formal requisites to the validity of a nuncupative will; and [399] the phrase just recited is much less likely to have fallen from the deceased, in the manner represented, than to be the result of an attempt on Davies's part to bring this case within the Statute of Frauds, as to a "rogatio testium," in my view and apprehension of it.

I pronounce therefore against this nuncupative will, as not satisfactorily proved. And I think that I am bound, as a check upon future attempts of a similar nature, to accompany this sentence with a decree for costs against Bonsall, even although she is suitor in this cause in formâ pauperis. At the same time I reserve this question of costs for further order, on taxation; then to be proceeded in, namely, as to the pauper's liability—should the other party, that is, think it worth while to tax her costs, and to apply for a monition against Bonsall for payment.(a)

ANTROBUS AND BOOTH v. NEPEAN. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1823.—A letter written by the deceased to his solicitor, respecting certain alterations to be made in his will, two months before his death, propounded as a codicil—allegation propounding it rejected; it being held—that the letter did not argue the deceased to have fully made up his mind as to the proposed alterations, even at that time—and that, if it did, still the presumption of abandonment arising from a lapse of two months, without any act done, was not effectually rebutted by the facts pleaded.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Sir Evan Nepean, late of Loders, in the county of Dorset, was the party deceased in this [400] cause. In the year 1812 the deceased, who had been appointed Governor of Bombay, left this country for India; prior to which, however, he made and executed his will. He returned to England in 1821—and early in the following year, 1822, he wrote a letter from an hotel in London, at which he was then staying, to his solicitor, Mr. Hutchinson, of Lincoln's Inn, containing various instructions for alterations in his said will, and directing his solicitor to prepare a draft of a new will, conformable to such instructions. This letter is dated 7th of February, 1822. The testator, shortly after, went out of town, to his seat at Loders, where he died on the 8th of October following, after an illness of only half an hour, just as he was about to leave Dorsetshire for London.

This letter to Mr. Hutchinson was propounded as a codicil to the deceased's will, by Sir Edmund Antrobus and Mr. Booth, the executors—and was opposed on the part of Sir Molyneaux Hyde Nepean, Baronet, the eldest son of the deceased, and the residuary legatee named in his will.

The letter propounded was as follows:—

"My dear Sir,—I send you my will. I find I cannot make all the arrangements without consulting Lady Nepean; but in the mean time you will be so good as to consult the main point, which is, to leave all my landed estate to my son Molyneaux Hyde, and to his son, for their lives (not allowing them, when the latter shall be of age, to cut off the entail), as I mean that the estate shall descend to their heirs, and continue [401] in my family as long as the law will admit of my entailing it.

(a) On a subsequent Court-day this cause was called, "on taxation of costs," but the proctor for Mr. Lemann not pressing it, no order was made by the Court, and the question as to the pauper's ultimate liability consequently merged.

"My daughter to have 6000l. at my death. She has 1000l. of her own—to make . . . . . 7000l.

Frederic to have 3000l., which, with 1000l. already given him in India, will make . . . . . 4000l.

William to have 2000l., which, with upwards of 2000l. paid for his commissions, will make . . . . . 4000l.

Evan to have 3000l., which, with the next presentation to Loders and Rotherhampton livings, will be more than equal to . 4000l.

"My wife to have an annuity of 1200l. per annum—on her second marriage to be reduced to 500l. per annum. The house, furniture, &c. as in the will, for her life, if she remains single. If not, to my eldest son.

"The money I have in India, and in the public securities, will enable me to pay the fortunes of my younger children.

"You shall hear from me on my arrival in Dorsetshire, before you can have made any considerable progress in the draft.—Your's very sincerely,

"EVAN NEPEAN.

"Thompson's, 7th February, 1822.

"Julius Hutchinson, Esq."

The allegation propounding this paper, in substance, pleaded that Sir Evan Nepean, prior to going out to Bombay, in the year 1812, made and executed his [402] last will, bearing date on the 12th of March in that year; whereby he settled and limited his real estates; and provided for his younger children out of his personalty, which was then inconsiderable—that on his return from India in 1821, with his personal property considerably increased, he became desirous of augmenting the provision made by his said will for his younger children—that such intentions were embodied in a letter sent by the deceased to his solicitor, Mr. Hutchinson, dated in February, 1822, accompanying his will; and directing his said solicitor to prepare a draft will, pursuant to the instructions contained in the said letter—that the said solicitor, on the receipt of the said letter, began to prepare for making the draft of a new will, by perusing and abstracting the will of the deceased, and making certain pencil memoranda and references (still apparent) on the margin—that after his return into the country the illness of his wife, Lady Nepean, whom he had expressed a wish to consult on certain points, together with continual engagements respecting some trials at the Dorsetshire assizes, in which his interests were involved (as also his being sheriff of the county), had detained the said testator in the country, and prevented him from completing his intended will within the time originally proposed; but "that he did not, at any time previous to his death, depart from his intention of making a new will, and of providing for his younger children to the extent expressed in his letter to his solicitor;" and that he "meant and intended this letter to take effect, in case of his death before his new will was completed." Lastly, it pleaded that the testator was actually preparing to come to town, [403] when he was suddenly taken ill, and expired, at Loders, after an illness of about half an hour, on the 8th of October, 1822.

The admission of this allegation was opposed, on the part of Sir Molyneaux Hyde Nepean, as not stating facts sufficient, if proved, to sustain the alleged codicil.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In order to sustain this alleged codicil, the Court must be satisfied that it expresses the deceased's fixed and final testamentary intentions. In these events, it will be the duty of the Court, ultimately, to pronounce for it—for it may then fairly presume the deceased to have been prevented by sudden death alone from expressing those intentions in a formal testamentary shape.

And here the first question is, how far can this letter be taken to express, upon the face of it, the writer's fixed testamentary intentions? in other words, is the paper propounded such as ought, in itself, to satisfy the Court that the testator's mind, at the time when he wrote it, was quite made up to the bequests which it purports to contain? Now, of this I entertain some doubt. The letter is a mere letter of directions, and instructions—liable, and likely to be varied, if not altogether departed from, on the draft will being, as proposed, submitted to the writer—and as to parts, at least, of which, it should seem, from the wording of the letter, that the writer was, even then, hardly quite determined. He concludes with promising "further advice" in the matter to his solicitor on his arrival in Dorsetshire, and postpones its final arrange-[404]-ment—that is, as I understand it, a delivery of final instructions, or directions, for his will—till he has consulted Lady Nepean. It has been argued, indeed, that the testator's mind was quite made up as to these legacies to his younger children—it was only the settlement of his real estate as to which his solicitor was to look for "further advice"—it was this only as to which Lady Nepean was to be consulted. But this argument has no foundation, that I can perceive, either in the circumstances of the case, or in the words in which the letter itself is couched. It is, to say the least, full as likely that Lady Nepean was to be consulted upon the provision to be made for the younger children, out of the personalty, as it is that she was to be consulted about the settlement of the real estate.

But admitting, for argument's sake, that this letter expresses the deceased's fixed testamentary intentions as to these legacies to his younger children at that time, will it necessarily follow that they were also his final ones? By no means. On the contrary, under the circumstances of this case, the law presumes them, however firmly once entertained, to have been abandoned by the testator—and the Court, I am afraid, will be bound to conclude so, unless that legal presumption be repelled; which, whether it is, or is not, by the facts pleaded in this allegation, is the real question to be determined.

Now, considering how highly probable it is that the deceased fully intended some further provision for the junior members of his family out of his increased personalty, the Court is sorry to say that the facts here pleaded would, in its judgment, not [405] have the effect of repelling this legal presumption—the result being, that the utmost proof of which this allegation is capable would fail to sustain the paper propounded in the cause. The allegation certainly pleads that "the testator, at no time, departed from the intention of benefiting his younger children to the extent expressed in the (alleged) codicil." But a mere averment to this effect is insufficient—there must be facts and circumstances in proof of that averment. If it be asked, Of what nature? I answer—of a nature to shew that a new will, embodying the bequests expressed in this letter, was in progress at the time of the testator's sudden death; so as to warrant a conclusion that it was only finally arrested by that event. The parties propounding the paper are fully aware of this, as appears by facts of the kind to which I am adverting, being alleged in the plea—the adversity of their case is that these facts, though right in kind, are still unequal to the effect sought to be produced. The illness of Lady Nepean and Sir Evan's several avocations, public and private, in Dorsetshire, are circumstances much too loose and vague to account satisfactorily for no step having been taken in this matter during the long interval of eight months, which occurred between the date of this letter and the death of the testator—the more especially, from the testator having promised to communicate further with his solicitor on the subject, immediately upon his arrival in Dorsetshire. Had that promise been fulfilled, and had a correspondence ensued, inferring, to a late period of his life, the testator's deliberate approval of, and fixed determination to abide by, the [406] original instructions—could even verbal declarations made by the testator have been pleaded and deposed to, that now, at length, at the termination of the assizes at Dorchester (which, it is observable, must have been some time over), he was going to London, in order to execute his will, drawn up pursuant to directions already given to his solicitor—in either of these events this case might have presented itself to the Court with a different aspect. But as it is the Court, with whatever regret for a reason already expressed, is bound to pronounce that the utmost proof of which this allegation is capable would fail to rebut its presumed abandonment in law, and, consequently, would fail to sustain the paper propounded—under which impression it has no choice but to reject this allegation.

Allegation rejected.

LAVENDER AND CHURCHILL v. ADAMS. Prerogative Court, Bye-Day, Hilary Term, 1823.—Alterations written by the testator in pencil on the margin of his will, held to be in themselves deliberative—also held not to result from the facts pleaded that the testator was prevented from rendering them operative in themselves by any extrinsic circumstance—consequently, allegation propounding such, rejected.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

This was a business of proving, in solemn form of law, the last will and testament, without certain alterations in pencil appearing upon the face thereof, of Richard Adams, late of the parish of Claines, in the county of Worcester, deceased; promoted by John Perks Lavender and James Churchill, the executors named in the said will, against Mary Adams, [407] widow, the relict of the said deceased, and a legatee principally interested in the said pencil alterations.

This will, altered as above (i.e. with the said pencil alterations) was propounded in an allegation tendered on the part of a widow, pleading to the following effect:—

1. The first article pleaded that the deceased died on the 30th of August, 1822, having first made and executed his last will and testament, to wit, on the 21st of May, 1821—that the said will at that time had none of the alterations in pencil now appearing on the face of it—that it was shortly after sealed up in an envelope, and delivered to the said deceased, and continued from such time in his possession and custody till he died.

2. That the deceased, meaning and intending to make certain alterations in his said last will and testament, made and wrote, with his own hand, the several alterations in pencil now appearing on the face of it; but at what time the party proponent is unable to set out—and when made, deposited, and locked up his said will, so altered, in a drawer in his bureau, the key whereof he himself kept.

3. That in or about the month of June, 1822, the said deceased informed Mr. James, his solicitor, who had prepared his said will, that "he should have occasion shortly to make some alterations therein, and that he would call upon him for that purpose;" but that he, the said deceased, never did so call on the said Mr. James.

4. The fourth article pleaded that the said will, so altered, was found locked up in the drawer of the deceased's bureau as aforesaid, the day next following that upon which he died—that it was in the envelope in which it had been originally sealed up, [408] but the seals whereof had been broken, in order to take it out; and that the said envelope had not been re-sealed.

5. The fifth article pleaded merely the several pencil alterations to be of the true and proper hand-writing of the said deceased.

6. The sixth and last was the general concluding article.

The present question arose upon the admissibility of this allegation, which was denied on the part of the executors, as not disclosing a case which, if proved, would justify the Court in pronouncing for the will, with the said pencil alterations, as propounded by the widow.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. It is to be taken for granted that these alterations were made by the deceased himself—the question is quo animo, or, in other words, what do the alterations themselves import; and are they to be taken as final or deliberative? If they are to be taken in themselves as final I need scarcely say that it will be the duty of the Court, in the end, to pronounce for them, although written in pencil—that being an argument, but still, as we all know, not by any means a conclusive one, of their being deliberative. This allegation, in that case, is clearly admissible. But if these alterations in themselves are to be taken as deliberative, it then becomes a question whether the facts pleaded argue the testator to have fully made up his mind to render them final, and to have been prevented from doing so only by some extrinsic circumstance: and the admissibility or the contrary of the plea, in this last case, will depend on that question being answered affirmatively or in the negative.

[409] Now I think that, upon the face of these papers, coupled with what appears of their history in the allegation, these alterations can, in themselves, only be taken as deliberative. It is hardly possible to suppose that the deceased meant them as any thing more than preparatory to final alterations. The will so altered, to be sure, was re-placed in its envelope from which the testator had taken it, for the purpose, it is to be presumed, of noting these alterations; but it is a circumstance by no means immaterial that this envelope remains open, and is not re-sealed. Again, the testator is pleaded to have told his solicitor that "he should have occasion shortly to make some alterations in his will, and that he would call upon him for that purpose." His not having done so raises a presumption—either that he had changed his mind, or had never finally made it up, in this respect—either supposition alike fatal to the case set up in this allegation. Nor is this presumption at all in effect rebutted by the circumstance of the proposed alterations (for such only I can deem them) being noted in pencil on the margin of the will: for that the deceased contemplated finally altering his will by the agency, and with the assistance of the professional gentleman who at first prepared it, is obvious from the plea.

These alterations, then, being not in themselves final, it remains to consider whether it can be inferred from any fact or circumstance which is here pleaded that the deceased fully meant and intended to render them final, and was only prevented from so doing by some extrinsic circumstance. The facts pleaded justify neither inference. Of the proposed alterations, some are material, and might re-[410]-quire deliberation. The very first, for instance, the substitution of an annuity of 200l. to his widow, in lieu of the interest (much less in amount) of his funded property. Nothing is pleaded, however, tending to shew either the probability of such a substitution in itself, or that, probable or not, the deceased had ever finally resolved upon it. Nor, again, is there any foundation whatever laid in the plea for an inference that the deceased was prevented from completing this, and the other proposed alterations by any extrinsic circumstance. Non constat when they were noted in pencil on the margin—they might have been, soon after May, 1821, when the will bears date—they probably were, at least as early as June, 1822, when the conversation between the deceased and his solicitor Mr. James, relative to some alterations in his will, is pleaded to have occurred. But the deceased did not die till the 30th of August in that year; during the whole of which interval he was fully capable, for any thing stated in this plea to the contrary, of making these alterations final, and operative in themselves, if so disposed. The deceased is not pleaded even to have died suddenly. Not that his sudden death standing alone would have entitled these inchoate and imperfect alterations to probate as parts of his will—in order to have produced this effect it must further have been shewn that they were in progress towards being made perfect, and complete, at that time. Upon all these several considerations I reject this allegation—and decree probate of the will, as originally executed, and without the pencil alterations now appearing on the face of it to the executors.

Allegation rejected. Costs directed to be paid out of the estate.

[411] BEST v. BEST. Consistory Court of Rochester, Hilary Term, Feb. 21st, 1823.—Suit by the wife for a divorce by reason of the husband's cruelty—adultery charged by the husband, and a divorce prayed by reason of the wife's adultery—both complaints dismissed, and upon what principles.

Judgment—Dr. Swabey. This is a suit brought by Elizabeth Best the wife, against James Best her husband, for a separation à mensâ et thoro, by reason of cruelty; in the course of which suit the husband has not only pleaded responsively to the original complaint, but has also in the same allegation produced a distinct substantive charge—that of adultery—against the original complainant. This adultery is alleged to have been committed within a few weeks of the marriage, but still not to have come to the husband's knowledge until after the wife had been compelled, as she pleads, to quit his house for the safety of her person, in consequence of his violent and unmerited ill treatment of her.

This allegation of the husband was offered at a later period than might have been expected from the nature of its contents; but the Court, with some reformation, thought fit to admit it. Indeed the only plausible objection to its general admissibility was technical merely—arising upon a doubt suggested whether, in strictness, it be competent to the husband, sued for restitution of conjugal rights, to charge adultery against the wife, without (if not instituting a separate (cross) suit, still at least) first taking out a separate citation returnable in the same suit; calling upon the wife distinctly to answer to that charge. The necessity for either, however, ap-[412]-peared to me to have been formally dispensed with, by a series of decisions in these Courts.

Anciently, I believe it to have prevailed that in all matrimonial suits wherein adultery was intended to be offered (especially where to be made the foundation of a prayer for divorce) on behalf of the defendant, a cross suit, or at least a citation of the plaintiff, to answer to that charge returnable in the original suit, was held to be requisite. This may partly, for instance, be collected from the following note of a case in the Consistory Court of London, of the 8th of November, 1752. It is anonymous; but the date is sufficient for the present purpose, and is in these terms:—

"It was made a question between Cæsar and Major" (two proctors of that time) whether in an original suit, brought for restitution of conjugal rights, there could be a divorce? Cæsar said he had consulted all the registrars, and they had answered in the negative. Dr. Paul, Dr. Penfold, and Dr. Jenner, as amici curiæ, said that adultery was pleadable in bar, in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, but that still in their apprehension, let it be ever so well proved, it could lay no just foundation for a sentence of divorce—the original suit being for restitution. Curia advisare vult. But on the 17th of November the Judge said that, "In a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, a marriage may be pronounced for; and that in such a suit adultery may not only be pleaded in bar, but a divorce may be had in consequence of it, as was solemnly determined by the Delegates in Sir George Savile's case."

[413] By this I do not take the Court to have meant that, in the case of Sir George Savile, a divorce had actually been granted; but that the Delegates had solemnly affirmed in that case the principle of adultery being pleadable in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, not merely in bar, but for the further purpose, if established in evidence, of founding a sentence of divorce. For I believe the fact to be that neither the Court of Arches, nor the Court of Delegates, acceded to the husband's prayer for a divorce in that case, owing to a defect of proof (a)[1]—which judgments were afterwards affirmed upon a commission of review.

Sir George Savile's case, however, which began in 1740, was not the first case in which this doctrine [414] was held. It was held, for instance, in the cause of Dynely and Dynely, which is still more apposite to the question at issue in this cause in 1732. In Dynely and Dynely the wife commenced a suit against the husband for separation by reason of cruelty, in the Consistory Court at Hereford; and the husband having appealed (on a grievance) to the Arches, he there brought in an allegation charging the wife with adultery. Now this allegation the dean (Dr. Bettesworth (a)[2]) admitted; and further proceedings were had in the original suit. True it is that, either ex abundanti cautela, or for some other cause, the husband's proctor afterwards prayed a citation by letters of request to be granted to him against the wife; under which he appears to have proceeded, as if in a cross suit. Still, however, Dr. Bettesworth's having admitted the allegation of the husband charging the wife with adultery in the original suit is a distinct affirmance, by the Court of Arches, of the principle said to have been afterwards solemnly determined by the Court of Delegates in Sir George Savile's case. The husband's cross suit in Dynely and Dynely it may be observed was appealed in a grievance, from the Court of Arches to the Court of Delegates; where the husband ultimately, I think, obtained a sentence in his favor; though this does not appear from the process, which is all that I have been able to consult. Nor can I say to a certainty what finally became of the wife's original suit, the cause of cruelty; but am inclined to think that it dropped after numerous continuations, without proceeding to a sentence.

[415] This question, however, seems to have been again mooted before Dr.

(a)[1] Quære, whether not, in part at least, owing to a constructive condonation of the wife's adultery by the husband? At least, among the circumstances reported to have been stated by Lord Hardwicke, as grounds to influence the discretion of the Crown in granting a commission of review in the case of Savile and Savile, one is that "the sentence tended to establish a proposition of great importance to future cases, and which had not been before established by any decision in this country; viz. that forgiveness of adultery may be collected from facts and circumstances, so as to bar the husband from the right of divorce. This is the law of the civilians and canonists; but he 'Lord Hardwicke' thought that it required more consideration before it should be admitted into the law of England." [See 4 Ves. jun. 202.] The other circumstances were—1. That the weight of evidence was against the sentence; 2. That the question had only been once heard and determined; for the appeal to the Delegates was brought upon a preliminary point only, when the Delegates retained the cause; 3. That the party in possession of the sentence could be no sufferer, in point of costs, in consequence of further litigation, as the expence of all proceedings in the cause necessarily fell upon the husband—the applicant for a commission of review.

(a)[2] Dr. Bettesworth the elder. See the next note.

Bettesworth,(a) in the cause of Matthew and Matthew, in 1769—a proof this of the difficulty of satisfying all minds as to neither a cross suit, nor a separate citation returnable in the same suit, being requisite in these cases. A citation having been taken out by the husband against the wife in that case, in a cause of restitution of conjugal rights, Stevens (a proctor) appeared for the wife, and prayed a libel which was given in. In answer to that libel he confessed the marriage, but otherwise contested suit negatively; alleging further, in bar, commission of adultery by the husband; against whom he prayed at the same time a citation to answer to his wife in a cause of divorce by reason of adultery. Torriano (the husband's proctor) objecting, this matter of objection came to a hearing, "on the petition of both proctors." The Court said, "The question of the day seems to be a question of mere form; and therefore the registrar has been directed to look for precedents. He has found one of Bently and Bently, where the Judge decreed a citation as prayed by Stevens in this cause; observing, however, that the adultery might be pleaded, and that being proved a divorce might be had just as well without it. He therefore (Dr. Bettesworth) was of opinion that Mr. Stevens might [416] proceed either way." Stevens upon this prayed a citation against the husband in a cause of adultery, agreeable to the precedent in the case of Bently and Bently. That a cross suit or separation citation is necessary, however, under such circumstances, has never been asserted that I am aware of, from that time to the present—and the practice of either, thus held to be optional, appears from that time to have been finally dispensed with.

I should not have referred to these authorities in this stage of the cause, but that, having omitted to do so when the admissibility of Mr. Best's allegation was debated, as entertaining myself, no doubt upon this subject, it has again been pressed upon my observation, in the course of the hearing by Mrs. Best's counsel, that the recrimination here introduced by the husband (in the original suit, namely, and under no citation of the wife), is by a different species of charge. So it is; but to found either the one or the other the basis is the marriage—and the parties are the same.

The marriage between these parties, Mr. and Mrs. Best, which is both proved and confessed, took place on the 20th of December, 1817; certainly under circumstances seemingly not the most auspicious. Yet, if they mutually agreed to accept each other as husband and wife, the duties of that relation became obligatory on both. It does appear to my satisfaction that Mr. Best was desirous to treat his wife with kindness and indulgence. This is evinced by his having expended large sums for her gratification in various instances—in particular, he purchased diamonds and other personal orna-[417]-ments for her, to the amount in value of 1400l. or 1500l. Mrs. Best had a new carriage built to her taste—there was a saddle-horse kept for her use; and a servant whose business it was exclusively to attend upon her. It would be difficult, indeed, to ascribe this marriage to any thing but attachment on Mr. Best's part. But the wife's paramount object was avowedly different. She looked merely to the husband's fortune; and more especially to procuring from it a settlement by deed, under which she would have been amply provided for, in the event of her surviving, or ceasing to cohabit with him, let her conduct in the interim have been what it might. A provision by will she regarded, in her own language, as "nothing at all," having learnt, in whatever school instructed, the difference between a revocable and an irrevocable instrument. Failing to obtain this latter from her husband by fair means, she appears to have thought herself able to extort it; rashly calculating upon obtaining that end by practising every species of annoyance upon him—by absenting herself from his house repeatedly against his will; and by rendering his habitation, during her presence in it, a constant scene, not merely of verbal altercation, but actual personal conflict. Within three weeks, for instance, from her marriage, she goes to Dover (stopping in the way at Canterbury, under circumstances to which I shall presently have to advert), for the purpose of trying to effect this favorite object of a settlement, through the medium of Mr. Kennett, an attorney at that place. It is from Dover, and at this time, that she addresses the two letters annexed [418] to (a) Dr. Bettesworth, the younger, as appears by the date; the elder Dr. Bettesworth having died in 1751. This Dr. Bettesworth, son of the elder (both named John) never rose to be Dean of the Arches, but was Chancellor of London—so that the cause of Matthew and Matthew was depending in the Consistory Court of London, at least when this question was mooted.

Mr. Best's allegation, marked B and C,(a) thereby making the experiment of declining to return to his house at all, unless he accedes to her terms of a settlement—an experiment, however, which she found to fail. Mr. Wickham, who is clerk to Mr. Best, and apparently much in his confidence, but whose evidence the Court can safely rely upon, says that, within a few days only of the marriage, he had some conversation with her upon the subject of a will, which Mr. Best had prepared to execute. She objected to it, saying she ought to have a settlement. [The deponent had previously said that, upon several occasions immediately after the marriage, he had heard Mrs. Best urging Mr. Best to make a settlement upon her—to the single object of obtaining which her conduct altogether appeared to be directed.] The deponent observed [419] to her, that a settlement was what she ought not to expect—that she ought to be grateful to Mr. Best for having raised her to his station in life, and to be satisfied with a provision made for her by his will, the amount of which, of course, would and ought to depend upon her conduct. Mrs. Best replied that a will was nothing at all —she married Mr. Best for a fortune, and she ought to have a settlement—and on the deponent again adverting to the advantages she had acquired by her marriage, she added, that "she was a young woman, and Mr. Best was an old man."

Her witness, Mary English, by whom Mrs. Best was accompanied when she finally left her husband, in August, 1819, and who had lived in her service for the fourteen months preceding, speaks much to the same effect as Mr. Wickham, upon this head, in answer to interrogatories which have been addressed to her on behalf of Mr. Best. On the 12th and 13th interrogatories she deposes to Mr. Best's refusal to make a settlement upon his wife, being the source of constant altercation; and to her gross abuse of him in consequence of that refusal. She deposes to this, in fact, being "the principal cause of their quarrels." She has heard her say that she would not have lived with him if she could have got a settlement, and that "he might be sure she did not marry him for love."

Of the habits and character of this complainant, generally, the history afforded in the evidence is, I am sorry to say, most unfavourable. Of her habitual intoxication, and gross immodesty, both verbal and actual, it would be disgusting to furnish the details—not merely as spoken to by Holt and But-[420]-terfield, respectively servants in the family, and witnesses on the part of Mr. Best; but as admitted by her own witness, English, and confirmed, so far as they go, by several of the exhibits proved to be in her own hand-writing. Mr. Wickham, too, deposes to "seldom seeing her towards evening that she was not intoxicated." He says that her manners on those occasions were full of levity and impropriety—and that her language was "very bad," and such as he, as a family man, "endeavoured to avoid attending to as much as possible." The evidence of every witness in the cause upon whom the Court can place any reliance is confirmatory of this.

To the conduct of this lady towards her husband, in particular, so far as the settlement was concerned, I have already adverted. Mr. Wickham, indeed, not unnaturally ascribes her "constant opposition to his wishes in all respects," and her perpetual attempts "to vex and harass him as much as possible," to a preconcerted plan on her part, "either to make him glad to get rid of her upon her own terms," or to provoke him to some acts of violence of which she might be able to avail herself, so as to obtain her avowed end (a separate maintenance) in that way. In this view of the subject, to be sure, her general conduct as a wife abstract from this particular of the settlement, has more or less a reference to it all along. Be the cause, however,

(a) These letters are as follows:—

(B) Dover, January, 1818, from the York Hotel.

My dear Husband,—It gives me plesure to call you so. I am very sorry I am obliged to stay from you so long; but you know it is no more than is proper for me to se myself wrighted; and I am sure you will do Every thing that is honouribley and gust for me. My dear Sir, as I was short of money when I left you, I shall be obliged to you to send me sum by Return of Post, to pay the expences of the Inn.—I am, my dear husband, your's, for ever, E. BEST.

(C) from the York Hotel, Dover, Jaenery 10th, 1818.

Dear Sir,—I am extremely sorry to inform you, that I cannot Return Back to you, unless you make me a settlement from the day of marrege; and I shall wait here until I heare from you.—I am, Sir, your's truly, E. BEST.

what it might, the evidence can suffer no doubt to be entertained as to the effect. Wickham says that Mrs. Best's conduct (her general conduct, that is) to her husband during the whole period of their cohabitation was, as far as it came under his, the de-[421]-ponent's, observation (and this deponent had every opportunity for observation), grossly improper. She frequently abused, and expressed violent resentment and anger against him. She did so upon all occasions—set him completely at defiance, and acted in opposition to all his wishes, seemingly for the sole purpose of annoying him. The deponent hardly knows how to describe her conduct as a wife, otherwise than by saying it was the very reverse of what it ought to have been. "The deponent has frequently," he says, "seen Mr. Best with his face scratched and disfigured—how frequently he does not remember, nor can he of his own knowledge depose to the manner in which his face became in that state." But this chasm in the evidence of Mr. Wickham, as to the actual perpetrator of these outrages, whom he declines to specify as of his own knowledge, is amply supplied by the testimony of other witnesses. Butterfield speaks to having repeatedly "seen Mrs. Best strike Mr. Best, pull his hair, and scratch his face," and to having once seen her throw him down stairs. He says that Mr. Best's face was so much scratched and torn after these assaults that he, the deponent, was unable to shave him for several days together. Once, too, in this deponent's presence, she threw a decanter at Mr. Best, which missed him, but was broken to splinters (owing, I presume, to the force it was thrown with) against the wainscot. He further says that Mr. Best often left the room when Mrs. Best was conducting herself in this violent and abusive manner, and retired to other parts of the house, generally to the servants' hall, in order to avoid her. He has known him to do so as often as [422] two or three times a week; remaining there several hours at a time. He, the deponent, always locked the door upon those occasions; but Mrs. Best frequently followed—would sometimes knock gently, in order to get in, by making him, deponent, believe it one or other of the servants; but at others would knock violently, and insist upon being admitted. The evidence of Butterfield, in all these several particulars, is fully confirmed, not only by Holt, who constantly attended upon Mr. and Mrs. Best, as footman, through the whole period of their cohabitation, and therefore had every opportunity of observing their conduct towards each other, but which is more material and much more satisfactory, by English. Her answers to the interrogatories which have been addressed to her, on the part of Mr. Best, warrant a conclusion that the evidence of Holt and Butterfield, upon these points, if a little too highly coloured, from that degree of bias which must be made allowance for in the evidence of servants of either sex, especially in suits of this description, is still in substance correct. In answer to the 16th interrogatory she says that "Mr. Best used often to go and sit in the servants' hall, to avoid Mrs. Best, but that she often followed him thither; and, on his shutting the door, would force it open and assault him. She would pull his nose or hair, and scratch him, frequently fetching blood—so that his face and person were often much disfigured." In answer to a former interrogatory, the 14th, she had said that she, the respondent, never saw Mrs. Best throw decanters or glasses at her husband; but that she had often removed them from the table, under the apprehension that she, else, would have proceeded [423] to that extremity. It clearly appears, I should observe, by the evidence, that Mr. Best is verging toward seventy, and partly, at least, crippled in one, if not both, hands—and that Mrs. Best is a "strong muscular woman," in the prime of life, having at the time of her marriage been only three-and-twenty. Her witness, English, says, on the 10th interrogatory, that she has often seen her "take him by the arm, and swing him round like a child;" and Holt says, to the same effect, that his master, Mr. Best, was "no match for her."

With conduct like this on her part it could hardly be that the wife should succeed in her suit—that her libel should be proved in that material part of it which represents her sufferings at the hands of her husband as unmerited and unprovoked. It has been repeatedly laid down in these Courts that no wife can solicit their interference with effect to protect her from (even from ill) treatment which she has drawn upon her by her own misconduct—she must first, at least, seek a remedy in the reform of her own manners. If, however, it should appear that even misconduct on the wife's part has produced a return from the husband wholly unjustified by the provocation, and quite out of proportion to the offence, it might still be the duty of the Court to interfere judicially, notwithstanding such, the wife's, positive misconduct.

And this being so, it must be obvious, from what has already fallen from the Court, that this inquiry limits itself, so far as the cruelty charged by the wife is concerned, to a consideration of whether any blame of this sort can be justly said to attach to the conduct of the husband, upon the evidence before the Court.

[424] The marriage of these parties took place in December, 1817, and the first acts of cruelty, specifically charged, are pleaded (namely, in the 5th article of the libel) to have been committed on the 14th and 15th days of March, 1818; I say "specifically charged," because it certainly is pleaded generally, in the introductory part of this 5th article, that the husband began to ill treat and beat his wife "shortly after the marriage." The 5th article of the libel however charges specifically that, "the wife being seated by a window, in the drawing-room, on the first of these days, the husband, without any cause, struck her with a horsewhip across her left breast, which caused her to fall senseless to the ground, and occasioned a swelling, which lasted a considerable time;" and that on the following morning, about five o'clock, "he put a lighted candle under her bed, and swore he would burn her in it alive." And it is further pleaded, in the 6th article, that in consequence of these acts of violence, she, the wife, applied to a magistrate, and swore the peace against him. These to be sure are serious charges, especially the last; an attempt to burn her alive is more than even Mrs. Best's demerits could justify. Let us see how they are sustained in evidence.

The two first witnesses designed to this article are Mary Brooks and Mary Boxall.

Brooks, who at the time of her examination in April, 1820, was only eighteen years of age, says, that in August, 1817, she being then out of place, and resident in Canterbury, was hired as a sort of general servant to accompany Mrs. Best, then Miss Halladay, to Ramsgate, where she proposed to spend a short time. She continued however in her ser-[425]-vice; and, upon her marriage to Mr. Best, accompanied her to his house at Chatham, where she remained for about six weeks, until discharged by Mr. Best. She further says that on the 26th of February last [that is, 1820] she re-entered, and was then living in the service of Mrs. Best, resident at Bucklands, near Dover, separate from her husband. And to the third interrogatory she answers that, shortly before so re-entering Mrs. Best's service, she received a message from her, to ask whether she had any objection to come forward and state what she knew about Mr. Best's "taking his pistols to her (a matter, by the way, not charged in the libel) and his other ill treatment of her?" To which she answered in the negative.

Mary Boxall (formerly Halladay) is the sister of Mrs. Best. She says that she went on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Best, at their house at Chatham, at the time of their marriage, and remained with them there for about six weeks from that time, which agrees with the period of the discharge of the first witness by Mr. Best.

And both witnesses admit not being even in the same house with the parties on or about the 14th of March, 1818, the time when the facts charged in the 5th and 6th articles of the libel are laid to have occurred.

Now with respect to certain acts of violence, prior in date to the 14th of March, 1818, not specifically complained of by the wife, but spoken to by Brooks and Boxall as upon the 5th article of this libel, the Court is disposed to dismiss them from its consideration, pretty much, altogether; as being matter to which Mr. Best has had no opportunity, either [426] of counterpleading, or even addressing interrogatories, for want of that specification. I must further, too, observe that both these witnesses, Brooks and Boxall, from their answers to certain general interrogatories administered by the husband, adverted to by his counsel in argument, have rendered themselves in point of credit, to say the least, very exceptionable.

This last objection indeed applies nearly or quite as strongly to the third and only other witness upon this article, Ann Young. She, however, being properly enough designed to this article, as having lived in Mr. Best's service at the time when the acts of cruelty specifically charged in it are alleged to have been committed, it becomes necessary for the Court briefly to consider her evidence upon it.

Her evidence on the 5th article of the libel is to this effect: she says that about a week after she entered Mr. Best's service (where she continued for nearly six months, as his wife's waiting maid), she having been rang for, went into the drawing-room, and on entering it found Mr. Best very angry with Mrs. Best about a little hurt she had got in her lip, which she said had been done the day before by her parrot, but which Mr. Best, it seems, was inclined to ascribe to the bite of a different species of animal. She says that after swearing at and threatening her for some time about her lip, he fetched a riding whip from an adjoining room, and adding, "Damme, madam, I will now horsewhip you," struck her a violent blow with it across her left breast. She screamed and fainted away, on which the witness and Mrs. Filmer, the house-keeper, went to her assistance, and carried her up stairs, where, after [427] bathing her temples and using other remedies, they succeeded in restoring her. She says that the breast was at first a good deal swelled, but afterwards turned black; and that the bruise was visible upon it for several weeks afterwards. Upon the charge of putting a lighted candle under her bed, &c. on the following morning, all which this witness (the only witness upon it) says, is that "one morning, about two or three mornings afterwards, she heard a noise in the bed-room, as if Mr. Best was in a passion with his wife—that presently after the bell rang, and she heard her mistress calling out for her to go to her—that on entering the room she found Mrs. Best just getting into bed again, and Mr. Best not there, but descending the stair case—there was a candle and candlestick lying on the floor, the candle apparently just put out—that Mrs. Best appeared much agitated, and requested the witness to come to bed to her, to protect her." She further says that in the evening of that day, when Mr. Best struck her with a horsewhip, as above, she did go, accompanied by the witness, to a magistrate at Chatham, and complain to him of her husband's behaviour to her. The observations suggested to it by this piece of evidence the Court will reserve until it has an opportunity of remarking upon the testimony of this witness, Young, upon the libel, taken as a whole. But to proceed with the other specific charges of cruelty.

The 6th article pleads that, "In the beginning of May, 1818, Mr. Best, without any provocation, put himself in a violent passion, and beat his wife upon the head with his fist in a very cruel manner—that she escaped from him into the bed-room, and fastened [428] the door, when Mr. Best came up stairs with a large kitchen poker and broke open the door—and in the most violent manner threatened to kill her, but was prevented from doing so by the presence and interference of Mrs. Filmer, the house-keeper, who came from her room, it being about eleven o'clock at night, in consequence of Mrs. Best's screams."

Now upon this article, as well as on the last, Filmer, who is vouched as a witness, is not produced, and the sole witness again is this Ann Young. Her account is pretty much to the effect of the plea; there is one discrepancy however. The blows are pleaded to have fallen upon the head of the complainant; the witness says nothing of this, but speaks to her "arm being much bruised from the shoulder to the wrist." This is a discrepancy, however, perhaps not very material.

The next article pleads that "one day in June, 1818, after dinner, Mr. Best knocked his wife off her chair (the parties being then at Southend); and afterwards, on her attempting to get up stairs, followed her and beat her about the head and left cheek and side, in a cruel manner, so as to cause her cheek to swell, and produce a constant pain in her side."

Now upon this article the Court, in part at least, has the testimony of an additional witness, Mary English, upon an interrogatory that is addressed to her by the husband: for Young, again is the sole witness designed by the wife to this article. Young's account is that she was in the bed-room, over the drawing-room, where Mr. and Mrs. Best were sitting at their wine after dinner, when she heard a violent scream, and running down stairs [429] encountered her mistress coming out of the drawing-room, crying very much—her hair was about her shoulders, and the comb which usually fastened it up in her hand. She went up stairs into the bed-room accompanied by the witness, but was immediately followed by Mr. Best, who exclaimed on seeing her, "Oh! you are here, madam;" and advancing to her, began beating her violently about the head, face, neck, and body, with his doubled fists. Mrs. Best resisted a little, and presently after struck him again; but he overpowered, and knocked her down, and then went away. The housemaid who had ran up stairs on hearing the noise, after endeavouring in vain to part them, ran to assist Mrs. Best as soon as Mr. Best left her on the ground. The witness says that Mrs. Best complained of being much hurt, and unable to go down stairs, and went to bed almost immediately —and that bruises were visible on her face, neck, and bosom.

Such is the substance of Young's evidence upon the 7th article. But that of English, upon an interrogatory addressed to her, as I have said, by the husband, places the whole transaction in a very different light. English is the person designated by the last witness as the "housemaid" who interfered upon the occasion in question. She at that time was housemaid, but afterwards became Mrs. Best's personal attendant. She says that upon going up stairs (as spoken to by Young) she found Mr. and Mrs. Best fighting on the landing-place, each beating the other. Mrs. Best then went off into a fit, and the respondent assisted to recover her: to be sure, when recovered, Mrs. Best did "complain of Mr. Best's beating her." She said she had been sit-[430]-ting by the window, when a gentleman passing by happened to look up at her; upon which Mr. Best without any provocation knocked her off her chair. The respondent further says, however, that Mrs. Best at the time in question was intoxicated; and that when in that state she often abused, struck, and fought with Mr. Best. It appears from the answers of this witness that Mrs. Best had often fits when intoxicated ("her fits," she calls them) without receiving any blow.

The above is the substance of Young's evidence upon the 5th, 6th, and 7th articles —articles to which she in effect is the only regular designed witness: for the evidence of Brooks and Boxall upon the 5th article, for reasons already assigned, is pretty much out of the question; and English's testimony, as upon the 7th article, is merely drawn out upon an interrogatory. Now the answer of this witness, Young, to the several interrogatories administered to her on the part of the husband, and in brief, her general evidence, as contrasted with that of nearly every other (I may say of every other credible) witness in the cause, do, as already hinted, detract most materially from the credit due to her; in fact, they render it impossible for the Court to rely upon her evidence, unless confirmed by that of some other witness. But Young being, in effect, the sole witness upon the 5th and 6th articles, and the collateral testimony of English, as upon the 7th article, not only not corroborating that of Young, but substantially disproving it, there is a total failure of proof upon these articles—there is even something more; for I do think that Mr. Best's answers upon these articles, which have been read by the counsel [431] for Mrs. Best, and which certainly represent these matters very differently from the plea, more than counterpoise the single testimony of a witness of Young's description.

The single witness upon the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th articles of the libel is Mary English. English I admit with the counsel for both parties to be a fully credible witness; but her evidence in my judgment is so far from convicting the husband of legal guilt that it goes some way to exculpate him from moral blame. What is her evidence upon the 8th article, for instance: she says that between six and seven o'clock one evening in the month of December, 1818, the bell having been rung for her, she went up stairs into the breakfast room, where Mr. and Mrs. Best were then taking their wine after dinner—when she entered the room Mrs. Best was standing by the mantle piece, leaning against it, and Mr. Best was desiring her to leave the room. Mr. Best told the deponent to take her mistress out of the room, and again desired Mrs. Best to leave it; to which she replied that she would not; for that she had as much right to any part of the house as he had. Mr. Best then pushed her, as if to remove her from the mantle piece, and again told the deponent to take her away. Mrs. Best rather resisted the push, and told Mr. Best that "if he attempted to touch her again she would wring his nose off;" upon which he immediately struck her a violent blow with his fist, which knocked her down, and struck her head against the chimney piece as she fell. She was senseless from the effect of the blow; and Mr. Best, stooping as if to lift her up, laid hold of her by the hair; but on the deponent's remonstrances [432] shifted his hold, and, assisted by the deponent, lifted her by the arm to a sofa which was just by. The deponent at the same time asking Mr. Best how he could use his wife so? he replied, "Damn her, she has been praising her favorite man, Captain B.; saying, what a charming fellow he is, and that I am a snuffy old fool." Mrs. Best recovering in a few minutes, on the application of some vinegar, Mr. Best again insisted on her leaving the room, but she said she would not, and taking a chair seated herself at the table. Such is her evidence in chief. In answer to an interrogatory which has been addressed to her as with reference to this particular transaction, she says, "The blow was a hard blow, because it broke the comb in Mrs. Best's head; and that Mrs. Best did fall on the floor senseless, and remain so for some minutes—in one of her fits. She was intoxicated, however, at the time, and had been abusing Mr. Best in the usual manner." She further answers that she cannot say whether the fit, upon this occasion, proceeded from the blow. She had often those fits when in liquor, from that cause, when she had received no blow.

Now upon this account of the witness, can it be said that what occurred (which is charged as a specific act of cruelty in the 8th article) was without great provocation? She had indulged herself in comparisons (proverbially odious upon all, and certainly not least so upon such subjects) between her husband and Captain B., her "favorite man," as he styles him. [English says, by the way, that she often reproached him in this manner, namely, by casting in his teeth the praises of her "favorite men," which always put Mr. Best in a passion. She would some-[433]-times say, "Now I will make him as jealous as the devil," and then would begin praising gentlemen whom she said she had met when out walking, although she (English), who had accompanied her, well knew that she had met no such persons. And this perfectly accords with what Holt and Butterfield have deposed of her conduct in this particular, although in terms too indelicate, as very much of this evidence is for recital in open Court. But to return.] The husband, upon the occasion in question, does not immediately proceed to resent this sort of language by any personal harshness, but desires her to leave the room; which she not only refuses to do, but accompanies her refusal with menaced violence if he attempts to compel her. Actual violence, as might be expected, does ensue; and probably it was intended that it should. And if the wife suffered by it, can it be said that she was not the authoress of the whole by her grossly improper conduct? I am clearly of opinion that she was; and that the conduct of the husband in this instance, so provoked, unjustifiable as I admit it to be, does not come up to the notion of legal cruelty.

Observations of a similar import apply to this witness's depositions upon the 9th, 10th, and 11th articles; but it is unnecessary, and it would be disgusting to state and observe upon them in detail. It may be proper, however, that the Court should briefly advert to her evidence upon the 12th article, being the article which contains that material averment of the party complainant having finally quitted and ceased to live and cohabit with her husband in August, 1819, from considering her life in peril by reason of his cruel and violent conduct towards her.

[434] English deposes that there had been disputes and differences between Mr. and Mrs. Best a few days before they separated, upon the old subject of the will. She sent several messages to him by the deponent to say that unless he satisfied her as to what he had left her in his will, she would not live with him; to which he replied to the effect that he had left her enough if she conducted herself well; but that if she did not, that would be taken away. In the course of these disputes she speaks to having been the bearer of a note from her mistress to Mr. Best, about two days before they separated, and to the exhibit, No. 6, annexed to Mr. Best's allegation, being that identical note. It is conceived in terms of such irritating and scurrilous reproach (terms far too gross for recital) that it could only be designed to provoke the husband to some act of violence. It is impossible, I think, to put any other interpretation upon it. The above circumstances, connected with the final separation of the parties, are described by the witness, English, in her answers to the 34th and 35th interrogatories. Upon her examination in chief, she says, to this article of the libel, That for some time previously Mrs. Best had expressed herself determined not to live with Mr. Best, in consequence of his behaviour to her; but she did not hear her express any fear that her life would be in peril by remaining. Two or three days before she left the house she told the deponent that she "meant to go and see her friends;" that she was aware Mr. Best would object, and that then she intended "to kick up a devil of a row, and set off the next morning." Now how utterly inconsistent this evidence is with an averment that she, the party complainant, [435] quitted her husband's house at Chatham in August, 1819, under a sense of present peril to her person from continuing to reside with him, need scarcely be observed upon. No breach of the peace in fact appears to have occurred—the lady quitted her abode without actual disturbance: not that if it had, so studiously provoked on her part, it would at all have amended her case—a case which I have no hesitation in pronouncing to be disproved altogether, and not to entitle her to the relief which she seeks. I accordingly dismiss her complaint, and proceed to consider that of the husband.

It may first be fit, however, that the Court should express its sense of the utter impropriety of that frequent recourse which Mr. Best is proved to have had to personal violence, even although it admits at the same time that upon most, if not upon all, occasions of his so doing he did not want for great provocation. It attaches, too, no small degree of blame to the use of that language, whether given or retorted, in which his reproofs were usually conveyed—reproofs abounding in epithets always ungrateful to female ears, and which possibly become more ungrateful in nearly what proportion the epithets themselves are less inappropriate. Mr. Best should peculiarly have avoided the use of these epithets, pending cohabitation, even had he believed her guilty of nuptial infidelity. As to any antenuptial immorality that had been purged quoad him, by his consenting to take her for his wife. What, again, could be well more reprehensible than, if not his groundless suspicions, still his gross modes of giving vent to them—at one time, for instance, by insisting that the coachman was in bed with his wife—at an-[436]-other, by searching the closets in her bed-room, and under her bed, as suspecting them to conceal some gallant. Throughout that course, too, of excessive drinking, which led to most of their personal conflicts, it cannot be overlooked that the husband does not appear to have interposed, as he was undoubtedly called upon to do, any sort of restraint; he, on the contrary, in their afternoon sittings seems to have been usually a sharer in such compotations. Of what Mrs. Best's counsel have said, however, namely, that the wife's indelicacies in language and conduct (too gross to be specified) were not foreign to the taste of her husband, I see no proof. On the contrary, the witness, English, says that he often expressed high disapprobation of them; saying somewhat coarsely indeed, "He would be damned if he could bear it" —that "she ought to be ashamed of herself, and was worse (in these respects) than a common prostitute." But to proceed—

Mr. Best accuses his wife of adultery with a person named Meers, a farmer, resident at Chilham, near Canterbury, and with whom she had been acquainted previous to her marriage. His allegation charges that, on her journey to Dover, soon after the marriage, upon the occasion, to which I have already adverted, of consulting her solicitor, Mr. Kennett, she stopped at Canterbury; and that at the house of Isabella Elder, situate in Ruttendean Lane, in that city, being a house of notorious ill fame, she met this Meers by appointment, on or about the 5th of January, 1818; and then and there had a criminal connexion with him—little more that a fortnight, it will be seen, this from the wedding day. Upon this charge two questions arise—1. Is [437] the adultery proved? 2. What, being proved, under all the circumstances of the case is its legal effect?

1. The witnesses examined in support of this charge are a man named Wash, Meers himself, and Charlotte Morgan. The two first of these, at least, are to be heard with caution; but it is of necessity that "in re lupanari, testes lupanares admittentur;" and I see nothing in the nature of the evidence which these persons have given, confirmed as it is by circumstances, and by the whole complexion of this case, which induces me to consider them as having deposed untruly.

Wash deposes to having been dispatched by Elder with a message to Meers from Mrs. Best, whom he had known for years before, at the time articulate, desiring him to meet her at Elder's that evening—to his delivery of this message to Meers, and to Meers's reply, which was that he was coming to Canterbury, and would be at Elder's at the time appointed—and to his report of that answer to Mrs. Best in person, then at Elder's, who expressed her delight at the prospect of a renewed intercourse with Meers, in terms as spoken to by this witness, so grossly indecent that the Court is compelled to dispense to itself with the obligation of recording them.

Morgan, who was perfectly acquainted with the persons both of Meers and Mrs. Best, from Mrs. Best having lodged at her (the deponent's) mother's previous to her marriage, and from her having been visited there occasionally by Meers, deposes positively to having seen Meers and Mrs. Best go together into the house of Mrs. Elder, next door to that in which the deponent then lived with her mother, in Ruttendean Lane, Canterbury, a few weeks after [438] her marriage—a fact which alone would suffice to found a sentence of separation, and not the less so in this than in any other case, from Mrs. Best's antenuptial habits and acquaintance with the mistress of such a house; which, I should observe, was indisputably a house of ill fame, and is spoken of as such by all witnesses.

Lastly, Meers, the "particeps criminis," has deposed to having met Mrs. Best at the time and place articulate, and to the fact of adultery having been then and there committed between them.

Such is the parol evidence. Added to which a verdict is exhibited, obtained by Mr. Best against the adulterer in an action, judgment in which, however, went by default. Such a verdict, in no case, would be evidence of adultery against the wife; it being res inter alios acta, a proceeding to which she was no party. However, as a circumstance merely of the case, it was entitled to be pleaded, and the Court is bound, as such, to notice it.

Added to this, again, are two letters from Mrs. Best to Meers, leaving no doubt of the existence of a criminal attachment between the parties. There is, I admit, something alarming in Meers having delivered up these letters to the agent of Mr. Best; but this does not detract from their authenticity, and the hand-writing of Mrs. Best to the letters is not only pleaded, but proved. They certainly afford evidence strongly confirmatory of the parol testimony given by the witnesses who have been examined in proof of the charge—a charge against which it only remains to observe that Mrs. Best has set up no defence—she has not counterpleaded to the fact alleged—she has suggested no previous connivance, [439] nor has she insisted upon any subsequent condonation. Under all these circumstances the Court, I think, is bound to hold that the adultery charged is sufficiently proved. Next for its legal effect.

2. Now the Court has been very properly urged, as with reference to that effect, to take into its consideration the conduct of the husband, who it has been contended does not stand before it as a party entitled to relief for several reasons. It is objected, for instance, that the husband could expect no other, or better, from the antenuptial habits and character of the party whom he had chosen to make his wife. But the Court can only notice these as requiring a stricter attention on her part to her conduct as a wife—they, at least, cannot be urged with effect to have authorized, in the first instance, or to protect her, if committed, from the consequences of a wilful violation of her marriage vow. The culpability of the husband's conduct, in the several particulars instanced by the Court in disposing of the wife's complaint, has also been insisted upon, as lessening and detracting from his claim to relief upon his own. But the complaints are not in pari delicto—nor could the one, if established ever so clearly, as in the case of mutual adultery, be received by way of compensation for the other. Dismissing these objections, therefore, at least for the present, I proceed to consider whether a detected epistolary correspondence between Meers and the wife, followed by no inquiry, no vigilance, no restraint, does not constitute, as charged, such a case of constructive condonation of this single fact of adultery, after a "probable knowledge" of it on the part of the husband, as under all the circumstances, and together with [440] what else of unfavorable to the husband's case, results, as I shall presently observe, from his conduct in this particular, precludes it from justly founding a sentence of divorce—especially considering that the effect of such implied pardon, assuming it to be, is weakened or effaced by no subsequent misconduct in this kind, even imputed to the wife, either with Meers or with any other; and that she, the wife, is the prior petens, the complainant in the suit—the husband only hunting back upon this scent to find matter for a defensive allegation to his wife's charge of cruelty—an allegation itself, by the way, not concluding with a prayer for a separation, that being only introduced at the final hearing of the cause.

The letters to which the Court alludes are two letters, dated respectively the 10th and 15th of February, 1818, found by Mr. Best in his wife's drawers (probably very shortly after her receipt of them), plainly written to her by Meers, though addressed under cover to her sister Mary Halladay, then, it will be recollected, on a visit at Mr. Best's. They are no (direct) evidence, of course, against the wife, introduced in the mode in which they come before the Court, being merely annexed by Mr. Best to the interrogatories administered on his part to the witnesses upon his wife's libel. The Court is now adverted to them, not to criminate the wife, but as affording some test of the conduct of the husband.

It is not necessary that the Court should descend into the particulars of these letters, some parts of which, indeed, are not very intelligible. It will be sufficient to observe that they abound in expressions of ardent attachment, and must have satisfied Mr. [441] Best that his wife maintained a correspondence, by letter at least, with Meers, and through this Elder, whose character and office Mr. Best, if ignorant of (which can scarcely be presumed), might easily have made himself acquainted with. He insists upon the "lock of her hair which she, Mrs. Best, had promised him," in a brooch; he hopes to have the pleasure of seeing her soon "at the old place, for he wants to see her very much," and so on.

Such is the general tenor and import of these letters—to the propriety of Mr. Best's conduct on becoming possessed of which no objection can reasonably be taken. It appears that he then, or soon after, produced them to his friend or agent, or both, Mr. Wickham, and to his solicitor, Mr. Jeffries; and that he acted in some sort under their advice in making light of the matter, does in part relieve him from that culpability attaching, in my judgment, to his subsequent conduct. On the 21st article of the allegation (the article which pleads that Mrs. Best's adulterous conduct did not come to her husband's knowledge till after she withdrew from his house in August, 1819, and that he has never since lived or cohabited with her) Wickham deposes that, prior to this final separation of the parties [indeed upon the discovery of these letters as results from a comparison of this gentleman's evidence with that of Jeffries upon the same article], Mr. Best had shewn him a letter purporting to have been addressed to Mrs. Best from Meers, couched in very familiar terms, and had desired him to make inquiries about it, which he did, but could trace nothing criminal to Mrs. Best. Sometime, however, after Mrs. Best had finally quitted her husband, the de-[442]-ponent received certain information respecting the parties which he communicated to Mr. Best, who, thereupon, directed him to make further inquiries, which, in a word, led to a discovery of Meers and Mrs. Best having been criminally connected. The deponent saith that, from all that passed between him and Mr. Best upon the subject deposed of, he is satisfied that, though Mr. Best might have some loose suspicions of impropriety between Meers and his wife, he had no sufficient ground to conclude, still less any actual knowledge, that a criminal intercourse had subsisted between them until after the deponent had communicated to him the result of the further inquiries just deposed of—"subsequent to which" he goes on to express his conviction that "Mr. Best has not cohabited with his wife." The evidence of Mr. Jeffries on this 21st article of the allegation, which it is not necessary to state in detail, is precisely to the same effect, with the addition that he (Mr. Best's professional adviser, it is to be observed) not only expressed his opinion to Mr. Best that the letters amounted to nothing like proof of a criminal intercourse, but also that, knowing him to be of a jealous disposition, he treated the matter "rather lightly." Now the evidence of these gentlemen, that of the last especially, I repeat, partly relieves Mr. Best from the charge of acquiescing too tamely under a discovery of letters of this description received from Meers by the wife; and it, perhaps, frees him altogether from the imputation of having cohabited with her after being fixed with actual knowledge of her postnuptial incontinence. Still, at the same time, that he should not merely have cohabited with her after a circumstance [443] so pregnant with suspicion as the discovery of these letters, but that he should have done so uninterruptedly, and without a remonstrance, or even a hint to the wife herself on the subject, so far as appears, not only falls little, if at all, short of a constructive pardon of any prior connexion between Meers and the wife, after probable knowledge of it, but savours much more strongly, in my judgment, of that blind attachment to her person which led him to make her his wife, "with all her frailties upon her head," predisposing him to acquiesce in any advice which might justify him, to himself, for continuing to cohabit with her, than of that proper feeling for his own honor, which the husband must have evinced, to entitle him to a sentence of separation, by reason of his wife's adultery; of which I am given to understand, from the arguments of his counsel, that Mr. Best is now, at length, desirous.

But granting, for an instant, that Mr. Best can be justified or excused for dropping so summarily (if, indeed, he can fairly be said to have instituted) any inquiry into the nature of his wife's connexions with Meers, upon the discovery of these letters, did no cause occur for its renewal in those journies in which Mrs. Best was in the habit of indulging (under the pretext indeed of visiting her friends) to Dover, the direct road to which from Chatham lay through Canterbury, in which, and in its neighbourhood, Elder and Meers still resided? I am of opinion that cause, and sufficient cause, did repeatedly occur. Such inquiries Mr. Best would, and must have made, had he felt as he ought to have felt, for his own honor; and if equal diligence to that which appears to have been exercised after his wife finally withdrew from [444] his house for the purpose of instituting this suit, and by way of furnishing a defence to it, had been used at any time antecedent, I see no reason why it should not have been attended with the same result. Meers, if apprized that Mr. Wickham was in possession of his letters, would as readily have delivered up Mrs. Best's at one as at another time. What ground is there for presuming that his horror of incurring the imputation of "falsehood" was any greater after, than it was before, Mrs. Best withdrew from her husband's protection? (a) Subse-[445]-quent to his wife's quitting him Mr. Best has, undoubtedly, brought his action against Meers; and he has set up his wife's adultery, though at a somewhat late period, yet still before the conclusion of her suit for cruelty, in his defensive allegation. That adultery, in my judgment, is sufficiently proved; but something more than this, namely, an absence of all impropriety, at least as connected with this charge, on his part, is still requisite to found a sentence of separation. It is true that the adultery complained of is a single fact; and that her knowledge of Meers's letters having fallen into the hands of Mr. Best would, naturally, lead to a greater degree of caution in the wife's management of her future correspondence, if any, of this description, whether by letter or otherwise, either with Meers or with any other gallant. This might render a detection of the wife's guilt difficult, or, to give the argument full weight, impossible, with such means of information as the husband then possessed, had he taken pains to detect it, and made inquiries to that end, recenti facto. But that he should have taken no pains—should have made no inquiries—upon occasion either of his discovery of Meers's letters, or of his wife's frequent (subsequent) journeys to Dover, until when, after a cohabitation of nearly two years, they had finally [446] ceased to cohabit on the wife's preferring against him a substantive legal charge of cruelty; and that he should then at last only have had recourse to these, at least in the first instance, by way of getting at something in the nature of compensation, or set-off, to the wife's complaint, either amounts so far to a constructive condonation of the single fact of adultery charged (of which, if it be, the effect, I again say, is weakened or effaced by no suggested repetition of the offence so constructively pardoned), or it argues such misconduct, as connected with this charge, in the husband, whether owing to negligence, or to something equally culpable, namely, wilful blindness on his part that in either view of it, in my judgment, it precludes the Court, in the exercise of its public duty, from founding upon this single fact of adultery a sentence of separation—at the tardy prayer of the husband, more especially, and under all the accompanying circumstances, not in themselves a little remarkable, of this case. I shall therefore dismiss both parties from all further observance of justice in the present suit—not without the consolation that, if the impression which I have formed upon the evidence before me

(a) The witness Meers, as with reference to these letters, deposed, on the 20th article of the allegation, "that he gave them up to Mr. Wickham, clerk to Mr. Best, on being served by him with a writ in an action for damages brought against him by Mr. Best for criminal conversation with Mrs. Best. The deponent gave them up voluntarily, as soon as he found that Mr. Wickham knew all about the business. And on the 14th interrogatory, that "he had no other view in delivering up the letters, than that he imagined he might lie under the scandal of being a false young man if he kept and denied having them, after it was well known that he had them. He had no idea at the time that they would be brought forward against Mrs. Best in this cause, nor did he give them up with that view. He thought that he had done wrong, and was willing to make what reparation he could by acknowledging his fault, and giving up the letters."

Wickham deposed, on this 20th article of the allegation, that "on serving Meers with the writ, &c. he explained to him in the course of conversation some of the evidence which Mr. Best could bring against him. He, Meers, then stated to deponent that he had received letters from Mrs. Best, and endeavoured to exculpate himself, as having been led into what had passed by her invitation." He afterwards produced the two letters in question to the deponent, and assented to his taking them away. In answer to the 14th interrogatory, this witness in substance deposed that neither he nor any other person, to his knowledge, had given or promised, directly or indirectly, any compensation or reward to Meers, either for the surrender of these letters, or for suffering judgment in the suit at common law to go by default, or for his (Meers's) evidence on behalf of the producent in this cause. It was sworn by Jeffries that the damages assessed by a sheriff's jury at 50*l.* (the judgment going by default) had been paid by Meers, he, Mr. Jeffries, having, as Mr. Best's solicitor, actually received them.

[448] SMITH AND BLAKE v. CUNNINGHAM. Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1823.—Questions of revocation, all, to some extent, questions of intention. Hence, testamentary instruments (regularly executed ones, in particular) are hardly to be deemed revoked by mere inference and implication, under any circumstances; but are certainly not to be under circumstances tending to shew that the testator's intention was not to revoke them.

[Referred to, Thorne v. Rooke, 1841, 2 Curt. 812; Green v. Tribe, 1878, 9 Ch. D. 255; Follett v. Petman, 1883, 23 Ch. D. 341; Ffrench v. Hoey, [1899] 2 Ir. R. 472.]

John Robley, formerly of Russell Square, in the parish of St. George, Bloomsbury, in the county of Middlesex, but late of the island of Tobago, in the West Indies, Esquire, was the party deceased in this cause.

The deceased quitted this country in the year 1808, immediately prior to which he made and executed his last will and testament, in the presence of three witnesses, and thereof appointed his wife, Caroline Robley, his brother, George Robley, Messrs. Smith and Blake (parties in the cause), and Mr. Charles Brook, executors and trustees. The deceased executed this will in duplicate, one part of which he took with him to the West Indies.

Between this period and that of his death, in November, 1821, the deceased made and executed several codicils to his said will.

The first codicil to the said will is dated Tobago, 18th July, 1812. By this codicil, executed in the presence of three witnesses, the testator revokes two prior codicils, bearing date, the first at Tobago, the 13th of October, 1808, the second at St. Vincent, the 30th November, 1809,(a)[1] and, after mak-[449]-ing several bequests as therein contained, confirms his said will.

The second codicil, executed in the presence of four witnesses, is dated 30th August, 1813. It confirms the will and codicil of July, 1812—and revokes the appointment of Mr. Brook, whom it expressly excludes from acting as executor or trustee under the said will and codicil.

The third codicil, executed in the presence of three witnesses, is dated 15th June, 1817. The deceased, by such codicil, after making a variety of bequests, confirms his will, and two codicils, dated as above, and appoints James Cunningham, Esq., of the island of Tobago (party in the cause), executor and trustee of his said will and codicils, and guardian and trustee of his natural daughter, Phillisaida, and his other natural children, if any—in which trust he afterwards joins his cousin, Paul Kneller Smith, Esq.,(a)[2] by the same codicil.

The fourth codicil bears date the 18th of June, 1817. It is written and signed by the deceased, but not witnessed. It contains a single bequest, that of a legacy, to "Miss Eliza Robley."

 This sentence was confirmed, on appeal, by the Court of Arches, on the 4th Session of Trinity Term [1823], the dean (Sir John Nicholl) not merely concurring with the Court below in its view of this case, in both parts of it, but further intimating that he had some doubt whether, upon a nice consideration of the evidence, the adultery charged to have been committed by the wife was sufficiently proved to have entitled the husband [447] to his remedy of a divorce (in a case of this nature, and under the circumstances), supposing, that is, the husband not to have been barred (as he concurred with the Court below in thinking him) by his conduct, viewed in reference to this particular charge, from his title to a divorce, upon that ground, specially.

During the argument the Court inquired whether the counsel were in possession of any case where, cruelty being charged by the wife, and adultery by the husband, both charges were held to be proved; and, if so, what had been deemed the legal effect.

The counsel replied that they were not aware of the existence of any such case; nor presumed to conjecture what the legal effect would be.

(a)[1] These two codicils were not found—and are presumed to have been destroyed by the deceased.

(a)[2] This gentleman, Mr. Kneller Smith, is not the Mr. Smith, an executor under the will and party in the cause.

By the fifth codicil, bearing date on the 9th of January, 1819, the deceased bequeathed certain legacies, and executed the same on the day of the date, but without any witnesses. This being pointed out to him, when about to execute the next following codicil, to wit, on the 26th of October, 1821, he, on that day, re-executed this fifth codicil, in the presence of the three witnesses who at the same time attested the execution of the sixth codicil.

[450] The sixth codicil bears date on this 26th of October, 1821. The testator thereby confirms and republishes his will, recited as bearing date "in the month of December, 1807, or in the month of January, 1808," and "the several codicils thereto, respectively bearing date in or about the month of August, 1813, and in or about the month of January, 1818 [by error for 1819 (see note (a), page 452)] by him made and executed"—omitting all mention of any other codicils. By this codicil the deceased also nominates a Mr. Irvine, of Tobago, one of his executors and trustees. It makes several bequests, and is executed as above, in the presence of three witnesses.

The seventh and last codicil is one of bequests merely. It bears date on the 29th of October, three days after the preceding; and this also is executed in the presence of three witnesses.

A caveat having been entered at the suit of Mr. Cunningham, executor under the fourth codicil, against probate passing, to the executors, of the will and confirmed codicils, the same was warned, and an appearance was given for Messrs. Smith and Blake, praying that probate of the will of the deceased, and four codicils, dated respectively 30th August, 1813—9th January, 1819—26th October, 1821—and 29th of October in the same year, might be granted to them, as two of the executors named in the said will; and declaring that they opposed the codicils dated the 18th of July, 1812—the 15th of June, 1817—and the 18th of July, 1817. The three codicils, so opposed, were propounded, on the [451] part of Mr. Cunningham, in an allegation, consisting of eight articles, of which the following was the substance:—

1, 2, 3. The three first articles of the allegation pleaded merely the facta of the three codicils of the 18th July, 1812, the 15th of July, 1817, and the 18th of July, 1817, in manner as already stated.

4. The fourth article pleaded that the deceased, after making these, placed the same, together with another codicil bearing date the 30th August, 1813, in an envelope or cover, upon which was written, "Codicil to the will of John Robley, Esq." "To George Robley, Esq. Studley Park," under which there appeared a line drawn, and thereunder was written, "Thomas Bird, Esq. Sherwood Park—James Cunningham, Scarborough" (a)—that the said envelope was then enclosed, together with the will, in another envelope, endorsed, "George Robley, Esq. or James Cunningham, Esq. Scarborough," the words, "James Cunningham, Esq. Scarborough," being in the deceased's hand-writing—that the said (outer) envelope was then sealed, and deposited in a box in the deceased's writing-room, in the house in which he then resided, at Golden Grove, in Tobago.

5. The fifth article pleaded that the deceased, after the making and execution of the first codicil pleaded and propounded, viz. that of July, 1812, occasionally opened the same, and made alterations, by substituting, in divers places, other names for [452] those originally written—viz. "Frederick" and "Phillisaida," the names of two natural children, for "Edward" and "William," the names of two other natural children of him, the deceased, and the name and addition "William Brasnell, Esq." for those of "Thomas Bird, of Sherwood Park"—that the said Thomas Bird died in July, 1813, and the said Edward and William Robley, respectively, in the months of July and November, 1814—that Phillisaida was not born until the 21st of August, 1815, and that Frederick died about the month of April, 1817.

6. The sixth article pleaded that the codicil of 20th October, 1821, was prepared at the request of the deceased by Christopher Irvine, Esq., one of the deceased's executors named in such codicil—that the deceased, at that time, was not resident in the house in which the will and former codicils were deposited, but in a new house, situate in the same Golden Grove; so that, in giving instructions for preparing such codicil, he was unable to describe the exact dates of the will, or former codicils, that bearing date the 9th of January, 1819, being the only one in the house, and not produced to the said Christopher Irvine until the morning (a) following that upon which the instructions were given, when it was executed—and that the said Christopher Ir-[453]-vine, as such executor, had duly proved the will of the deceased, and the whole of the said seven codicils, in the Court of the Ordinary of the island of Tobago.

7. The seventh article pleaded that, at the making and execution of the said codicil of the 26th of October, the said deceased neither desired nor directed Mr. Irvine to revoke any codicil by him before made, and that he neither meant nor intended, by such codicil, to revoke the codicils now propounded, nor adverted specifically to the said codicils, or any of them, upon such occasion—and that the deceased's will, together with the first four codicils, remained in the envelope in the box at the deceased's former residence—and the last three codicils at his latter residence—and were so found after his decease.

8. The eighth article pleaded merely the deceased's continued regard for, and correspondence by letter with, Mr. Cunningham, up to the time of his decease.

Two additional articles to this allegation were afterwards admitted. The first pleaded the deceased's affection for his natural children, especially his daughter Phillisaida, expressed to his several friends—and that once, especially, about the month of May, 1817, in conversation with a friend, Colonel Campbell, he declared his intention to leave this daughter, Phillisaida, 10,000l. The second addi-[454]-tional article merely exhibited three letters (annexed) from the deceased to Mr. Cunningham, dated respectively 28th March, 1819, 9th August, 1821, and 21st of October, 1821, in supply of proof of the premises mentioned in the eighth article of the original allegation.

This cause was heard upon the answers of Messrs. Smith and Blake to the above allegation—admitting generally the facts as pleaded—and submitting to the law, and the judgment of the Court, what codicil or codicils, if any, the deceased did mean and intend to revoke by the codicil bearing date the 26th of October, 1821.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased in this cause executed a will and seven codicils. The will bears date on the 19th of January, 1808—the first codicil, on the 18th of July, 1812—the second, on the 30th of August, 1813—the third, on the 15th of June, 1817—the fourth, on the 18th of June, 1817—the fifth, on the 9th of January, 1819—the sixth, on the 26th of October, 1821—and the seventh, and last, three days after, on the 29th of October in the same year. The deceased died on the 3d of November following.

Of these several testamentary instruments, the will and four codicils, the second, the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh, are not opposed. The first, the third, and the fourth, on the contrary, are opposed by Messrs. Smith and Blake, the executors in the will—and are propounded by Mr. Cunningham, an executor named in one, the fourth, codicil. These codicils are said to be revoked under the sixth co-[455]-dicil, that of the 26th of October, 1821, whereby the deceased "confirms and re-publishes his will, bearing date in the month of December, 1807, or in the month of January, 1808, and the several codicils thereto, respectively bearing date in or about the month of August, 1813, and in or about the month of January, 1818," omitting any mention of, or reference or allusion to, either of the other three. Now,

The revocation contended for in this instance is clearly one by implication. If at all, it is under the sixth codicil; in which codicil neither the codicils said to be revoked are specifically adverted to—nor has it, though supposed to revoke the codicils omitted, any general clause of revocation. That revocation, if at all, then, is to be made out by mere inference from the passage of the sixth codicil just recited—which,

(a) When the following memorandum was added, at the foot of this codicil of 26th October, 1821. "Memorandum—That it being observed that the codicil herein mentioned to bear date in the month of January, 1818, was not duly witnessed to pass real estate, it was this day re-executed by the said John Robley, immediately before the execution hereof, and witnessed by the witnesses hereto—the true date of the said codicil being the 9th day of January, 1819. Signed, William Downe, John Pomeroy, Angus Ross," being the witnesses to the codicil of 26th October, 1821—in which codicil itself is the date January, 1818, by mistake, it thus appears, for January, 1819.

whether it has or has not, under the circumstances, the effect sought to be ascribed to it in law, is the sole question for adjudication.

All questions of revocation are questions, to some degree, of intention; for every fact of revocation is said to be equivocal. If so, the question in this instance is peculiarly one of intention; as the fact, itself, of revocation alleged must be admitted to be peculiarly equivocal. It remains then to consider the other facts of the case, I mean those indicative of the deceased's intention, in order to determine the legal import and effect of this fact of revocation so, in itself, as I have just said, peculiarly equivocal. I will only premise that two of the three codicils opposed, being regularly executed, and attested by three witnesses (the nature of the [456] third, that of the 18th of June, 1817, hardly suggesting that formality, as conveying a mere pecuniary legacy of no large amount, yet still that, as well as the two others, being all written by the deceased himself), the intention to revoke these must be clear and unequivocal in order to effect their actual revocation—all legal presumption being obviously in favor of instruments so prepared and executed.

And, first, is any thing to be collected as to the testator's intention with respect to these instruments from the place and company in which they were left by the testator, and found after his decease? Something is to be collected from these, and that decidedly in favor of the instruments. They are found inclosed in the same envelope with the codicil of August, 1813, expressly ratified and confirmed by the codicil of October, 1821, and so admitted to be operative; and, again, this envelope is sealed up in another envelope (together with the will, ratified and confirmed as above), addressed by the deceased to his executors. If the rule "noscitur è sociis" at all applies, this circumstance is material; for even their opponents must admit that these codicils make their appearance in good society.

But the question of intention as to these codicils may, I think, be decided by other and clearer indications; some of which are the following:—

Both envelopes of which I have just been speaking are addressed to "James Cunningham, Esq.;" the one in conjunction with Mr. Bird; the other in conjunction with Mr. Robley. The words "James Cunningham, Esq.," in the outer envelope, that addressed to him, in conjunction with Mr. Robley, being in the deceased's handwriting. But it is one [457] of the codicils alone (that of June, 1817), now said to be revoked, that appoints Mr. Cunningham an executor, and together with the deceased's cousin, Mr. Kneller Smith, the guardian and trustee of the deceased's natural children. And these appointments of Mr. Cunningham are in the following emphatical words:—"And I hereby declare that I appoint as an executor and trustee of my said will and estate, James Cunningham, Esq., of this island, to whom only, and to him, in intire confidence, I confide my private papers in Tobago; and I expressly request him to be, and I hereby appoint him, guardian and trustee of my natural daughter Phillisaida, and any other natural child I may have."

Now that the deceased, had he meant to revoke these appointments, should leave his meaning to be collected from mere inference and intendment, is improbable enough in itself, especially as contrasted with what appears on the face of the codicil of August, 1813, where, meaning to revoke the appointment of Mr. Brook as executor, he does it in formal and direct words: "I hereby exclude Charles Brook, Esq., from being an executor and trustee under my will." And the improbability of any such revocation is rendered still greater by the circumstances which are both pleaded and proved, that his correspondence with Mr. Cunningham continued until, and was only interrupted by, the deceased's death; and that it was not only or chiefly of a mercantile or commercial nature, as suggested in the answers of Messrs. Smith and Blake, but, on the contrary, was a correspondence of the most intimate and confidential sort; as I think sufficiently appears from the letters annexed to the allegation. Nor does [458] any inference to the contrary, as contended, at all result from Mr. Irvine's appointment as an executor and trustee, by the codicil of 1821, to my judgment. There is nothing tending to shew that he was substituted in the place of Mr. Cunningham—he is not appointed sole executor—the deceased expressly, and in terms, appoints him "one of his executors and trustees," to act in conjunction with his "other executors and trustees"—from the number of which "other executors and trustees" I am satisfied that it was not his intention to exclude Mr. Cunningham. Consequently, I am of opinion that it was not his intention to revoke this codicil of June, 1817; and, by necessary inference, not the two others, said to be revoked together with this codicil of June, 1817.

But, further, the deceased, on executing the codicil of 1821, which is said to revoke the three prior codicils omitted to be specified, re-executed the codicil of January, 1819. Now the object of that codicil is to convey a further provision to his natural children through the medium of Messrs. Cunningham and Kneller Smith, as their guardians and trustees. Can it then be supposed that in the same instant and almost by the same act the deceased revoked the codicil of June, 1817, the instrument on which alone rests the appointment of these gentlemen as such guardians and trustees? And I may further observe that the codicil of October, 1821, expressly confirms the codicil of 1813; which, itself again, expressly confirms the codicil of 1812, now, by the operation of this same codicil of October, 1821, argued to be revoked.

Again, the codicil of 1812 (said to be revoked as above) is the only one by which the deceased's house-[459]-keeper (as he terms her), M'Kenzie, the mother of these natural children, has any thing like an adequate provision. But the last and latest act of the deceased's life, so far from implying diminished regard or affection for M'Kenzie, which the revocation of this codicil would imply, infers the direct contrary; for only three days after executing the codicil said to revoke that of 1812, to wit, on the 29th of October, the deceased executes a further codicil for the sole purpose of still further providing for M'Kenzie; in which, after stating his anxiety for her future welfare, and that she may live with the comforts she has thentofore enjoyed, &c. he expressly desires that she shall be permitted to occupy his house at Golden Grove until his executors and trustees can make arrangements for her in the town of Scarborough—that during that time she shall have the attendance of all the servants and domestics who have thentofore been in the habit of waiting upon her—that his said executors and trustees shall build her a commodious house in the town of Scarborough aforesaid, &c. &c. How utterly inconsistent all this (which supposes M'Kenzie in the possession of an adequate provision) is with any intended revocation of the codicil of 1812, on the part of the deceased, is too obvious for a comment.

Upon these considerations, to which others might be added, I am quite satisfied that Mr. Cunningham remains an executor, and that all these codicils, so meant by the testator, ought to be taken as parts of his will; although the sixth codicil recites the will, and two only of the five prior codicils as for confirmation. Had he meant it to be otherwise, the testator would have signified this plainly, as in the [460] codicil of 1812; where, meaning to revoke two prior codicils, he does so by a distinct reference to each of them, and in words directly expressive of a revocatory intention.(a) The whole difficulty of the case has arisen from, and is to be accounted for by, this sixth codicil having been drawn up at a late period of his life, in the absence and without any accurate recollection on his part as to the number, or dates, of his former testamentary instruments; and from its not having been written by the deceased himself, but prepared through the agency of Mr. Irvine, wholly a stranger to his former testamentary acts. That Mr. Irvine, however, had no suspicion of the deceased meaning to revoke the unrecited codicils by this sixth codicil is evident from the circumstance of his having applied for, and taken, probate of the will, and the whole seven codicils, in the Court of ordinary, in the island of Tobago.

I have only to add that if, upon a true construction, the legacies to the natural children in the several codicils are, as they are suggested to be, accumulative, it may possibly be as argued that the natural children will be provided for more largely than the deceased can be reasonably supposed to have contemplated.(b) This, though

(a) "I, John Robley, do hereby completely and for ever revoke the two codicils to my last will and testament, dated on or about the 19th of January, 1808, the said two codicils bearing respectively the dates of Tobago, 13th of October, 1808, and St. Vincent, 30th November, 1809." Codicil of July, 1812.

(b) By the first codicil, that of 1812, as altered by the deceased subsequent to her birth in 1815, his daughter Phillisaida was bequeathed 1000l. and 100l. per annum. The second codicil, that of 1817, bequeathed her, specifically, 1546l. (a principal sum then in the hands of Mr. Kneller Smith, the deceased's cousin) with interest, together with the several sums of 1000l. and 4000l. Lastly, the third codicil, that of 1819, bequeathed her 5000l. and 250l. per annum. Supposing, therefore, the legacies the Court may [461] lament, it has not power to control; nor can it suffer any consideration of the sort at all to influence its judgment as to what codicils are, and what are not, entitled to probate. It is the province of another Court to put a right interpretation on the instruments pronounced for—a province into which this Court (which has only to determine what instruments ought to be pronounced for) has neither the inclination nor the right to obtrude itself. Being satisfied that the deceased meant all these codicils to operate, the Court has no choice but to decree probate of the whole to Mr. Cunningham, jointly, of course, with the other executors.

[462] FOSTER v. FOSTER AND OTHERS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1823.—A will and codicil torn into pieces by a testator's eldest son after the death of the testator—the pieces saved however; by which, and by oral evidence, the Court, arriving at the substance of these instruments, in effect pronounced for them, and condemned the spoliator, though proceeded against in pœnam merely, in costs.

(By letters of request from the chancellor of the diocese of Lincoln.)

This was a cause of proving, in solemn form of law, the last will and testament, with a codicil, of Charles Foster, late of the city of Lincoln, deceased, promoted by Ann Foster, widow, the relict of the deceased, and a legatee in the same, against Charles Foster, eldest son, and several, the other, children of the deceased. These other children, seven in number, were before the Court, consenting that this will and codicil propounded should be pronounced for. No appearance had been given for the eldest son, Charles Foster, and the proceedings as against him had been in pœnam throughout. This suit was instituted in the Court of Arches, in the first instance, by virtue of letters of request from the chancellor of the diocese of Lincoln.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The facts of this case are briefly the following:—

The deceased, early in June, 1822, had been for some time unwell, and was advised by his solicitor, and by his medical attendant, to settle his affairs; [463] and it appears that he only deferred complying with this advice until certain estates, held by himself and his brother Thomas Foster (formerly in partnership with him as a builder) in joint tenancy, were severed, by deeds of partition, so as to oust the right of survivorship incident to estates so held, and leave each brother at liberty to dispose of his several share. Instructions for effecting this partition had been given to Mr. Bromhead, the brother's solicitor, who prepared the necessary deeds of partition; and these were finally executed by and between the two brothers at Mr. Bromhead's office, in Lincoln, about ten o'clock on the morning of Wednesday, the 22d of June, the day upon which the deceased actually died. The deceased returned home on horseback, and was visited there, about one o'clock on that day, by his medical attendant. That gentleman, finding the deceased considerably worse, and apprizing his wife of this, left by her desire a message at the office of his solicitor, Mr. Swan, that a Mr. Cook, one of his clerks, should be sent to the deceased for the purpose of making his will as soon as he came in—Mr. Swan himself being absent from Lincoln, and Cook not just at that time in the way. Cook attended the deceased accordingly, though not till about five o'clock, and took instructions for his will, the purport of which he immediately reduced into writing in the deceased's presence. He then withdrew at his desire with his brother Thomas Foster into an adjoining room, in order to calculate more nicely the value of his property, and to consider the best and easiest mode of carrying his testamentary intentions, explained as above by the deceased himself, into full and final effect. [464] Certain alterations were made in the instructions, as originally taken, in the course of this conference; which alterations, however, the brother, Thomas Foster, afterwards explained to the deceased, who approved of them; and desired that a will in the several codicils to be accumulative, and not substitutive [i.e. supposing the legacy in each succeeding codicil to be accumulative upon, and not in lieu of, that in the codicil preceding it], this daughter Phillisaida alone would be entitled to no less a sum than 12,546l. and 350l. per annum. And as the codicil of 26th October, 1821, bequeathed to the testator's other natural daughters, Sybil and Clara, "an estate similar in all respects" to that given by former codicils to Phillisaida, the provision for these three natural children alone would, upon this construction, amount to 37,638l. and 1050l. per annum; a provision, it was argued, quite out of reason, and ruinous to his estate, and which the deceased therefore could never be supposed to have contemplated.

should be prepared, immediately, pursuant to the original instructions thus altered or modified. The deceased shortly after fainted away, and became so rapidly worse and worse that Cook, who had instantly set about preparing a will, was repeatedly urged to dispatch, and was at last obliged to conclude, somewhat abruptly, in order that the deceased might execute it so as to pass real estate, of which his property principally consisted.(a)[1] The will, in this state, was taken to the deceased, and was duly executed by him in the presence of three witnesses. This main object of the parties being thus secured, Cook, the writer of the will, began drawing up a codicil, by way of explaining the will, and expressing the deceased's intentions more fully and distinctly; but before this could be accomplished, though he wrote with the utmost possible expedition, he was apprized that the deceased had expired. These instruments are the will and codicil severally (virtually) propounded in this cause. I should say that the son, Charles Foster, was fully aware of these transactions, and was actually present at the execution of the will.

On the seventh day, the 29th of June following, this will and codicil were produced to, and read in the presence of, the several members of the family, assembled on the occasion of the deceased's funeral. [465] After supper, the eldest son, Charles Foster, desiring to see this will and codicil, they were handed to him, together with the "instructions," by the brother, Thomas Foster, who, soon after, retiring for the night, left his nephew, apparently perusing these, merely desiring him, when he had done with them, to give them to his mother for safe custody; instead of which, however, it appears that he left the room, and presently the house, abruptly, taking them with him. Of the subsequent history of these several instruments all which is known to a certainty is that the fragments of them were found on the following morning scattered in several closes or fields adjoining the river Witham, near the deceased's house: but there is no question that this son Charles Foster had attempted to destroy these several instruments altogether, by so tearing them to pieces, and scattering the fragments where, as I have just said, they were found by one of the brother Thomas Foster's children, on the next succeeding day.

It further appears that the fragments of this will and codicil (all carefully collected) were, on or about the 7th of July following, pasted on two several sheets of paper, now before the Court, marked A and B; and that Mr. Cook, shortly after, copied out these fragments, filling up, at the same time, from memory and recollection, those parts, the fragments of which could not be found. Such copies are also before the Court, being the papers marked C and D,(a)[2] in which the words, not to be found

(a)[1] The deceased's real property was estimated at about 9000l. in value; his personalty, at only about 3 or 4000l.

(a)[2] Paper C was as follows:—The words and letters printed in italics being those supplied by Cook, the writer of the will, from memory, underscored, to distinguish them from the others, in the original paper.

This is the last will and testament of me Charles Foster, of the city of Lincoln, builder, which I make in manner following, that is to say, I give and devise unto my son, Charles Foster, all that messuage or inn, com*monly called* the Roy*al Oak*, with the close, or paddock, and other hereditaments thereto belonging, situate in the city of Lincoln, aforesaid, and now in the occupation of my said son Cha*rles Foster*, to hold the same, unto and to the use of my said son Charles Foster, h*is heirs* and assigns, for ever, subject nevertheless and charged, and chargeable, with the payment of the sum of one thousand four hund*red pounds to* be paid to my executors herc*in*after named, within twelve calen*dar months next after my decease.* I give and devise all that my messuage or dwel*ling-h*ouse, with the garden and paddock thereto adjoining and belonging, and situate in the parish of St. Botolph, and no*w* in my occupation, unto my dear wife Sarah * Foster, and her ass*igns*, for, and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long con*tinue my widow*; and from aud after her decease, or *marry*ing again, wh*ich should first happ*en, I give and de*vise* the same unto, and to the use of my son David Foster, his heirs and assigns for ever. among the fragments, and so supplied by Mr. Cook, [466] from memory, are underscored to distinguish them from the others. And I am satisfied from the whole [467] evidence in the case, particularly that of Cook and the brother, that paper C contains the whole substance of the deceased's will; and that paper D expresses the true tenor and effect of the codicil so drawn up by Cook, pursuant to the deceased's directions, in his life-time—the writer breaking off immediately on being apprized of his death. The original instructions, I should add, being written very close in a small hand, and on both sides of a sheet of paper, the fragments of these could not be put together like those of the will and codicil. They are before the Court, indeed; but still as fragments only.

Such are the facts of this case, the application of the law to which is attended with little difficulty. The evidence, I think, establishes the factum of the alleged will—and also that the codicil, so far as it goes, is conformable to instructions given by the deceased, and was reduced into writing during his life. Consequently, not only this will, if in ex-[468]-istence would be entitled to probate, but, under the circumstances, the codicil also, though unexecuted, upon principles too familiar to all of us to suggest to the Court any need of repeating them.(a) And the Court being satisfied—first, that these instruments have ceased to exist (to exist, that is, in their integral state) only under the circumstances just described—but that, secondly, the true tenor and effect at least, of these, though not all the very words, are still before it in papers C and D—under these circumstances, it is no less its duty to pronounce for papers C and D, than it would have been to have pronounced for the original instruments themselves, if total and entire. Accordingly, I decree administration to the widow, with papers C and D annexed.(b) [469] Costs were prayed against the son, Charles Foster.

Court. I feel some difficulty about condemning this party in costs. Of the gross impropriety of his conduct there can be but one opinion: it can scarcely be reprobated in language severe enough. But he has given no appearance—the proceedings, as against him, are had in pœnam merely; and I observe no mention, either of costs, eo nomine, at least, or of the act of spoliation of which this son Charles Foster now stands convicted in the "decree" which has been served upon him "to see proceedings." I am aware of no instance of a party having been condemned in costs under such circumstances. The case cited by the counsel, that of Blackmore and Thorpe against Brider (2 Phillimore, page 359), was a criminal suit. Question reserved.

Paper D was similar in general appearance to paper C—the words supplied from memory bearing nearly the same proportion to the others in this as in paper C. It was not thought necessary, however, that either this or the whole of paper C should be printed.

(a) See Wood and Wood, 1 Phillimore, 357. Sikes v. Snaith, 2 Phillimore, 355, et al. pass.

(b) The sentence was as follows:—

The Judge, &c. "pronounced for the force and validity of the true and original last will and testament, with a codicil thereto, of Charles Foster, the deceased in this cause, the said will being without date, and the said codicil without date or subscription, as contained in two paper-writings, marked respectively with the letters C and D, now remaining in the registry of this Court, annexed to, and pleaded and referred to in, a certain allegation given in, and admitted in this cause, on the part and behalf of Ann Foster, the lawful relict of the said deceased, and a legatee named in the said will, and bearing date on the 4th Session of Hilary Term, to wit, Monday, the 10th day of February, 1823—and directed the Christian names of the said Ann Foster and Richard Dixon, in the said will and codicil called Sarah Foster and John Dixon, to be altered—to wit, the said name Sarah to be altered to Ann, and the said name John to be altered to Richard."

It appeared, as should be stated, in order to explain this last part of the sentence, from Cook's evidence that, in supplying from memory, the defective parts of the will and codicil, in papers C and D, he had written John instead of Richard Dixon, and Sarah instead of Ann Foster (the deceased's widow), merely inadvertently, or by mistake.

On a subsequent day—per Curiam. I think that the Court is justified in giving against this party the costs as prayed. The "decree" intimated that, in case of his not appearing, &c., the Court would proceed through the several intermediate steps, to the giving of a final sentence in the cause, "according to law and justice:" and it does appertain sufficiently to both of these, in my judgment, to condemn in the costs of this suit the person whose gross misconduct has principally occasioned it. I say "principally," because these parties must have come before the Court to establish the codicil had there been no act of spoliation.

[470] THOMAS AND HUGHES v. MORRIS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, Bye-Day, 1823.—Quære, whether the ordinary is absolutely barred, in the exercise of his discretion, from granting a faculty confirmatory of certain alterations made in a parish church, by reason of some omission (granting it to be) of legal form in the publication of notice of the vestry at which such alterations were resolved upon by the parish; and the churchwardens were empowered to make them.

(An appeal from the Consistory Court of St. David's.)

This was an appeal from the Consistory Court of St. David's, where originally it was an application for a faculty to confirm the erection of a vestry-room and gallery, in the parish church of Laugharne, in the county of Carmarthen.

A process was taken out at the suit of Thomas and Hughes, churchwardens of the parish, reciting, "That at a vestry held on the 27th of April, 1820, and, by adjournment, on the 29th of the same month, it was resolved that the churchwardens should construct, and they were empowered to construct, a vestry-room and gallery in the said church, according to a plan then produced; and that, in pursuance of this order, the vestry-room, and gallery over it, were constructed and completed; and that they prayed a faculty, approving and confirming the work." Accordingly "the vicar, churchwardens, and parishioners are cited to shew cause why the faculty should not be granted," with the usual intimation, "that if they do not appear, or appearing, do not shew sufficient cause against it, the faculty will be granted."

An appearance was given for some of the parishioners, but Morris was the only party who continued the opposition. The grounds of opposition were stated in "an act upon petition," and replied to; and affidavits in support of the different state-[471]-ments were filed on each side. The matter came on for hearing in the Consistory Court, on the 28th of November, 1822, when the surrogate, presiding in that Court, refused to grant the faculty, and dismissed the suit, but without costs on either side. From this decree the churchwardens appealed to the Court of Arches; and the appeal now came on for hearing.

In opening the cause on the part of the respondent it was stated that the objections to the grant of the faculty principally relied on were, first, that the vestry was not legally held, there being no proof that the notice of holding it, after being published in the church, was affixed to the church-door as required by the late act of Parliament (a); and, secondly, that the additions were not necessary for the accommodation of the parishioners.

On the part of the appellants it was stated in the opening that there was direct proof that notice of the vestry and its particular object was duly published in the church—that the vestry was held in the usual manner and continued by adjournment—that the general concurrence of the parish was evident—that the work was done, and no [472] objection taken till long after it was finished, when disputes arose upon other subjects—that even if there were some omission of legal form (but which was not proved, nor could be presumed) in respect to the notice, however it might expose the churchwardens to risk, in regard to the expence, if the alterations should not be approved by the ordinary, still the objection was not fatal in this case; and did not bind the ordinary in the exercise of his discretion, in the grant of a faculty confirming the work when done, if in itself the erection was proper to be confirmed. It was further stated that the affidavits, taken in their just result, fully established the want of increased accommodation in the church—the general concurrence and approbation of the parishioners—the making of a subsequent rate to defray the expence—and that the opposition manifestly grew out of disputes which afterwards arose respecting the allotment of the seats in the new gallery: which allotment had nothing to do with the present question and would not in any degree be affected by the grant of this faculty.

(a) 58 Geo. 3, c. 99. "An Act for the regulation of parish vestries," which provides, s. 1, that "no vestry, or meeting of the inhabitants in vestry, of or for any parish, shall be holden until public notice shall have been given of such vestry, and of the place and hour of holding the same, and the special purpose thereof, three days at the least before the day to be appointed for holding such vestry; by the publication of such notice in the parish church or chapel on some Sunday, during, or immediately after divine service; and by affixing the same, fairly written or printed, on the principal door of such church or chapel."

The Judge—Sir John Nicholl, then observed that, having read all the papers and affidavits, he was strongly disposed to concur in the view of the case as stated in the opening by the appellants' counsel; and he asked the counsel for the respondent whether they could hope in the argument to maintain with success, either that the faculty could not legally be granted; or that, under the circumstances resulting from the affidavits, it would not be a proper exercise of the discretion of [473] the ordinary to confirm the erection of these useful accommodations in the church of so populous and opulent a parish? and whether their party would not be content to submit to a reversal of the decree appealed from, and to a grant of the faculty, provided the Court, in the hope of promoting conciliation, and restoring harmony in the parish, should be disposed in that case to give no costs?

This proposition being acceded to on both sides, the decree was so made by the Court.

BRIDGWATER, FORMERLY HAYWARD v. CRUTCHLEY. Arches Court, Trinity Term, Bye-Day, 1823.—A marriage by licence deemed null and void under 26 G. 2, c. 33, by reason of minority and want of legal consent—a nullity held under the circumstances not to be cured by 3 G. 4, c. 75, s. 2.

(By letters of request from the chancellor of the diocese of Llandaff.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit of nullity of marriage under the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33 (one of the last, probably, which this Court may be called upon to entertain), brought by the mother and guardian of a female minor, Charlotte Ann Hayward, against Josiah Crutchley, the de facto husband. The suit is had in pœnam against Crutchley, who has been personally served however (not indeed with the citation which issued in the first instance in this cause, for a personal service of that could not be effected, but) with a citation (to the same effect) by ways and means, and also with a decree to see proceedings; [474] and who appearing to neither of these processes has been formally and regularly put and pronounced in contempt.

The libel states the facts necessary to be proved, and the depositions of fourteen witnesses who have been examined on the libel prove those facts in a manner highly satisfactory. The proofs indeed (which the Court always expects to be precise in ex parte matrimonial suits) are peculiarly so in the case now before it. That case as pleaded, and as it appears thus fully in evidence, is briefly as follows:—

Charlotte Ann Hayward, the minor, whose marriage is sought to be dissolved, is the daughter of Joseph Arno and his wife (now Bridgwater and party in the cause), and was born at Lyme, in Dorsetshire, on the 23d of March, 1804. In 1810 the father of the minor died intestate. The mother soon after the father's death removed to Brecon with her family, a son and four daughters, where they have ever since resided; and in 1811 took the sirname of Hayward from respect to her maternal grandfather so named; by which name of Hayward and not that of Arno her children from that time have passed, and are still known, as she herself had passed and was known till her marriage with Mr. Bridgwater, which is pleaded and proved to have taken place subsequent to the de facto marriage of her daughter, the subject of the present suit. This removal of the family from Lyme to Brecon, and their adoption of the name of Hayward, are only material on the score of identity; or, in other words, for the purpose of connecting the Charlotte Ann Arno born at Lyme in 1804 with [475] the Charlotte Ann Hayward married to Crutchley at Merthyr in 1822, and thus establishing the minority of the person so married, at the time of that marriage. The mother's subsequent marriage with Mr. Bridgwater was material on two accounts; first, on the score of identity again, that is to identify her as the mother of the minor; and, secondly, in order to shew that her own marriage was subsequent to her daughter's—the marriage at issue in the suit. For on the mother's widowhood at that time, plainly depended her right of consent to her daughter's marriage; and consequently her title to institute the present proceeding. In the mother, being a widow, the sole right of consent to the marriage of her minor daughter clearly vested: for the father, I have said, died intestate; and it is pleaded and has been proved in the usual manner, namely, by a search into the records of that Court, that no guardian of the person of the minor had been appointed by any order of the Court of Chancery.

The circumstances of the marriage, and what immediately preceded and ensued upon it, are these:

The party, Josiah Crutchley, being the son of a man who had formerly kept the Angel Inn at Abergavenny, but who then lived on a farm near that town, and whose mother and sisters at that time kept and managed a public-house, the Bell, at Brecon, procured a licence, as for this marriage at Llandaff, by an affidavit, false in at least two particulars. For, first, he swore this minor to be of age; and, secondly, he swore her to be of the parish of Merthyr, where the marriage was meant to be, and afterwards actually was celebrated. Mrs. Hayward and her family retired as usual for the [476] night, on the day preceding the marriage, namely, on the 22d of March. Between two and three o'clock in the morning of the 23d the minor, Charlotte Ann Hayward, left her bed in which she slept with a younger sister, called up a maid servant, Webb, a girl younger than herself, whom she had previously engaged as her confidante; and, accompanied by Webb, made her escape through the dining-room window, dropping a note with which Crutchley had furnished her to mislead the family by holding out that she was going to be married to Crutchley at Carmarthen. Webb and Miss Hayward went directly to the Bell at Brecon, kept by Crutchley's mother and sisters, where they were joined by Crutchley himself; and these with a fourth person, Crutchley's sister, immediately set-off for Merthyr in a chaise from Abergavenny, previously hired and kept in readiness by Crutchley. At Merthyr the party arrived about seven in the morning: and there, after breakfast, the marriage ceremony was performed by Mr. Jones the curate, whose services in that behalf Crutchley had bespoke whilst breakfast was preparing at the inn. Crutchley's sister was left at Merthyr; the others, with Webb, proceeded in the same chaise through Abergavenny to Hereford, where they arrived about five in the evening and put up at "the hotel" kept by a Mr. Bennett. There they dined in a room below stairs, and Morgan, the chaise driver, was soon after, namely, about seven o'clock, paid and discharged, with an injunction from Crutchley to conceal the place where Miss Hayward and himself had alighted, should this be inquired after. In compliance with which, this Morgan having, on going out of Hereford, actually [477] encountered Mr. Bridgwater, who afterwards married the mother, and Mr. Augustus Hayward, the brother of the minor, in pursuit of her, told them that he, Morgan, had left her with Crutchley, at the Green Dragon. The alarm given by the one sister, on discovering the absence of the other, the distress of the mother at the news of the daughter's elopement, the pursuit of Mr. Bridgwater and Mr. Augustus Hayward, first in the Carmarthen direction; next, finding that a wrong scent, across the country to Merthyr, where they received intelligence of Crutchley's actual marriage to Miss Hayward; and, lastly, to Hereford, at the entry of which city they encountered Morgan, as I have said, are circumstances all spoken to very fully by the witnesses in the cause, and account for the arrival at that precise time, of the persons in pursuit of these parties, at Hereford. In the mean time Crutchley, suspecting a pursuit, from hearing that a chaise and four, with two gentlemen, had just arrived, took the alarm, and decamped with his bride, from Bennett's hotel to another inn, called "the Commercial Hotel," kept by a person named Woakes, leaving Webb at the house where they had first alighted. But the pursuers, having at last discovered the retreat of the fugitives, through a porter sent to convey their luggage from Bennett's hotel, arrived at the Commercial Hotel so close after them, that the coffee, which, according to the landlord Woakes's evidence, they had ordered upon their arrival, had not yet at that time been served up. The minor then, after some persuasion, consented to go back to her mother's at Brecon, where she arrived at about four or five o'clock on the next morning, that [478] of the 24th of March; and she has since resided there with her mother, without any suggested intercourse or communication with Crutchley.

Now the daughter's minority—the mother's sole right of consent to her marriage—her prior ignorance of, and when known, her total dissent from, her daughter's marriage, that of the minor in question in the suit—and, lastly, that such marriage was had under and by virtue of licence, are facts in this cause which are all proved beyond any possibility of doubt or question. And it need scarcely be said that, upon this state of facts, cohabitation or not, the marriage is, under the statute of Geo. 2, clearly a nullity.

But as with reference to a later statute, to which the Court's attention must now be directed, cohabitation or not, in other words, the circumstances ensuing upon this marriage are highly material to the question of its validity; so that the legal effect of these still remains to be considered. I will only premise that the circumstances themselves as narrated above are fully proved by the several persons mentioned by name, in the course of the narrative, by the sister and brother of the minor; by Webb, the maid servant; by Mary, sister of the party Josiah Crutchley; by Morgan, the chaise driver; and by Bennett and Woakes, the masters of the respective inns at Hereford. And I must add to this, that the effect of their evidence, which reaches uninterruptedly, from the minor's elopement from, to her rescue at, Hereford, and subsequent return to her mother's at Brecon, is such as to satisfy my mind, not only that these parties have never cohabited, but that their de facto marriage has never been consummated.

[479] The later statute to which the Court has alluded is that of 3 Geo. 4, c. 75; the second section of which has provided, that "in all cases of marriage had and solemnized by licence, before the passing of this act, without any such consent as is required by so much of 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, as is recited in, and repealed by the first section,(a)[1] and where the parties shall have continued to live together as husband and wife, till the death of one of them, or till the passing of this act, or shall only have discontinued their cohabitation for the purpose, or during the pending, of any proceedings touching the validity of such marriage—such marriage, if not otherwise invalid, shall be deemed to be good and valid, to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

Now, with respect to the effect of the above clause upon the validity of this marriage, it is obvious that the single question must be—Did these parties only discontinue their cohabitation for the purpose of some proceeding touching the validity of this marriage? For the parties are both still living; and the act in question did not receive the royal assent till the 22d of July, 1822, the cohabitation of the parties having finally ceased (if indeed they can be said, with any propriety, ever to have "cohabited" at all) on the 22d of March preceding the very day of the marriage.

I am satisfied that the case before the Court is neither within the words, nor within the intention, of this clause of the act, under the provisions of which, as being an act ex post facto, it clearly ought not [480] to be included, by construction or implication. Not within the words, for a reason already hinted; namely, that a cohabitation can scarcely, with propriety, be spoken of as discontinued which had never commenced: there can be no end, properly, of what has no beginning. Not within the intention; for the intention of this clause was obviously in my judgment, if not to include a particular case, yet still, only to confirm marriages, which the parties themselves had previously confirmed (so far as in them lay) by a subsequent cohabitation, subsisting at the passing of the act, or only suspended for the institution of some proceeding, in order to ascertain thereby, this being doubtful, the legal validity of such marriage. Consequently, I am of opinion that this marriage, null and void under the former act, is not rendered valid by the retrospective provisions of this recent statute, of which it comes, I have just said, neither within the spirit nor the letter; but that it still remains a nullity, which I pronounce it. And I am further of opinion that the licence under which this marriage was had, having been procured by the wilful false swearing of Crutchley, the de facto husband, he ought, though proceeded against in pœnam merely, to be condemned in costs—a measure for which the Court, it seems, has a direct precedent;(a)[2] and I accordingly condemn him in the costs of this suit.

(a)[1] Namely, all that part of 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, which required (any) consent to the marriage of a minor by licence, under pain of such marriage being null and void for want of it.

[481] LAWRENCE, Attorney of Thomas v. MAUD AND PICKWELL. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1823.—Quære, whether the Court has power to rescind the conclusion of a cause, after sentence, against the sense and consent of the party for whom it was given. Parties praying to be heard upon their petition, as to any question, in the exercise of any other than a sound discretion, do so at the imminent risk of costs.

This was an application to the Court to rescind the conclusion of a cause, after sentence, but with a question still outstanding as to costs,(a)[1] under the circumstances, and for the purpose stated in the judgment, made in behalf of Mary Maud and Sarah Pickwell, and opposed on that of Frances Mary Thomas respectively, parties in the cause. It was made, in the first instance, on a motion which, being opposed, the Court declined acceding to. It was then renewed, as were also Mrs. Thomas's objections in the present "act on petition," which was sustained in the usual manner on both sides by exhibits and affidavits.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This was originally a cause of interest (see page 331, ante) between Frances Mary Thomas, alleged to be cousin german once removed, and Mary Maud and Sarah Pickwell, alleged to be the second cousins of Elizabeth Harrison, the party deceased in the cause. The interests of the parties were propounded re-[482]-spectively in two several allegations; but it was agreed (a)[2] that evidence should be taken upon that of Mrs. Thomas alone, she being alleged of kin to the deceased in the superior or nearer degree. The parties entered into this agreement in consequence of the recommendation of the Court (see pages 334-336, ante), founded upon a suggestion that Maud and Pickwell, in the event of Mrs. Thomas proving her allegation, had no interest upon their own shewing; and that, failing to prove it, she, Mrs. Thomas, had no concern with the case set up by Maud and Pickwell; which, whether proved or not, must, to her, be matter purely indifferent.

Accordingly, evidence was taken upon Mrs. Thomas's allegation only, or rather upon such articles of it (being those subsequent to the 11th article inclusive (c)) as went to the single fact really at issue [483] between the parties, namely, the marriage of Peter Harrison, uncle of the deceased and grandfather of Mrs. Thomas, with Elizabeth (Pelham) her grandmother, and the consequent lawful descent of Mrs. Thomas from this Peter Harrison, whom Maud and Pickwell alleged to have died a bachelor. And upon publication of this evidence, and its perusal by both parties, the fact of such lawful descent of Mrs. Thomas from Peter Harrison appeared to be so fully substantiated, that administration of the deceased's effects was decreed to Mr. Lawrence, as her attorney, without opposition on the part of Maud and Pickwell, their proctor declaring that "he proceeded no further" in the cause. This decree passed on the 4th Session of Hilary Term in the present year; and the question of costs stood for the bye-day. In the mean time, however, the proctor for Maud and Pickwell received from America certain documents to the effect which I shall presently state, upon which the present application founds itself; in disposing of which the first point for consideration is the precise nature and object of the application itself.

(a)[1] In pronouncing for the interest of Mrs. Thomas, the Judge had refused to give costs; whereupon her proctor, on behalf of his party, had prayed to be heard on his petition, as to this question of costs on the bye-day.

(a)[2] This could only be by agreement—the rule being, in causes of interest, that the parties shall propound their interests and proceed throughout in proof of them, pari passu, even where the alleged next of kin, as in this case, are in different degrees of relationship. This rule also obtains in the case of an executor setting up a will, and a party claiming to be next of kin, whose interest is denied. But where an administration has been fairly and regularly taken the rule varies; for the administrator in such case is not bound even to propound his interest till that of the party questioning it has first been both propounded and proved. See Dabbs v. Chisman, &c., 1 Phill. 155.

(c) The proctor for Maud and Pickwell had admitted in an act or minute of Court Mrs. Thomas's allegation, as laid to the 11th article inclusive, in return for permission given him, in the same act or minute, by the adverse proctor, to question or deny the rest of the allegation, without propounding (for the actual admission of Maud and Pickwell's allegation stood over) and going on to prove his clients' interest to question or deny it in the first instance—that is, in other words, without proceeding pari passu in the cause.

Now this application made at first, namely, on the bye-day after Hilary Term, on a motion, and since renewed in the present act on petition, is one, it must be admitted, of a novel kind. It is not to rescind the conclusion of a cause before sentence, but, in effect, to revoke a sentence itself—a sentence, too, given with the concurrence of the other parties, testified by their proctor's declaring that he "proceeded no further in the cause." It may be doubted how far the Court is empowered to revoke a sentence so given against the declared sense and [484] consent of the party in whose favour it is given. At the same time, it clearly appearing, prior to the actual conclusion of any suit, that a sentence in it, even purporting to be a final one pronounced by the Court, had proceeded in error, or been procured by fraud—the Court would undoubtedly go the utmost warrantable length in either of such cases to find itself the means of revising that sentence, in furtherance of, what would then be, the demands of real and substantial justice. In the present instance, however, the party in possession of the sentence has not questioned the right of the Court to proceed as prayed. She has joined issue fairly upon the merits; and what she denies is, not the power of the Court to accede to the prayer of the petitioners, Maud and Pickwell, but merely the propriety of its exercise under the circumstances stated, on their part, in the petition. Let us see, therefore, upon what grounds this application rests.

This application then, being of the nature which I have described, rests solely upon two documents received, among others relative to the Harrison family, from America, by the proctor for Mrs. Maud and Mrs. Pickwell, between the 4th Session and the bye-day of Hilary Term last. These documents are styled, in the act on petition, "an official copy of a grant of administration of the effects of Peter Harrison aforesaid to Mary Harrison, as widow of the said Peter Harrison, on the 18th day of May, 1775;" and "an official copy of an inventory of the said deceased's estate, made and given in by the said Mary Harrison, as such administratrix, on the first Monday in July of the same year." And they appear in the shape of extracts from the record book of the Court of Probate of Newhaven, in the State [485] of Connecticut in America,(a) where this Peter Harrison died, in the year 1775, having been for many years prior collector of the customs at that port. Hence it is inferred that Elizabeth (Pelham), who is pleaded by Mrs. Thomas to have survived her (alleged) husband Peter Harrison, neither was nor could be his lawful wife; upon the (supposed)

(a) These documents were as follows:—

No. 1.

At a Court of Probate, held at Newhaven, in Newhaven district, May 18th, 1775.

Administration on the estate of Peter Harrison, Esq., late of Newhaven, deceased, granted to Mary Harrison, widow of said deceased, on bond of 1000l. money with surety.

A true copy of record. Attest. JOHN HUNTZ, Clk.

No. 2.

At a Court of Probate, held at Newhaven, in Newhaven, district, on the first Monday of July, Anno Domini 1775.

Mary Harrison, administratrix on the estate of Peter Harrison, Esq., late of Newhaven, deceased, exhibited an inventory of said deceased's estate, which is accepted and approved for record.

[Here, in the original, follows the inventory.]

The above and foregoing is a true copy of record.

Attest. JOHN HUNTZ, Clk.

And I further certify, that the copy of the appointment of administration, and the foregoing inventory [the documents No. 1, and No. 2, printed above], is all that I can, after diligent search, find on the records of this Court appertaining to the estate of said deceased. Attest. JOHN HUNTZ, Clk.*

---

* Clerk, that is, of the Court of Probate and Administration, in and for the district of Newhaven, in the State of Connecticut, in the United States of America, and keeper of the records thereof, said Court being a Court of Record; so certified [27th December, 1822] under the hand and seal of office of the Judge of that Court; as also under those of his Britannic Majesty's consul for the State and city of New York.

[486] proof of which fact the Court pronounced for the interest of Mrs. Thomas. And the Court is prayed to revoke that sentence, in order to afford Maud and Pickwell an opportunity of controverting the fact of Mrs. Thomas's lawful descent from Peter Harrison, by aid of that new light which the receipt of these documents has furnished them. Accordingly, it is further prayed that Maud and Pickwell may have leave to alter their original plea, which alleged Peter Harrison to have died a bachelor, and to plead that "he had married one Mary (leaving a blank for her maiden name), who survived him."

When this application was first made to the Court, upon motion, and before the documents themselves, upon which it is founded, were brought in, the Court suggested that the Christian name of "Mary" might probably be a mere clerical error for that of "Elizabeth." But taking these documents (now brought in) in conjunction with the evidence upon Mrs. Thomas's allegation, and with the affidavits exhibited in support of the averments on her behalf made in the present act, I entertain no doubt whatever of the fact being as I originally supposed it. It is a clerical error, and one that, I think, might occur without any great difficulty. The first document is a mere minute or memorandum in the register book that the administration passed, or was granted on such a day—it is not, what the act states it, "an official copy of the grant of administration" itself; and in such mere minute, or memorandum, the entering clerk might easily, in the hurry of business, have written "Mary" for "Elizabeth." Nor, as to the other document again, is this an official copy of an inventory, given in by the administratrix as [487] "Mary Harrison," and so subscribed. The inventory itself has no signature or subscription. It is true that the heading of the inventory states it to be of the exhibiting of "Mary Harrison, administratrix of Peter Harrison, &c.;" but this heading was obviously written by the clerk, as appears from the words "which is approved, &c." at the foot, who in writing it would naturally, the error not being detected, make it correspond, in this respect, with the former minute.

Now these being the sole foundation for the present application, and these at most only inferring that the lawful widow and relict of Peter Harrison was "Mary" and not "Elizabeth," how does the other case stand (not merely) inferring (but proving, I think, in a manner most satisfactory) that the lawful widow and relict of this same Peter Harrison really was Elizabeth (formerly Pelham) and not Mary?

1. And, first, how does this matter stand in the evidence taken upon Mrs. Thomas's allegation in the original cause. The marriage, de facto, of Peter Harrison with Elizabeth Pelham, in June, 1746, is fully proved in such evidence. It is fully proved that they lived and cohabited as husband and wife, with mutual acknowledgment and general reputation, from that time to the death of Peter Harrison in 1775—he, too, being in a public situation, that of collector of customs at Newhaven. It is proved that they had four children, a son and three daughters, baptized, acknowledged, and reputed as legitimate—that on the death of the son here, in England, in 1772, letters were written by relatives here condoling with the parents, as upon the loss of a [488] legitimate child; and, lastly, that two of the daughters (the third, Isabella, having died young), namely, Hermione, afterwards Mrs. Cargy, and Elizabeth, afterwards Mrs. Ludlow, and mother of Mrs. Thomas, actually inherited property from the parents, as legitimate children. How is all this at all consistent with the mother of these children not being the wife, or at least not the lawful wife, of Peter Harrison, but a Mary (something)? for even to this instant the parties Maud and Pickwell do not pretend to furnish her original sirname: nor can they, to this instant, pretend to any knowledge of Peter Harrison's marriage with a female of such Christian or baptismal name, other than that derived by mere inference from these documents.

2. But, secondly, it is quite clear in my judgment upon the affidavits now brought in in support of Mrs. Thomas's act, that administration of Peter Harrison's effects was granted to Elizabeth, and not to Mary Harrison, as his widow and relict; and, consequently, that the occurrence of "Mary" instead of "Elizabeth" in these documents is, and must be, a mere clerical error. For instance, Mr. Curgenven, who was well acquainted with the family of Peter Harrison, whom he succeeded as collector of customs at Newhaven, deposes to having himself seen the original letters of administration under the seal of the Probate Court at Newhaven, of the effects of Peter Harrison, granted to Elizabeth (not Mary), as his widow and relict. He further deposes to Elizabeth (grandmother of Mrs. Thomas) acting as such administratrix throughout. This deponent himself was actually examined as a witness on the trial, at a court of common law held at Newhaven, of a [489] suit (the particulars of which he also deposes to brought against this Elizabeth, as widow and administratrix of Peter Harrison's effects, and in that character solely. Even the inventory itself said to be exhibited by a Mary Harrison, as administratrix, furnishes, in conjunction with the affidavits, a pregnant proof that the real administratrix was this Elizabeth. The inventory specifies a negro man named Apollo; a negro woman named Lucy; and two paintings, one of the "Crucifix" (meaning, I suppose, the crucifixion) and the other of "St. Francis." Now it distinctly appears from the affidavits of Mrs. Thomas herself, of Mr. Curgenven, and of a Miss Brenton, that Mrs. Thomas's grandmother, Elizabeth, actually had in her service and possession this very negro and negress, and these very pictures so specified in this inventory: how otherwise acquired than as the administratrix of Peter Harrison, and consequently the person who exhibited the inventory, it would be difficult plausibly to conjecture even.

I, therefore, reject this petition, and I think that I am bound to reject it with costs. In renewing their application to the Court by petition, upon such insufficient grounds, Maud and Pickwell seem to me not to have exercised a sound discretion; the effect of which, in strictness, undoubtedly is to render them liable to Mrs. Thomas in the costs of this proceeding. It may be commendable, perhaps even prudent, in Mrs. Thomas, under all the circumstances, to waive her costs; but I hold that the Court is bound, in strictness, to give her the means of recovering these from Maud and Pickwell, if so disposed.

Petition rejected.

[490] DICKENSON v. WHITE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1823. —A. dies, leaving, by will, his wife B. sole executrix and universal legatee. Allegation propounding a codicil to A.'s will, found subsequent to B.'s death, on behalf of a legatee (B.'s executor refusing to take administration of A.'s unadministered effects with his will, and this codicil annexed) admitted to proof.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

John Whitehead, the party deceased in this cause, died on the 28th of February, 1819. In the month of July in that year probate of his will, bearing date on the 3d of November, 1817, was taken by his widow and relict, Hester Mary Whitehead, as sole executrix. In virtue of that probate the widow, who was also, under this will, universal legatee, collected and administered the deceased's personal estate and effects, valued, after payment of his debts and funeral expences, at about 1600l.

On the 9th of February, 1823, Hester Mary Whitehead, widow of the deceased, died, leaving several testamentary papers, probate of which was duly taken by James White, party in the cause, her sole executor. Subsequent, however, to the death of Hester Mary Whitehead, a codicil (so said) to the will of John Whitehead, deceased, was first discovered. But White refusing, when called upon so to do, as executor of the wife, to accept letters of administration, with the will and codicil annexed, of the effects left unadministered by the wife of her late husband, the party deceased in this cause, whom she, the wife, had survived and represented as above—the latter, this codicil, was propounded in an allegation which now stood for admission, on behalf of Mary Dickenson, one of the universal legatees for life named in the said codicil, the other party in the cause—the party, namely, promoting it against [491] White, as sole executor of Hester Mary Whitehead, the widow and relict of the deceased.

This allegation propounding the codicil, after pleading the factum of the will in November, 1817, and that of the codicil (alleged) bearing date on the 31st of July, 1818 (this last expressly pleaded to be all in the deceased's hand-writing), as also that probate of such will only was taken by his widow, Hester Mary Whitehead, on the death of the deceased in 1819, went on to plead, that

"Hester Mary Whitehead, the widow and relict of the said John Whitehead, the testator in this cause, departed this life on or about the 9th day of February, in the present year 1823—that, immediately after her decease, Alexander Hale Strong, of Lincoln's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, solicitor, attended at the house of the said Hester Mary Whitehead, for the purpose of searching for her will; and having there met John White, party in this cause, and others of the family and friends of the said deceased, several testamentary papers which had been found were then read over by the said Alexander Hale Strong, in the presence of the said John White, and the said other persons—that the will and other testamentary papers of the said Hester Mary Whitehead, deceased, having been deposited in different places, a further and final search was afterwards made by the said Alexander Hale Strong, in the presence of the said John White and others of the family and friends of the said deceased, in order to discover whether any further or other will, or testamentary paper, had been overlooked; and a trunk, or portmanteau, having been found in a closet in one of the garrets of the said deceased's house, con-[492]-taining old bills and receipts, and a variety of other papers, which had not been before examined, the said trunk, or portmanteau, was brought down into a bed-room, for the purpose of being so examined; and at the bottom of the papers therein contained was discovered a small roll of paper, sealed, and having the following indorsement, in the hand-writing of the said John Whitehead, the deceased in this cause:—'This paper to be opened by F. Le Man, Esq., in case of death'—that the said paper, on being so discovered, and appearing to be of a testamentary nature, was delivered to the said John White, party in this cause, and was by him taken to F. Le Man, Esq.; and thereupon the seal of the said paper was broken, and the same was read over by the said F. Le Man, and found to be the very codicil now pleaded and propounded in this cause."

The codicil so propounded was in these words:—

There is 1700l. in the Bank of England, consisting of 2000l. consolidated 3 per cents. annuities, in my name, belonging to my wife Mrs. Whitehead; this sum, with the value of 3000l., a policy of insurance on my life,(a)[1] in case of my own, or both of us dying, is designed as a provision for the niece Mary Dickenson, and the nephew James Dickenson, to be appropriated for their use solely, and to be secured so as to be protected from any claim that may arise from any other applicants in point of con-[493]-sanguinity; and the principal money to be secured in the Court of Chancery during their minority, and afterwards appropriated for their use only, with the personal property belonging to myself, so that the capital may be undisturbed during their lives, and afterwards to be divided equally between my wife's brother's and sister's children.(a)[2] Witness my hand, this 31st July, 1818.

J. WHITEHEAD.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. I have no hesitation in admitting this allegation to proof. The paper which it propounds is perfect in form, as well as testamentary in effect; and having been written (so pleaded) by the testator subsequent to his will, it must, on this and the other facts stated in the allegation connected with it appearing in evidence, beyond all question, be entitled to probate as a codicil to his will. I presume that its being overlooked upon the testator's death, and the widow, consequently, taking probate of the will alone, was purely accidental.

At the same time, as this whole case must depend upon hand-writing, and finding (not inconsiderably on the latter) it would be material to connect the alleged codicil with the testator, by pleading (that is, the fact being such) that the trunk in, and other papers among, which it was found had formerly belonged to the testator. It would also be proper, at any rate, to introduce into the plea who the Mr. [494] Le Man is, to whom the opening and execution of this paper purports to be confided, and how connected with the deceased.

With these corrections, one or both, I admit the allegation.(a)[3]

Allegation admitted.

(a)[1] It is to be observed that there was no such sum as that expressed, or any other in the bank, belonging to the testator at the time of his death. The policy of insurance, however, was in existence, and the sum of 3000l. was actually received upon it by Mrs. Whitehead.

(a)[2] James and Mary Dickenson were children of a sister of Mrs. Whitehead; the codicil only styles them the nephew and niece, without saying whose nephew or niece.

(a)[3] These corrections being effected in Court, viz. by inserting, after the words "bills, receipts, and a variety of other papers" the following—"Which had belonged to the said John Whitehead, deceased"—and after the name and addition "F. Le Man, Esq.," the following—"Who was a confidential friend of the said John Whitehead, deceased, in his life-time," the allegation stood admitted to proof.

WEBB v. NEEDHAM. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1823.—Widow usually preferred to a next of kin in the grant of administration, notwithstanding her having married again.—Administration, upon what principle only, granted to a creditor—can only be, failing any other representative. A next of kin being also a creditor, a reason against his being preferred in a contest for the administration, either with the widow, or, probably, any other next of kin.

(On petition.)

Thomas, Needham, the party deceased, died in the month of December, 1809, intestate, without child or parents, leaving a widow, Louisa Needham, and one brother, Ralph Needham, his only next of kin.

In the month of March, 1823, this Louisa (formerly Needham, but then Webb, wife of William Webb) applied for administration of the goods of the deceased, as his lawful relict, and was duly sworn, and had entered into the usual bond, when a caveat against the grant was found to have been [495] entered on behalf of Ralph Needham, the brother, who subsequently appeared and prayed that administration of the deceased's effects might be granted to him as next of kin.

The substance of the allegations on either side, as contained in an "act on petition," supported in the usual manner by affidavits, is stated in the judgment.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Thomas Needham, the deceased, died in the month of December, 1809, intestate. Administration of his effects is now applied for both by the intestate's wife and by his brother, and the Court has to determine between their several claims.

Administration of the goods of an intestate may be granted either to his wife or to a next of kin. At the same time it is well known that in practice, at least in modern practice, the wife is preferred in this matter under ordinary circumstances. In the present instance, however, it is attempted to be shewn that there are special reasons for reversing this order and giving the brother a priority. The special reasons alleged are two: the first of these is that the wife has married again and is now under coverture. The second is that the brother is not only next of kin (indeed the sole next of kin), but that he is also a creditor of the deceased's estate to a large amount; in fact, to nearly the whole amount of the effects to be administered.

1. The single objection made to the widow is her having married again. Now this, under the circumstances, is, I think, no valid objection. The party who raises it, the brother, is entitled only to a [496] moiety of the effects; it is not as if the deceased had left children, one of which children, supported by the rest, applied for administration in preference to the mother. There the children being entitled to two-thirds, and the mother to one-third only, of the distributive property, this circumstance of the mother having married again might induce the Court to grant the administration to a child in preference. That, however, is not this case; and it will be time enough to determine what is fit to be done in that case when it occurs. But, as in contest with the brother, I think that the wife's having married again is no valid ground of objection to her; and I find it to have been so held in a case determined in Dr. Andrews's time, of which I have a manuscript note, where, as in the present, it was urged against the wife by the brother of an intestate. I will only add that, if a re-marriage is no defeasance of the wife's title to a priority in this matter, generally, there is nothing whatever in special to make it such in the present case. The second husband is stated and sworn to be a man of some property independent of his business, that of a perfumer; thus affording the brother a sort of extra security for the custody and due distribution of the distributive property. The wife, too, has been actually sworn administratrix, and has given bond with sureties, who are also stated upon oath to be in respectable circumstances; which sureties themselves, thus able, probably are willing at the same time to justify.

2. Dismissing this part of the case, it remains to see whether the brother has made out his claim to a preference on the other matter alleged—that of his also being a creditor of the deceased.

It appears that the estate and effects of the de-[497]-ceased consist of 450l. 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities, devised to him by the will of his father, Ralph Needham, deceased, payable on the death of his mother, ——— Needham, which happened only in the month of July, 1821; which stock, together with the dividends accruing since the death of the mother, is valued at about 340l. Now the brother alleges that for divers monies lent to the deceased prior to his departure from this country for New York, in 1807; for other sums sent, to and advanced for him whilst at New York; and for funeral expences, the deceased's estate is truly and justly indebted to him, the brother, in the sum of 300l. and upwards; that is, in nearly the whole sum at which the effects are valued. To this it is replied, on the part of the wife, that the estate of the deceased is indebted to the brother in no such or in any other sum; that the pretended advances in question to the deceased were really made by the mother through the brother's medium or intervention only; and that the brother's claim is now advanced for the first time, the deceased having died in 1809.

Now here, in the first place, this circumstance of the brother being also a creditor of the deceased's estate, on which he relies for sustaining his claim to a priority, is positively denied by the wife. The parties then here are distinctly at issue; and this, being a question purely extrinsic and collateral, is one into the merits of which, most assuredly, the Court will decline to enter. But the brother's having disputable, or at least disputed, claims upon the intestate's property is a circumstance rather adverse to than in favour of his pretensions to the administration, in my view of the case. Administration is only granted to a creditor failing any other repre-[498]-sentative; in which case there being nobody to sue, the creditor not being himself administrator, and so able to pay himself, must almost of necessity lay out of his debt. But where a person whose duty and interest it is to contest claims on the deceased's estate is before the Court willing to undertake the administration, he or she it is that is entitled to the grant, and not the creditor, both in law and reason. As creditor merely, indeed, it is obvious that Mr. Ralph Needham could only obtain letters of administration on the widow (and next of kin) refusing or declining to take them. This union of the two characters in his single person is rather, I repeat, adverse than favorable to his claim to be preferred, in my apprehension of its effect.

On these grounds I am of opinion that neither of the reasons alleged are good in defeasance of the widow or relict's prior title to be administratrix. As for the matter of laches objected to her in the argument—the parties in this respect are in pari delicto; nor is the one that I see at all in a condition to employ it with effect as an argument against the other. The deceased's estate, save as to the monies now coming into distribution, is admitted on all hands to have been insolvent. Administration was applied for as soon as, or within a reasonable time after, the death of the mother furnished any thing to administer; and that, at least for any practical purpose, was time enough.

Upon the whole, I decree administration to the wife; and I think that, in order to deter parties in future from attempting to gain undue advantages, or those denied them in law, by vexatious experiments of this nature, I am bound at the same time to condemn the brother in costs.

[499] MILLER v. BLOOMFIELD AND SLADE. High Court of Delegates, Trinity Term, 19th June, 1823.—A libel, pleading a church rate, including "stock in trade," admitted to proof.

(An appeal from the Court of the Peculiar and Exempt Jurisdiction of Great Canford and Poole.(a))

The Judges who sat under this commission were Mr. Baron Garrow, Mr. Justice Best,(b) Dr. Arnold, Dr. Jenner, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Gostling, Dr. Dodson, and Dr. Lee.

This was an appeal from an order or decree made on the 8th day of October, 1822, by the Wor-[500]-shipful and Reverend Charles Bowle, Clerk, Master of Arts, Principal Official of the Peculiar and Exempt Jurisdiction of Great Canford and Poole, in a certain cause or business of subtraction of church rate then depending before him in

---

(a) The parish of St. James in Poole is within, and forms part of, the royal peculiar of Great Canford and Poole. The official, who is the ordinary of this peculiar, is appointed by the lords of the manor of Great Canford, of which manor Poole is a part. [See Hutchins's Dorset, vol. i. p. 12-14.] From the official of a royal peculiar the appeal lies not to the bishop of the diocese, or to the metropolitan, but immediately and in the first instance to the King in Chancery; that is, in other words, to the Court of Delegates.

(b) Mr. Justice Richardson was also named in the commission, but was too indisposed to be present at the hearing of this appeal.

judgment, between Joseph Barter Bloomfield and Robert Slade the younger, churchwardens of the parish of St. James, in the town and county of the town of Poole, the parties promoting the said cause or business, on the one part; and Richard Miller, a parishioner and inhabitant of the said parish, the party against whom the said cause or business was promoted, on the other part; whereby the said Judge admitted to proof a certain libel, and exhibit annexed, given in on the part and behalf of the said Joseph Barter Bloomfield and Robert Slade the younger, the respondents.

The libel and exhibit given in on behalf of the respondents, from the decree for admitting which this appeal was interposed, were in substance as follows:—

1. The first article of the libel pleaded that on or about the 12th day of December, 1821, several of the parishioners, &c. of the parish of St. James, in the town and county of the town of Poole aforesaid, duly met in vestry, pursuant to public notices previously given for that purpose, in order to make a church rate for the use of the church of St. James in the said parish, and the repairs and ornaments thereof, and other matters and things, and relating thereto; and did then and there resolve and order that a church rate of three shillings in the pound should be allowed the churchwardens accordingly; and that the same should be made agreeably to the [501] then present poor rate, and according to the usual mode of making the church rate within the said parish.

2. The second article merely pleaded the exhibit, in part supply of the premises, annexed to the libel, to be a true copy of the order of vestry, made as pleaded in the preceding article.(a)

3. The third article pleaded that, in conformity with such order, a rate of three shillings in the pound agreeable to the then present poor rate, and according to the usual and customary mode of making the church rate within the said parish, was made and assessed on the inhabitants and others of the said parish of St. James, liable to payment of the same, to wit, on the 28th day of December (as would appear by the said original rate to be produced at the hearing of the cause); that the said rate was subsequently confirmed, under the usual conditions, by the official; and that, in conformity thereto, most or some of the said parishioners, &c. had paid the se-[502]-veral sums respectively assessed upon them in the said rate.

4. The fourth article pleaded that Richard Miller (the defendant) was and is a parishioner of St. James, occupying certain messuages, &c. within the same; and that, by the rate so duly made as aforesaid, he was and is justly rated and assessed, agreeable to the usual mode of making the church rate within the said parish, in the sum of 13l. 7s. in manner following—to wit, for a tenement in Hill Street, of the annual value of 22l., the rate or sum of 3l. 6s.; for a malt-house in Hill Street, of the annual value of 40l., the rate or sum of 6l., being at the rate of three shillings in the pound for the annual value of the same; and the sum of 4l. 1s., being at the rate of nine shillings for every hundred pounds in value of the stock in trade of the said Richard Miller, which said several sums he, the said Richard Miller, should and ought to pay as his proportion of the said rate.

5, 6, 7, 8. The fifth, sixth, and seventh articles merely pleaded the circumstances usually pleaded, mutatis mutandis, in libels for church rate, namely, that Slade and Bloomfield (the plaintiffs or promovents) were duly elected, sworn, and admitted into the office of churchwardens of the parish of St. James in the said town of Poole, and were such at the time of making the said rate, and at the commencement of the suit—that Miller, the defendant, though once or oftener requested, refused or delayed payment to the said churchwardens of his proportion of the rate aforesaid; and that

(a) The exhibit was as follows:—

At a vestry duly holden this 12th day of December, 1821, at the usual place, for the parish of St. James, in the town and county of Poole, pursuant to public notice.

We, whose names are underwritten, do approve and allow of the aforegoing account of Joseph Barter Bloomfield and Robert Slade, jun., the churchwardens, by which there appears to be due to the parish the sum of 178l. 7s. 8d.

We hereby order that an assessment or church rate of three shillings in the pound be allowed the churchwardens, and that the said rate be made agreeable to the present poor rate, and according to the usual mode of making the church rate.

he, Miller, was a parishioner of the said parish, within the peculiar and exempt jurisdiction of Great Canford and Poole; [503] and therefore, and by reason of the premises, was subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. The eighth was the usual formal concluding article, praying that the defendant might be condemned in the sum so rated and assessed upon him.

For the appellant—Swabey and Lushington, Doctors, and Mr. Tindal. The question at issue in this suit is one of considerable importance, though not, as it appears to us, of equal difficulty. It may be stated generally as the liability of stock, under the circumstances pleaded, or similar to payment of church rate—a practice, we apprehend now for the first time, submitted to the test of legal inquiry.

The object then of this suit is to enforce a church rate embracing, among other property admitted to be liable, stock in trade. Now we contend that, under the circumstances pleaded, the vestry or churchwardens must, in the end, fail to enforce a rate including stock in trade; and consequently that this libel, pleading a rate so made, ought to have been rejected.

Is it meant to be pleaded as a "custom," in the strict legal sense of the word, to rate stock in trade to the church within this particular parish? If so, the pleading is faulty: the "custom" should have been pleaded in the usual legal mode of pleading a custom; and the libel must be so reformed. The legality of a custom so understood, to rate stock in trade to the church within this particular parish, is a question not raised upon the present plea. Indeed were this pleaded as a "custom," the first thing to be proved would be its existence; which, were either the Court below or this Court to pro-[504]-ceed to try, it would of course be ground for a prohibition.

If, however, which we rather suppose, it is meant to be pleaded as usual, or a practice merely, to rate stock in trade to the church at Poole, we maintain it to be one utterly untenable. It may for some time have existed in the absence of opposition: an objection taken to it at any time must have been sustained.

It has probably been usual, as pleaded, in this parish to include stock in the church rates. But in the instance of no former rate (from the small amount in value possibly either of the stock rated, or of the rate itself, by reason of the church not requiring any extensive reparation, or for some other cause) does any opposition to this mode of rating appear to have been made. This circumstance leaves the question as to the legality of that practice still open. We maintain it, viewed in what light soever, to be clearly illegal.

Church rate is invariably so held a personal demand indeed—but in respect of real estate only; and not in respect of personal estate, either alone or jointly with real estate. We at least are aware of no instance of church rate formally levied or imposed on any other than lands and tenements only. If our opponents are more fortunate than ourselves in the knowledge of any, we shall have the benefit of their discovery: if they are not, this absence perhaps of all actual, but certainly of all legal, precedent, furnishes a nearly unanswerable argument against the legality of the rate now sought to be recovered.

[505] The wisdom of the law upon this head, as we understand it, needs no vindication. All personal property is of a fugitive kind; and stock in trade is one of the most fugitive kinds of personal property. For these, as well as other obvious reasons, it is one of the least proper subjects that can well be imagined of strict investigation, either for this purpose of taxation or for any other. That it has been, and must again be, where the law authorizes or requires it, will be readily conceded; but we submit that the law must authorize and require it strictly and specifically, in order to its being subjected to any such inquisition, with any sort of propriety.

Again, a practice of rating stock in trade seems to us unjust, as subjecting trade to a demand from which persons not in trade, though having stock (as farmers, for instance) are exempted. It is very unequal too, even as between different trades, some of which require a large stock, and others comparatively hardly any, to enable those who pursue, to conduct them advantageously. All these are arguments against any irregular practice of taxing stock in trade, being fixed and confirmed, as it is now sought to be, by legal sanction.

The only authority, if authority it be, for rating stock to the church under any circumstances which occurs to us, is the judgment of the thirteen civilians assembled at Doctors' Commons, and printed in Godolphin (Repertorium Canonicum, App. s. 31, p. 11), which does, in substance, seem to lay it down as a general proposition that the levy may be either upon stock or land. We allude to a certain "order or direction," as it is termed, "touch-[506]-ing the liability of property to the reparation, more immediately of the church and church-yard of Wrotham, in Kent:" but "to be applied generally," as the order expresses it, "upon occasions of like reparations to all places in England whatsoever;" printed as above. Now here, in the first place, by what authority these thirteen civilians met and drew up any such "order," no where appears. Nor further does it appear, at least on Godolphin's shewing, that they ever met, or drew up any such order at all—a matter which is fairly open to suspicion at least, from the questionable character of the "order" itself. It occurs, not in the useful repertory of ecclesiastical law as published by Godolphin, but merely in the appendix set forth, non constat by whom, to a second edition of the repertory published by the booksellers, at a time when its author was no more.(a)[1] After all, the rate here sought to be recovered derives little or no aid from these "instructions" for making church rates, even admitting them to be genuine. All which they purport to sanction is a levy either upon land or stock—"even for the best," as they phrase it, but not on both. Here the rate sought to be recovered is both on land and stock.

We are aware that it is usual in places to levy poor rate on personalty; but that, we contend, in [507] no sort infers the propriety of levying church rate. Levies to the church are not, like those to the poor, dependant upon, or growing out of, any statute. The general law imposing the reparation of the church upon the parishioners, and of course, at the same time, regulating the levy of those sums necessary to that reparation, must obviously have been settled long prior to any consideration of poor rates; which, it is well known, were unheard of prior to the reign of Hen. 8; and were only placed upon their present footing by a statute late in the reign of Elizabeth.

Upon these grounds it appears to us that this libel ought to have been rejected in the first instance; and, consequently, that the Court is bound to reverse the order for its admission; and by so doing, in effect, to dismiss the appellant from all further observance of justice in the present suit.

For the respondents—Phillimore and J. Addams, Doctors, and Mr. W. P. Taunton. It is pleaded, and for the purpose of the argument may be taken as proved, that it hath been usual, or the practice, in Poole, to levy church rate on personalty or stock in trade.(a)[2] The continuance of that practice (for as a practice merely, in contra-distinction to a legal custom, it is, and was meant to be pleaded) is now, for the first time, opposed; and the point immediately at issue is, whether the practice in question has any thing so revolt-[508]-ing, on the face of it, as to subject the libel in which it is pleaded to instant and summary rejection.

Our opponents have undertaken to shew that it is a practice of this revolting description, and that if sustainable at all, it could only be in virtue of a strict legal immemorial custom of rating; which custom, however, say they, is not pleaded, and the existence of which, were it pleaded, we admit to them that neither the Court appealed from, nor this, the appellate, Court, is competent to try. But that the practice itself in question partakes any thing of the nature or character sought to be ascribed to it, we by no means admit; on the contrary, we are both prepared to deny this, and to sustain that denial by what appear to us valid arguments. For if it is, it must be deemed so, either upon principle or upon authority: but neither the one nor the other of these, in our view of them, seem to sanction any such inference.

And first as to principle—is there any reason, upon principle, why personal property, especially why visible personal property, yielding a profit, within the parish, should not pay to the reparation of the church as well as real property. We are aware of none. Church rates are admitted, on all hands, to be taxes, not upon property so much, as upon persons in respect of property (5 Co. 67. 1 Bulstr. 20.

(a)[1] Godolphin died 1678 (4th April). The second edition of the "Repertorium Canonicum," with the appendix, only made its appearance in 1680. The appendix sets out with stating that, "The former tract being written only by way of essay, it was thought expedient by the friends of the bookseller to make some brief additions to this second impression concerning some things that are of daily use." Among these "additions" are this "order and direction."

(a)[2] This appeared by the church books from as far back as 1751. The church books prior to 1751 were said to be lost; and that evidence of their being so lost or mislaid had been given by the vestry clerk of Poole in an action as long ago as 1791.

Degge, 166); and why not upon persons in respect of personal property, as well as upon persons in respect of real property, we, upon principle, are at a loss to imagine. Every parishioner is bound, of common right, to the repairs of his parish church. "Ad refectionem ecclesiæ debet omnis populus, se-[509]-cundum legem, subvenire;" by a law as old as King Canute.(a) "Unusquisque parochianus," say Lyndwood and John of Athon, "ad reparationem ecclesiæ tenetur, &c." (b) "All the parishioners and landholders," says Degge,(c) "are bound to the charge;" apparently distinguishing between the two, and making both liable. Now every parishioner being thus, of common right, and upon principle, bound to contribute to these repairs, why the holder of stock should be exempted to the necessary imposition of a double onus upon the holder of land is to us, upon every general principle at least, wholly undiscoverable.

But it has been objected, and even dwelt upon as a principal head of objection, that the nature of personal property is such as to render levies upon it, howsoever to be applied, if not impracticable, still obviously so inconvenient that they are not to be resorted to but under some strict or overwhelming necessity. But we submit that no great, if any, practical inconvenience from the levy of church rate upon stock need be apprehended. We admit that any tax upon stock must, to a certain extent, be arbitrary and unequal. But the tax itself of church rate is, ordinarily, too inconsiderable to render any trifling inequality in its collection a sensible grievance; nor is it necessary to its collection to institute [510] any thing like that strict inquisition into the circumstances of private persons, which would brand it as arbitrary, in any perceptible degree, on that account. Indeed levies on stock, much more considerable, have, at all times, and continue to be, raised upon the subject, if not possibly wholly unobjected to, yet still without furnishing any real matter for complaint. The old "dismes and fifteenths" were assessments on personal property only, originally the actual tenth, or fifteenth, of the subject's moveables; not attended in their levy with any practical inconvenience that we are aware of. The same may be said of "subsidies," which succeeded these dismes and fifteenths, and were levies involving, like the church rate in question, real and personal property in one common assessment, being taxes upon persons in respect of their property, real and personal, at the (nominal) rate of four shillings in the pound for lands, and two shillings and eightpence for goods. Nay, at this very day the land-tax, at the usual rate (four shillings in the pound) is a fifth (a nominal fifth), not only of the rent of all the land and all the houses, but of the interest of all the stock in the country; that only excepted which is lent to the State, or employed in the cultivation of land.

But apart from any consideration of dismes and fifteenths, &c. as admitting these to be wide of the mark, further perhaps than, at most, in the way of general illustration, let us see whether a review of those levies constantly making at this day, throughout the kingdom, for the relief of the poor, suggests any thing applicable to this part of the case. For to levies of poor rate and church rate the self-same considerations so nearly apply that, property of any particular description being rated with sufficient fa-[511]-cility to the former of these, to raise any question about the difficulty attendant upon rating property of that same individual description to the latter, would seem almost absurd. Nor, viewed in this light, is the distinction between these, as to their origin, at all material; though our opponents have, artfully enough sought to insinuate, that the one being due under the general law, and the other under a special statute, constitutes so great a difference as to bar all reasoning from the one to the other in all respects. As with reference to the purpose for which we are now placing them in juxta-position, that distinction makes no difference in the case whatever.

The statute of 43 Eliz. for raising poor rates is evidently large enough to comprehend all species of personal property under the term "the ability" of the parish: there is nothing whatever in the statute which limits or confines that term, in this application of it, to real property. A series of determinations however, founded on the best and wisest principles, has excluded from rateability to the poor all personal property not visible and yielding a profit: but still leaving personal property situate locally within the parish, and at the same time visible, and yielding a profit, liable to poor rates. That series of determinations has done something more; for owing to some inconvenience, partly perhaps real and partly supposed, attending this matter of taxing stock in practice, Courts have always (or at least till lately have always (a)[1]), been guided by the [512] usage thentofore had with respect to taxing stock in trade in the place in question. But still, under all these restrictions and modifications, wherever it has been usual or the practice to assess the inhabitants of any city, town, or borough, for and in respect of their personal property, or stock in trade, to the poor rates, they have uniformly, without a single instance to the contrary, confirmed assessments made upon that principle, and held such personal property or stock in trade to be liable. We say wherever it has been the "practice:" for it must be obvious that there can be no legal "custom" of levying poor rates, which themselves only originated in the reign of Elizabeth—centuries, that is, within time of legal memory. It would be idle to enumerate authorities for so well known a position; (a)[2] but it is material to observe that here in Poole the poor rates, at this day, are levied upon stock in trade (having apparently been so from their very origin), under a decision of the Court of King's Bench, made specifically as with relation to this very town of Poole.(b) Therefore any arguments, ab inconvenienti, against rating stock in trade to the church in Poole ipso facto merge. It is easy to say, in [513] the way of objection, what is stock in trade? how is this to be fixed or ascertained? how, when fixed, is its value to be estimated? and so on—the difficulties attending this mode of rating are all but insurmountable. We reply to all this that here, in Poole at least, what is stock in trade must somehow be fixed or ascertained—upon the value of that stock, when fixed or ascertained, some estimate must be put—the difficulties, if any, attending this mode of rating in Poole must be surmounted in order to the making of levies for the relief of the poor. This, we repeat, is an answer at once to all arguments deduced from the supposed inconvenience of taxing stock to the repair of the church, at least in this particular instance. Levies to the poor, on an ordinary average, exceed those to the church in a vast proportion; and if no practical inconvenience is found to result from levying upon stock those much higher rates, which are necessary to the maintenance of the poor in Poole, surely none is to be apprehended from a continuance of the practice of levying, from time to time, upon that same stock those by far less considerable rates which ordinarily suffice to sustain, and repair, and decorate the single church in Poole.

It should seem then that no great inconvenience need be apprehended from laying church rates upon stock, as well as upon land, generally. But, further, we contend that in Poole some inconvenience at least would result were this not so. For we apprehend that some inconvenience does, and ever must, attend taxing the parishioners of any parish to the poor upon one principle, and to the church upon another, a contrary or at least a different principle; considering the close analogy which, we re-[514]-peat, that these rates bear to one another, in all points respecting (not of course their appropriation but) their levy.

It is well known to be generally prevalent in parishes that the church rate shall be made "according to the poor rate," or, in other words, that the latter, as by far the most frequent and most considerable of the two, shall be taken to some extent as a

(a)[1] That is, till the Court of King's Bench delivered an opinion upon the general question, which they were long averse to do, determining every case upon its own particular circumstances. But the liability of stock to the payment of poor rate seems to be now established as a general principle: so that the Court of King's Bench will confirm a rate, if not otherwise objectionable, including stock, without any reference to the prior usage of the particular place. See Rex v. Ambleside, 16 East, 380, &c.

(a)[2] Some of the leading decisions are the following:—Reg. v. Barking, 2 Ld. Raym. 1280. Rex v. Andover, Cowp. 550. Rex v. Hill, Cowp. 613. Rex v. Rodd, Cald. 147, &c. &c.

rule and measure of the former. The convenience of this in saving double valuations or assessments, and consequently preventing in many instances double appeals, and in other obvious respects, must, we think, be admitted. Nor is this merely a convenient and very general practice; it is also one which has prevailed ab antiquo. This appears sufficiently from the "libels in causes of subtraction of church rate," printed as precedents in Oughton, in most of which the rate sought to be recovered is pleaded to have been made "according to the poor rate," or "agreeable to, and in proportion with, the poor's book," for the year preceding, or to that effect. See, for instance, in page 350, where the making of the rate is laid in this form:—"Quod guardiani, sive æconomi, &c. post publicam in dictionem conventus (Anglicè a vestry) convenerunt, &c. et (habitâ consideratione, &c. decasuum et defectuum ecclesiæ, et de pecunia levanda, pro eorum refectione, &c.) statuerunt, et decreverunt, inter se, taxam, sive ratam, imponendam in dictæ parochiæ parochianos, omnes et singulos, qui in rotulo, sive libro, pro sustentatione pauperum censebantur, sive inscribebantur—scilicet, ut quilibet solveret quadruplo summam in dicto rotulo, sive libro, descriptam; ac sic ratam sive taxam fecerunt, in, et erga, re-[515]-parationem dictæ ecclesiæ,(a)[1] &c." But this mode of making church rate, so obvious, so convenient, so prevalent, ab antiquo, is impracticable in parishes where "personalty," whilst it must be included in the one rate, is necessarily and under all circumstances excluded from the other.

If then no general objection applies either to levies on personal property or stock, generally, or to levies upon it, for this particular object of church repair—nay, more, if it seems that, in Poole at least, some inconvenience will attend a departure from the practice of levying church rate upon stock, more antiquo, the Court, we apprehend, will be inclined ultimately to sanction the rate sought to be recovered in this suit, and, consequently, of course to admit the present libel; unless, indeed, it can be clearly shewn that, in so doing, it will go counter to the whole stream and current of authority. For if it can, indeed, be said, consistently with legal truth and propriety, that the current of authority is uniformly adverse to the practice pleaded in the libel; this in itself we are constrained to admit is amply sufficient to constitute a fatal objection to its continuance, in spite of all that can be urged in its favor deducible from general secondary considerations. But the current of authority, viewed as we view it, does not suffer this to be said of the practice in question, with legal truth or propriety. We grant that the prevalent usage is, and may long have been, to levy church rate upon lands and tenements only. We say the "prevalent usage;" for we deny its be-[516]-ing the usage universally, or even nearly so, though our adversaries have represented it as such, to the latter extent at least, if not to the former. We are aware, nor have the slightest objection to a disclosure of the names, of very many places, some of equal extent and population, where as in Poole a different usage prevails, and where the church rates are uniformly levied upon stock as well as upon lands. Now "prevalent usage" is not the same thing with positive law; nor is a practice which happens to be at variance with the former, necessarily illegal, from that being so which sets itself up in wilful and perverse opposition to the latter. And so far is the current of authority from affirming this non-rateability of stock to the church to be "law," without exception or limitation, that it infers (not to say affirms or goes little short of affirming) a principle the very reverse. We shall, of course, be expected, and are not unprepared, to fortify our assertions upon this head by reference to specific authorities.

And, first, what say John of Athon and Lyndwood, "the antientest and best of our canonists," on this matter of church rate? They, at least, are decidedly ours; for the words of the latter, as taken out of the former, are distinct that stock is taxable as well as land. "Unusquisque parochianus," says Lyndwood, "tenetur ad reparationem ecclesiæ juxta portionem terræ quam possidet infra parochiam, et secundum numerum animalium quæ tenet et nutrit ibidem." (a)[2] It is so obvious as to render it nearly superfluous to insist that "animalia" stands in this [517] passage for stock of any species or stock generally. This is so understood by Peck, by Prideaux, and, indeed, we apprehend, by all others. Prideaux's words (a)[3] are, "According to the ecclesiastical law that hath prevailed in this realm, the laying of the church rate ought to be according to the lands and the stock [the stock generally] which the parishioners have within the parish; and so say John of Athon and Lyndwood [namely, in the passage just cited, which then follows in Prideaux], the antientest and best of our canonists." Peck,(b) in a commentary on this same passage out of Lyndwood, explains it in the same sense, and plainly construes it as sanctioning rates on parishioners for church repairs, "pro modo et ratione rerum suarum," or "pro modo et facultate bonorum," as he styles it in different passages, both to the same effect. Indeed, flocks or herds "animalia," constituted at that time the very principal, not to say the sole, stock. Tradesmen with any thing like stock to be taxable in the modern acceptation of the term, stock in trade, there were plainly, at that time, few or none. The only tradesmen at that time, except perhaps in some few cities or great towns, were people who used to travel about from fair to fair, like the hawkers and pedlars of modern times. Their wares [stock in trade] could of course be subjected to no parochial (local) burthens. Taxes used indeed to be levied upon these, known by the several names of "passage," "pontage," "lastage," "stallage," &c.; (c) but these were in the nature of transit duties, as at certain passes [518] or bridges, or of tolls, as for the erection of booths, or stalls, in particular places—the collection of which in no sort argues them fit or capable even subjects of local taxation.

It clearly results then that "stock" was liable in the opinion of Lyndwood and John of Athon; and it either has appeared, or will presently appear, that with Lyndwood and John of Athon, those "antientest and best of our canonists," as Prideaux styles them upon this head the principal text writers on our national ecclesiastical law, as Prideaux himself, Gibson, Degge, Watson, and others in substance concur. But are these the only authorities for our position? Far from it. It may be fortified, we contend, at least by plain inference and deduction, from authorities for which we are not driven to resort to civilians or canonists; although these last, it is to be observed, are, if the phrase be allowable, the natural authorities, to which upon a matter like this of church rate, recourse is to be had.

Cases that involve questions of litigated church rates are not of any frequent recurrence, as might naturally be expected, in reports of cases at common law. It is singular, however, that the very earliest of such cases which we have been able to discover (in substance, as follows) is one that distinctly recognizes the rateability of stock. It occurs in the shape of an action of replevin, which came before one of the Courts at Westminster in Trinity Term, 44 Edw. 3, where the party who had distrained the plaintiff's goods justified his act by pleading "that the parishioners of E. had made or levied a church rate of sixpence on every carucate of land, a penny farthing on every cow, and a farthing on every ten [519] sheep, in order to raise a sum of 10l., necessary to the reparation of the parish church of E.; and, further, that they had ordained two collectors, whereof the defendant was one, with power to distrain on parties who were liable, but refused to pay—that the plaintiff was a parishioner, &c. and had land, cows, and sheep, for which he was duly assessed in a certain sum, to wit, nine shillings; and that, refusing to pay, the defendant had distrained his goods—and that such had always been the custom." The plaintiff first objects to the validity of the custom so pleaded to distrain; but the Court, over-ruling this objection, he is then compelled to reply, merely "that the parishioners never assented to the rate;" and upon that issue, namely, whether a majority of the parishioners ever assented to the rate in question, the parties go to trial, the validity of such rate, if made with the assent of a majority of the parishioners, being thus fully admitted; nor seeming, indeed, ever to have been questioned, as by reason, that is, of its purporting to include chattels (Year Book, Trin. Term, 44 Edw. 3, 13).

But, in looking to the series of common law reports, we are at no loss for cases which recognize the rateability of stock to the church, at least by necessary intendment and implication. We allude to those cases in common law reports in which distinct levies appear to have been sanctioned—the one for the repair of the fabric of the church, the other for the ornaments. For instance, we may refer to that known as the Churchwarden's case, in the 20th of James I. reported by Rolle (Roll. Rep. 153); the rule collected out of which by Rolle, the reporter, him-[520]-self, in his Abridgment (2 Rolle, Abr. 262, 270, 291), is what he also says was expressly laid down by the Chief Justice in that case; viz. that "for repairing the fabric of the church the charge is real, and charges the land, and not the person; but for the ornaments of the church it is personal; upon the goods, and not upon the land:" and this distinction, he goes on to say, has been observed in other cases.

(b) De Ecclesiis Reparandis, c. x. and xi.
(c) Brady's History of English Boroughs, p. 3.

From these cases, a position has been drawn by text writers, as by Rolle himself again, in his Abridgment (ibid.); by Sir Simon Degge, in his Parson's Counsellor (Degge, 166, &c.); by Bishop Gibson, in his Codex (p. 196); by Dr. Watson (or Mr. Place), in his Clergyman's Law (Addenda, 642); by Dr. Wood, in his Institute (page 90), &c.—as if there should be properly two rates—one upon land and houses, which should concern the freehold of the church, the other upon personal estates and stock [the very words of Wood], to defray other expences. This, however, they say, would create confusion, and so is seldom practised. We concur with them in their implied censure of this practice, as apt to "create confusion;" but we do not collect from it either the necessity or their approval of exempting stock from paying to the church altogether. They, in effect, say, instead of two rates, one upon "lands," for the "fabric," and another upon "goods," for the "ornaments," or for "other expences," blend the two into one, and make one rate [521] serve for both. But is not this matter of fair inference; namely, that in their apprehension that one assessment should be upon goods, as well as land? Otherwise, the principle of rating stock to the church altogether is departed from, upon no reason that we see, but certainly without any necessity.

It should seem, then, that either explicitly or by implication, this rateability of stock has been recognized in a series of cases at common law, out of which a principle to the same effect has been extracted, as by Rolle, and Wood, and others, who hardly come within the description of civilians or canonists. But, by aid of these last, the natural authorities upon questions of church rate, this notion of the absolute non-rateability of stock to the church may be clearly refuted. The authorities of Lyndwood and John of Athon, for rating stock to the church, have already been cited; and the principal writers upon our national canon law have been shewn to concur with them in this. The "order, &c." in Godolphin (appendix, s. 31, ut supra) warrants an assertion that no doubt as to the liability of stock existed among the civilians of that day. Some opprobrium has been attempted to be thrown upon this "order, &c." as if not really emanating from the authority to which it is ascribed. We can only say that, had this been so, it must have called forth something in the nature of a disclaimer from the learned persons whose names are set to it—which that it never did we are authorized to presume, from finding it quoted by Prideaux, and other almost contemporary writers, without intimating any suspicion of its integrity. [522] It is observable, too, that it is not set down as an "order, &c." made by thirteen civilians assembled at Doctors' Commons, &c. merely—but as an "order, &c. made by Dr. King, Dr. Lewen, Dr. Lynsey, Dr. Hoane, Dr. Sweit, Dr. Steward (nominatim), and other doctors of the civil law, to the number of thirteen so assembled." As to the distinction "land or stock, but not both," this does not appear to us so unreasonable as to warrant the order itself being treated slightingly upon that account. The only stock in question must have been "farming stock." What, a century and a half ago, could the "stock in trade," at Wrotham, have been? Now, as to farming stock, we apprehend the distinction to be highly reasonable. Stock, to a certain extent, is absolutely essential to the proper cultivation of the farmer's land: so that were this (farming) stock to be rated—the land being also rated—the farmer would, in effect, pay twice for the same thing. And the phrase, "all places in England," in the "order," must, in reason, be restricted to "all places in England similarly circumstanced with Wrotham in this respect"—Wrotham being the direct immediate subject of the order. We, however, have no concern, either to ascertain the origin of this distinction, or to vindicate its propriety. All that we refer to the "order" for is, to shew that no such notion as that of the absolute and essential non-liability of stock to the payment of church rate (upon which our opponents have been forced to take their stand in arguing against the admissibility of the present plea) prevailed in Doctors' Commons at that day: which that this "order" is effectual to, who can doubt?

[523] But to dwell no longer upon authorities from text writers, let us briefly consider what the practice, the admitted recognized practice, as it should seem, of ecclesiastical courts in this particular suggests, as with relation to the present question. Has that been uniformly adverse to the rateability of stock, of all descriptions, to the repair of the church? Certainly not. We admit that, if challenged to produce any instance in which the rateability of stock to the church has been solemnly pronounced for, we are unprepared with any; and for the obvious reason that the legality of this has never, that we are aware of, been questioned at law. Our opponents are, at least, as unfurnished with any instance of a sentence against its legality. This, to be sure, is no answer to a challenge to produce a sentence in its favour, if rating stock really be, as said, a thing unheard of in legal practice. But to maintain this argument it must first be shewn that rating stock is a thing unheard of in legal practice—and we, on the contrary, not only proclaim, but can prove, it to be quite the reverse. In many parishes, possibly, stock has never been so rated—in others, where it once was, it has since ceased to be by consent—in others, again, where it once was, nor has ceased, by consent it still continues to be rated: and this is the first instance of an individual stepping forward to allege the illegality, and to object, on that ground, to paying his proportion of the rate. Poole is one place among many in this predicament—the practice in all which, hitherto used and approved, is now, for the first time, sought to be unsettled by a sweeping decision against the rateability of stock to the church merely, for any thing [524] that appears to gratify the caprice, or litigiousness, or what else, of certain individuals of Poole in particular, of course against the expressed wish and consent of a majority of the inhabitants of Poole even. Poole, too, we shall take leave to observe, is one of the last places where an experiment like the present ought to have been tried; as the omission of stock in Poole would, from known local circumstances, throw the burthen of these assessments on those least able to bear them, and would press upon the few landed proprietors with very considerable hardship indeed—and this, the more especially, now; when rates are in a course of being levied, for the payment of a large debt contracted by the parishioners for actually pulling down and rebuilding the parish church—a debt, no doubt, so contracted by the parishioners, in the faith of their ability to make rates for the discharge of the same, more antiquo, that is, including stock in trade. But to proceed.

Among the precedents in Oughton, already referred to for another purpose, are libels in suits of this description, both asserting, in terms, the rateability of stock to the church, and proceeding upon that rateability, without any such affirmance, as deeming it fully admitted. For instance, in vol. ii. p. 351, is furnished, as a precedent, a libel in a cause of subtraction of church rate, purporting to have been instituted by the churchwardens of Richmond, in Surrey, against one Southwell, in the Consistory Court of the Lord Bishop of Winton. In this libel it is pleaded [art. 1] as follows:—"Imprimis, Quod tam de et ex quibusdam constitutionibus provincialibus [quarum una sic incipit—Ut Paro-[525]-chiani, &c. altera vera sic incipit, licet parochiani, &c.] quam ex longa, laudabili, legitimeque præscripta consuetudine, a tempore immemorato huc usque inviolabiliter et inconcusse usitata et observata, ac in contradictorio judicio sæpius, seu saltem semel, obtenta, parochiani cujuslibet parochiæ Cantuariensis provinciæ, terras, tenementa, possessiones, bona, jura et credita in eadem habentes, oblinentes, et possidentes (consideratis possessionum suarum prædictarum quantitatibus) ad reficiendum, restaurandum, et reparandum easdem ecclesias suas parochiales, et ad quævis alia onera, quando et quoties opus fuerit, contribuere et pecunias suas exponere, tenebantur et tenentur." (a) In the same book, page 347, again is a libel (purporting to have been delivered in the Court of Arches in a suit of this description, between the churchwardens of Mestham, within the deanery of Croydon, &c. and Best, a parishioner), in which, to be sure, the law as above is not formally pleaded, but in which it is proceeded upon as fully admitted—a circumstance, we submit, which renders this precedent still more in favour of our argument than even the one to which we before referred. This libel [art. 1] pleads the rate sought to be recovered to have been made (without any previous formal pleading of the law, in conformity with which it was so made) on the several parishioners and inhabitants "juxta et pro rata bonorum, et terrarum, et facultatum suarum infra dictam parochiam." The second article pleads that Best, the defendant, at the time of laying this rate, was a parishioner [526] of Mestham, "ac bona terras, et facultates, ibidem habuit, occupavit, et possedit"—and the third article, that he was rated at such a sum, "habitâ consideratione facultatum et conditionis ejus." (a)[1] Those which follow are the usual articles, of the defendant being within the jurisdiction of the Court, &c. &c. and need not be stated.

The inference furnished by these precedents against the position contended for by our opponents, of the non-rateability of stock to the church, is too obvious to be insisted upon. If it be objected that the libels cited are mere printed forms, non constat whether ever exhibited even, still less whether ever admitted, in any court, it might be sufficient to reply that, had but a plausible ground, or grounds, of objection to their admission been apparent upon the face of these, Oughton could hardly have suffered them to stand in his book of "precedents," to the necessary defeat and mortification of all who might be led to adopt them as such. But what if we should be able to prove from a series, not of printed forms, but actual cases, that rates made upon similar principles have been pleaded in suits for subtraction of church rate, in numerous instances—that not merely such pleas themselves have been tendered and admitted, but that payment of the rates specifically pleaded in these has been resisted with all conceivable art and industry—that in the progress of such suits objections have been heaped upon objections—that from decrees in such suits appeals have been prosecuted upon appeals—that in the course of such prohibitions have been [527] applied for, under which all the proceedings have been submitted to courts of common law, whilst presided over by Judges of the first ability—and yet, with all this, that apparently it never once occurred, either to any court to suggest the invalidity of these rates, or to any individual to resist the payment of them, as by reason of their purporting to be levied upon stock as well as land? why, then, we apprehend that the admissibility of this libel admits of no further question; unless, indeed, it can be shewn that what was the law then upon this head is not the law now; that is, in other words, unless it can be shewn that, in the interim between the time when those cases occurred and the present, the law in respect to levies of church rate has undergone something at least in the shape of authoritative alteration.

It only remains then to shew that a series of cases warranting these deductions is actually producible—with which view we solicit the Court's attention to the following, the whole of which are furnished from processes extant in the registry of this Court, the Court of Delegates. The libels pleading the several rates plainly purport such rates themselves to have been levied, in some shape or other, upon stock —and the rest we submit to be clearly implied by the proceedings had, together with the defence or defences set up, in each several case. And we put it to the Court, with some confidence, whether a question being mooted as to the rateability of stock in no one of these cases does not fully warrant this conclusion, namely, that such its rateability was at that time actually considered to admit of none, as well by parties and practitioners, as by the Courts [528] themselves, both of civil and common law. And we further submit that the libel in each of these cases is a precedent directly in point for the admissibility of this in the present, and involves the affirmance of a legal position the very contrary of that upon which the objections urged against its admissibility have mainly, if not solely, relied. And first, as to the libels in the several cases.

The first case, then, to which we refer the Court for this purpose is that of Freggleton and Hubbolt against Acton.(a)[2] The libel here is substantially as follows:—

1 and 2. The first and second articles contain merely the necessary formal averments of the defendant Acton, being a parishioner of Claverly, and the promovents, Freggleton and Hubbolt, the churchwardens.

3. The third article pleads, nearly in conformity with the first precedent from Oughton, "Quod tam de et ex quisbusdam constitutionibus provincialibus quarum una incipit—'ut parochiani' altera vero 'licet parochiani'—quam ex longa, laudabili, legitimeque prescriptâ consuetudine a tempore immemorato huc usque inviolabiliter et inconcusse usitata et observata, ac in contradictorio judicio sæpius obtenta, parochiani cujuslibet parochiæ Cantuariensis provinciæ terras, tenementa, bona jura et catalla et credita in eâdem obtinentes habentes et possidentes, consideratis quantitatibus possessionum prædictarum, ceterorumque emolumentorum suorum, ad reficiendum, restaurandum, et re-[529]-parandum easdem ecclesias suas parochiales, et ad quævis alia onera et ornamenta earundem, quoties et quando opus fuerit, contribuere, et pecunias suas expendendere, tenebantur."

4. The fourth article pleads in substance that Claverly church being out of repair, &c. a "lewne," or assessment, was required, to the amount of 28l. 10s., or thereabouts.

5 and 6. The fifth and sixth articles plead the notice of vestry, &c.

7. The seventh article pleads the making of the rate sought to be recovered in these words—that on such a day "the minister and churchwardens, together with other the parishioners, at the time and place appointed, met together, and by them a general lewne and assessment, for the uses aforesaid, was agreed upon, and indifferently and proportionably set down to be paid by the said parishioners of Claverly aforesaid, for and towards the uses aforesaid, unto the churchwardens for the time being, according to the quantity and quality of their several lands, goods, and chattels, which every of them held within the said parish; and that the said lewne hath accordingly been justly and duly paid by all, or the major part, of the said parishioners."

8. The eighth article pleads "that the said Thomas Acton had held, occupied, and possessed, within the said parish of Claverly, divers lands, houses, and tenements, goods and cattle; for and in respect whereof he, the said Thomas Acton, in the aforesaid lewne, was indifferently and proportionably rated and assessed for and towards the uses aforesaid, in the whole, at, and in, the sum of 1l. 4s. of lawful money of England."

[530] In Ash against Williams and Smith (a)[1] (not to state all these with the same particularity as the foregoing) the libel is express that every person is liable to the payment of church rate, having "terras, tenementa, possessiones, bona, jura, et credita consideratis possessionum, jurium, bonorum, emolumentorumque suorum quantitatibus" [Anglicè, according to the quantity and quality of their lands, goods, and chattels]: and Ash, the defendant, is expressly pleaded to be rated towards the reparation and restoration of the church in question [that of Pembridge], and the ornaments thereof, "in respect of divers lands, houses, and tenements, goods, chattels, and credits, within Pembridge aforesaid."

In Woodward against Makepiece and Ladbrook,(b) (a proceeding by articles; and, therefore, à fortiori to our purpose, from the known strictness in point of pleading, &c. requisite in criminal suits of all descriptions) the articles, which here stand in place of the libel, pleaded the general law thus—quod "omnes et singuli quicunque facultates, possessiones, sive prædia, in quibuscunque parochiis provinciæ Cantuariensis habentes, obtinentes, et possidentes, in ipsis degentes aut alibi, ad reparandum navem ecclesiæ parochialis ejusdem, una cum campanile, companis, et fulcro pro compensura earundem,(c) [531] fuerunt et sunt astricti, cogendi, et coercendi. Et hoc est verum, &c." And the making of the actual rate is pleaded thus—that the parishioners in vestry assembled levied "taxam, censum, ratam, sive impositionem de et super parochianis dictæ parochiæ, aliisque quibuscunque terras, bona, domus, sive facultates, infra eandem parochiam habentes, possidentes aut occupantes, quantitatibus terrarum, bonorum, domuum, et facultatum uniuscujus cunque in ea parte taxandi, consideratis."

In Cuthbert against Simmonds (a)[2] (a proceeding also like the former, by articles) the pleading is, that the parishioners meeting in vestry pursuant to notice &c. did "rightly and duly make a rate, tax, or levy, wherein they did justly and equally rate and tax every parishioner and inhabitant of the said parish [Northmersten in Bucks] according to his estate, or the number of acres, and yard-lands, or stock, any person had, held, or possessed within the said parish, after the usual way of rating the parishioners towards the repairs and charges aforesaid." And the articles then proceed to charge and object that he the said Cuthbert, the defendant, rents so much land within the parish, "and keeps a considerable stock of sheep, cows, and other cattle," for and in respect of which he ought to be taxed and rated.

(c) That is, "The nave of their parish church, together with the belfrey, the bells, and the beams, or frame, for suspending these." It was for refusing to pay his proportion of a rate towards "a re-casting, &c. of the bells," that the appellant in this case (the defendant in the first instance) had been proceeded against.

In the case of The Churchwardens of Louth [532] against Atkinson (a)[1] the libel (for this again, like the two first, was a civil suit) pleads art. 4, that "Louth is a place of great trade and traffic, wherein one or two markets are weekly kept, and two or more general fairs are yearly held; and the inhabitants of which are for the most part tradesmen that keep general shops, and live by a free and general trade."

5. The fifth article pleads it to have been a custom, anciently kept and observed within the parish of Louth, "to make the taxes and rates for the repairs of the parish church there, and the common charge of the churchwardens, at the discretion of the inhabitants and parishioners; and therein to charge, as well tradesmen as occupiers of land and keepers of stock and cattle, going, lying, and being in the said parish, according to their ability, due regard and consideration being had to every man's trade and profession, and to the value of the lands and stock every one hath in his own occupation."

6. The sixth article pleads the rate to have been made upon this principle truly and indifferently after due notice.

7. The seventh article pleads that "when the said rate was made, and for several years before, the said David Atkinson was a freeholder of Louth, and had an estate which he occupied and stocked to the value of 50l. a year and upwards;" and that, "over and above the said stock kept upon the said ground, he also then and for several years before did keep, and had kept, a very great number of cattle upon [533] the commons belonging to the said parish;" and then goes on to plead that, in respect of the several items, he the defendant "was duly assessed in the sum of forty-seven shillings for his rate and proportion to the said tax."

In Welby against Abbot (a)[2] the libel pleads [art. 3] "That the town of Boston is a sea-port town, and a town of great trade and commerce, and also a borough town incorporated with a mayor, aldermen, and common councilmen, and also is very populous: that several of the inhabitants are gentlemen and have good estates, but the generality of them are tradesmen that live by their trades, and are chiefly assessed to the church assessments, according to their way of trading; whereas, were they to be assessed according to the rents they sit on, and by any other way than by will and doom, which is the constant way of making and levying such assessments in the said parish, their contributions thereto would not raise and advance so much money as they do; and that, moreover, the greatest burthen of such assessments would then fall upon such as are not well able to bear the same:" and

The fourth article pleads that, it being necessary to raise 125l. for repairs, &c. the parishioners agreed in vestry to nominate three persons (who are specified) assessors, according to the usual way and manner—who subsequently laid the assessment by will and doom: "i.e. having due regard to every one's estate, quality, ability, way, and circumstances of living;" and therein duly assessed the defendant, Welby, in so much.

[534] Such in substance are the libels in these several suits, from which it plainly appears that the rate itself, the subject of the suit, in each purports, in some shape or other, to include or affect stock. And that this objection was resorted to in no case as one of the means (of which various were used in each) to assail the legality, and so to avoid the payment, of the rate, as clearly results from the defence or defences set up, and the proceedings had in each several suit.

It would be tedious, however, and at the same time, we apprehend, quite unnecessary to state and comment upon the specific ground of opposition taken in each of these cases, and the proceedings had in each severally in detail. As for these latter, the very circumstance of each of these cases having found its way through, at least two inferior courts,(a)[1] to the court of last resort in these matters, is ample to shew that the opposition to the rate in each, upon whatever grounded, if not commenced in wisdom, was at least kept up with vigour. The general nature of the defence set up will sufficiently appear from the following abstract of the objections taken to the rate in each of the above cases:—

In Freggleton and Hubbolt against Acton the objection taken is to the defendant being charged with respect to certain lands, formerly in the demesne of Master Gatacre, which it was insisted were not liable to be rated to the church by reason of their being obliged to keep in repair two chancels adjoining the church. In Ash against Williams and Smith, the ground of objection, stated in two [535] words, is "general inequality." In Cuthbert against Simmonds it is that he the defendant rented the glebe land of Dr. Say, the impropriator, who had lately been at large expence in repairing the chancel; and, therefore, that neither he nor his tenant ought to be taxed or rated, in any rate for the aforesaid parsonage and glebe land, towards the reparation of the church. In Woodward against Makepiece and Ladbrook the following is the defence: namely, that the vestry had been held without due notice, in which any "re-casting of the bells" had been agreed upon; and that the churchwardens, mero motu, had departed from the order of vestry by re-casting the old bells into six instead of five, whereby the bells themselves had become so reduced in point of compass that he, the defendant, whose land was situate at some distance from the church, was unable to hear, and, consequently, was deprived of the fair use and benefit of them. It is also observable that, in this case of Woodward against Makepiece and Ladbrook, a prohibition was moved for in the Court of King's Bench, still, however, upon a quite distinct ground, namely, that of a citing out the diocese—a prohibition ultimately refused, for reasons that need not be stated by the whole Court of King's Bench, with that eminent person Sir John Holt at its head (see 1 Salk. 164)—this, however, like the rest, tending completely to shew the determined opposition made by the defendant to payment of the rate. In the case of The Churchwardens of Louth against Atkinson, again, the principal ground of opposition is "general inequality." Its more particular nature [536] may be inferred from the defendant's answers (subsequently shaped into an allegation upon which evidence was taken); which answers admit the custom of Louth to be as pleaded, but deny the necessity of a rate to the amount sought to be raised; and further say that "the churchwardens, together with a select and confederate party of the parishioners of Louth, which were neither of the better sort and quality, or major part of the parishioners of Louth aforesaid, upon a free vote, did by will and doom, and unjustly and illegally, make the rate in question, without any due consideration had, either of the ability of the party taxed, or value of the lands and goods or stock every one had farmed, and kept in the said parish, to the great oppression of the major part of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish." Lastly, in the case of Welby against Abbot the objections are, 1st, that he, Welby, "is no house-keeper, but merely a tabler [i.e. a boarder] in Boston, resident with his sister, Mrs. Rebecca Welby;" 2dly, that "laying the assessment by will and doom is arbitrary, and contrary to the legal and equal way of laying assessments, viz. by pound rent, or upon land and stock, or separately, as persons shall most abound in;" as also that the said assessment is "manifestly unequal," &c. &c. In this case another more technical objection seems also to have been partly relied on, namely, that the presentment of the defendant Welby for non-payment of the rate (the foundation of all the subsequent proceedings) was by the name of John not Henry, the true name, to which it was only altered in the course of the proceedings—an objection, again, serving clearly to shew that this defendant, like Wood-[537]-ward in the prior case, stuck at nothing to assail the legality of the rate, or at least to avoid the payment of it in his own particular person.

We shall trouble the Court but with one case more, that of Watkins against Seaman and Webb,(a)[2] suggesting the same conclusion, though from somewhat different premises. There the rate purports to be levied in the most usual mode, even at that time, namely, upon lands and tenements only; and the objection, the principal objection rather, to the legality of the rate in that case actually is the circumstance of stock not being rated. The allegation responsive to the libel pleading the rate specifically charges "that Walter Lawrence, clothier, has 400l. stock, for which he is not rated—that Zachariah Hyett has personal estate worth 500l., for which he is not rated," and so on; and distinctly denies the legality of the rate, by reason of its omitting to rate the said stock. What ultimately became of this objection we have no means of ascertaining; nor is it at all material that it should be ascertained. For supposing it, for argument's sake, to have been over-ruled by all the several Courts to which it was successively addressed, even that supposition which is, obviously, the one least favourable to our case, still suggests nothing adverse to it. For our case is, not that personalty of all descriptions is liable to payment of church rate in all places, and under all circumstances, but only that personalty of one particular description, namely, stock in trade, is liable to payment of church rate in Poole, under the circum-[538]-stances pleaded in the present libel. Meantime this, like the former cases, warrants a conclusion that no notion of the non-rateability of personalty to the church, under all circumstances, prevailed at that time, how rife and familiar soever it should seem to be in a certain quarter at the present.

Upon the whole, then, we submit that of the two mediums through which our adversaries have sought to establish the inadmissibility of the present libel, the first, the supposed inconvenience of the practice pleaded in it, proves to be a mere nothing—while the second, its supposed illegality, as deduced from the equal and similar absence, first, of authority in its favour, and, secondly, of precedent for its use, rests upon two assertions, both of which have been clearly shewn to be totally unsupported by the fact.

If an objection be taken to our cases in support of the practice which we contend for, as by reason either of their scarcity is point of number, or their remoteness in point of date, be it remembered that they are all derived from the registry of a single court—that court, too, the court of ultimate appeal in such matters, into which questions of litigated church rate can rarely be expected to have travelled at any time; while in modern times, for obvious reasons, the instances are extremely few. The number of these within the last century perhaps does not exceed six or eight—only two have occurred within the last seventy years. It is true that a cursory inspection of the processes in most, perhaps the whole, of these suits has not led us to suppose that the rate sought to be recovered in any one of them was a rate including stock. But this, again, infers nothing adverse to the rate, the sub-[539]-ject-matter of the present suit; for we have admitted, and still admit, that the prevalent usage is, and has long been, to levy church rates upon lands and tenements only.

Which contrariety, so admitted, of the rate set up in this libel, to "prevalent usage," appears to us the only even plausible objection to its admissibility, not already fully obviated in the course of the foregoing reply. To this, if still insisted upon, we answer that, if here, in Poole, as in most places, church rates had been usually levied on lands and tenements alone, so that this suit were to recover of a church rate now, for the first time, including stock, the objection would undoubtedly be one of great weight, and might, perhaps, even of itself, be sufficient to enure to a defeasance of the suit, by the rejection of the libel, in the first instance. But the object here is not to originate a new, or even to revive an obsolete, mode of rating, but it is merely to continue one which, quoad Poole, has been uninterruptedly used and approved, from time whereof "the memory of man," in the actual, though not perhaps in the legal, sense of the phrase "runneth not to the contrary." Now, it does seem to us that the present question of church rate—a church rate including stock—under such circumstances presents to this Court a very similar aspect to that which questions of poor rate, including stock, long presented to the Court of King's Bench. And we humbly submit that the safest and wisest course for this Court to pursue is to abide by the precedent set to it by the Court of King's Bench, in its treatment of such questions of poor rate; the upshot of which will be that the [540] Court will suffer evidence to be taken upon the present libel; and the usage or practice of Poole, in this particular, being proved or confessed to be as pleaded, that it will ultimately be pleased to sanction levies of church rate upon stock in Poole, leaving the question of its liability to payment of church rate generally open, if mooted at any future period, to future inquiry; that being a question upon which a sentence to the purport which we solicit, not only obviously determines nothing, but which it seems to us not calculated, in the slightest degree, to prejudice or affect.

The leading counsel for the appellant having waived his privilege of being heard in reply to the cases, the Court, after some deliberation, made the following

DECREE.

The Judges having heard the libel and exhibit read, and advocates and proctors on both sides, by their interlocutory decree, pronounced against the appeal; and that the Judge from whom the same is brought hath proceeded rightly, justly, and lawfully; and they affirmed the decree or order appealed from; but, at the petition of the respondent's proctor, they retained the principal cause.

[541] SEAGER v. BOWLE. High Court of Delegates, Trinity Term, 20th June, 1823.—An allegation responsive to articles in a cause of office, promoted by the ordinary of a royal peculiar, calling upon the defendant, 1st, to answer to "having set up a monument in a church in his jurisdiction without a faculty; 2dly, to shew cause why he should not be decreed to remove the same—pleading, 1st, "That the said monument was erected by leave of the minister and churchwardens;" 2dly, "That it was ornamental to the said church, instead of injuring it or disfiguring it"—admitted to proof.

[Referred to, Winstanley v. North Manchester Overseers, [1910] A. C. 10.]

The Judges who sat under this commission were, Mr. Justice Holroyd,(b) Mr. Justice Burrough, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Jenner, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Meyrick, and Dr. Haggard.

This, in the first instance, was a proceeding by articles in the Court of the Peculiar and Exempt Jurisdiction of Great Canford and Poole, promoted, in virtue of his office, by the Worshipful and Reverend Charles Bowle, clerk, Master of Arts, Principal Official of the Peculiar and Exempt Jurisdiction of Great Canford and Poole, against James Seager, Esq., of the parish of St. James, in the town and county of the town of Poole. It commenced in the Court below by a citation, issued on [542] the part of the said official, calling upon the defendant to "answer certain articles, heads, or interrogatories, touching and concerning his soul's health, and the lawful correction and reformation of his manners and excesses, to be objected against him by virtue of his (the said official's) office: and, more especially, for his having illegally erected and set up, or caused to be erected and set up, in the church of the said parish of St. James, a certain monument, of considerable dimensions, to the memory of his late wife, and of others, by his own mere authority, in usurpation of the power of his ordinary, and without any legal licence or faculty first obtained for that purpose: and also to shew good and sufficient cause (if he has or knows any) why he should not be decreed to remove, or cause to be removed, such monument, as having been so erected and set up without the licence or faculty of his ordinary, or other lawful authority in that behalf." The appeal to this Court (the Court of Delegates) was against an order or decree made by the official (the promovent), rejecting a certain allegation brought in on the part of the defendant, responsive to the articles.

Of the tenor of the articles it is sufficient to say that it precisely accorded with that already described of the citation. That of the "responsive allegation," the subject of the appeal was as follows:—

1. That the said James Seager, party in this cause, now is, and for many years last past hath been, a principal parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of St. James, in the town and county of the town of Poole, within the Peculiar and Exempt Ju-[543]-risdiction of Great Canford and Poole, in the county of Dorset; and that, in or about the month of January, in the year of our Lord 1822, Amy Seager, wife of the said James Seager, having departed this life, was interred in a vault in the churchyard belonging to the said parish church of St. James, in Poole aforesaid—that he, the said James Seager, did thereupon cause to be erected and set up, in the said church, near his own pew, at the east end of the south gallery thereof, a certain monument to the memory of his said late wife, Amy Seager, and others of his family who had previously departed this life—that no judicial or other notice or complaint whatever was at any time, by any person, taken or made of the erection of the said monument, until on or about the 20th day of July last past; soon after which the said James Seager was served with a certain citation, to appear on the 28th day of August last past, and answer the complaint in this behalf. And this was and is true, &c.

(b) Mr. Baron Wood was named at the head of the commission; but had resigned his seat on the Bench, as one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer prior to, and was not present at, the hearing of this appeal.

2. That it has been usual and customary, in the said parish of St. James, in Poole aforesaid, previous to the erection of any monument, to obtain the consent of the minister and churchwardens of the said parish, but not to apply for the consent of the said ordinary, except in particular cases—that, accordingly, previous to the said monument being so erected and set up in the said parish church, he, the said James Seager, applied for and obtained the consent of the minister and churchwardens of the said parish, to erect and set up the said monument in the said parish church.

3. That the monument so erected and set up by the said James Seager, in the parish church of [544] St. James, in Poole aforesaid, is a mural monument, and does not project from the wall more than three or four inches, or thereabouts, except in one particular part, where it projects five inches, or thereabouts; and no part of it projects or stands out so far as a pillar close to it—that the said monument does not in anywise injure or disfigure the said church, but, on the contrary, is a great ornament thereto, the same being of highly-polished marble, and executed in a superior manner —and that there is nothing in the design of, or inscription on, the said monument, which is at all unsuitable to the place; the same consisting merely of one side of an obelisk of black and gold marble, with a female figure, of white marble, weeping, and leaning on, or reclining over, an urn of marble of the same sort, and having underneath a tablet with the name, age, and time of death of the said Amy Seager, and others of the family of the said James Seager, engraved thereon.

4. The fourth was the usual concluding article, averring the truth of the premises.

For the respondent, Mr. Adam, and Drs. Swabey and Dodson. The allegation responsive to the articles in this suit was, and is, inadmissible, as pleading no sufficient legal justification of the erection of the "monument," the subject of the suit. We contend the rule of law to be that which, in substance, the articles affirm, namely, that no monument can be set up in a church, without a legal licence or the faculty of the ordinary first duly had and obtained: and we also contend that if this rule of law be infringed, it will not only be sufficient to found the [545] censure of the ordinary; but that he is invested with full authority to decree a removal. And it is no answer to articles calling upon the defendant to shew cause against the infliction of these penalties for erecting a monument without the ordinary's leave, to say that he erected it, forsooth, with the leave, or by the consent, of the minister and churchwardens.

The circumstance of this monument being an ornament to the church (presuming it to be), instead of disfiguring it, will not alter the rule of law: since its being erected without a faculty is equally illegal, whether it be ornamental or otherwise. It is no defence to a charge of having "usurped the ordinary's authority," to say that no prejudice to any, in the instance in question, or even that the contrary, has resulted from it. The offence charged is "the having usurped the ordinary's authority," which is the same in either case—and the legal penalties of its usurpation in this instance are those already described.

The fitness and convenience of the rule which the articles so affirm is as obvious as the rule itself is clear and certain. If the ordinary be the sole legal judge of the propriety of any additions to the fabric of the church, of which there can be no doubt, it follows, necessarily, that he ought to be consulted, in the first instance, or prior to any such being made. His power, in this respect, is not arbitrary. His consent to any being unduly withheld, when properly applied for, will found an application—it is to be presumed, a successful application—to his ecclesiastical superior. This is the rule to be collected from the case of Cart v. [546] Marsh (Mich. 11 Geo. 2. Strange, 1080); not that an appeal well lies against the ordinary for promoting his office against those who make additions to the fabric, without applying for his consent at all. This would, in effect, be limiting his privilege to that of removing such, after first, at his own risk, proving them to be nuisances; a position utterly untenable, but one, at the same time, which, we apprehend, this allegation being admitted, would go but little short of affirming.

The authorities for a position diametrically opposite to this are sufficiently numerous and sufficiently precise. Of monuments in churches (the additions to the fabrics in question), Sir Edward Coke (3 Inst. 110), indeed, only says, generally, that the erection is lawful, if it be done "in a convenient manner." But satis liquet, both from other text writers and from decided cases, that this to be done in a convenient manner, and, consequently, to be lawfully done, must be done with the consent of the ordinary. Such are the doctrines of Gibson (Codex, pages 453, 454), Degge (Parson's Counsellor, p. 1, c. 12), and Prideaux (Directions to Churchwardens, 64)—with which the dicta of Lord Stowell, sitting in the Consistory Court of London, in the cases of Bardin and Edwards against Calcott, and Maidman against Malpas, respectively (1 Hag. Con. pages 14, 205), strictly, in substance, concur. Lastly, it clearly results from adjudged cases—more especially from that of Bury versus [547] The Bishop of Exeter, reported in Strange,(a)[1] not only that the ordinary is the sole judge of what monuments, or the like, are fit to be set up in a church, but that, if set up in a church without his consent, he may proceed by suit to remove them, for that reason [in the words of the printed report, "as being set up without his consent"] merely; and without any reference whatever to the question of their being ornamental, or otherwise, to the fabric of the church.

For these reasons, and upon these authorities, we call upon your Lordships to pronounce against this appeal.

For the appellant, Lushington and J. Addams, Doctors, and Mr. Mereweather. We contend that the supposed impediment here, the want of a faculty, taken absolutely and per se, is, at most, in the nature of the impedimentum impeditivum merely, and not of the impedimentum dirimens; in other words, that if, in the absence of a faculty, the ordinary may interfere to prevent the erection of a monument, still, that the actual erection without a faculty is no ecclesiastical offence—à fortiori is none that can justify a decree of removal—in the event, that is, of such monument being proved to have been lawfully erected, at least in other respects; and also, at the same time, to be in itself neither inconvenient nor unseemly.

If, indeed, a monument were set up in a church in defiance of the ordinary's prohibition, after notice special, or general even, not to erect without a fa-[548]-culty, this might possibly (supposing, for argument's sake, the ordinary's present right to prohibit) be good ground for decreeing a removal without any reference either to the lawful erection in other respects, or to the fitness and convenience (or the contrary) of the structure itself. Probably the case in Strange, upon which so much stress has been laid, proceeded upon some special considerations of this sort, though not appearing in the printed report, which is contained, literally, in six lines.(a)[2] But the case set up here rests upon no such grounds. The official neither is, nor can be, shewn to have given any notice not to erect, either special or general even, as it was competent to him to have done; for instance, by exhibiting articles to the churchwardens of Poole at his visitations, or at some one of them, particularly interrogating them as to the practice of erecting tombs in the parish church of Poole, and calling upon them to present all persons erecting them without a faculty. Nothing of this sort is pretended; and, in the absence of every thing, we maintain the rule to be that which has just been stated.

It should seem, however, as already intimated, by no means certain that the mere erection of a monument without a faculty, even after a notice (purely [549] gratuitous) from the ordinary not to erect, is a punishable offence at all, especially at such same ordinary's own instance at the present day. We admit the strict rule of law, antiently, to have been that no monument should be erected without a faculty; at the same time it must in return be conceded to us that the observance of that rule has been dispensed with by common consent in all modern instances. Of all the numerous monuments, tablets, and grave stones erected to the memories of deceased persons within that period, applications for faculties to erect any have rarely, if ever, occurred in the recollection of the oldest practitioners in Ecclesiastical Courts. The last and latest instance upon record of any interference on the part of an ordinary to check or control this known practice of erecting monuments without faculties is that reported in Strange; for which we have to go back more than a century. This, we submit, makes it questionable whether, at the present day, the mere absence of a faculty, under any circumstances, can or should be deemed sufficient to constitute the erection of a monument in any church or chancel an ecclesiastical offence at all. Meantime, the practice so acquiesced in, on all hands, of erecting monuments without faculties, has had one certain result, namely, that were ordinaries, generally, now to proceed to a removal of the monuments erected without faculties in their several jurisdictions, indiscriminately—as the rejection of this allegation would infer them at liberty to do—it would go, this, to the demolition of nearly all the monuments in the kingdom erected within the last 100 years; not, [550] probably, without material injury, in many instances, to the actual fabrics of the churches themselves.

(a)[1] Sub nomine Palmer v. The Bishop of Exeter, Mich. 10 Geo. 2. Strange, 576.

(a)[2] It is in these words: Palmer against The Bishop of Exeter. Sir Thomas Bury set up his arms in the church of St. David's, in Exeter. The ordinary promotes a suit in the Spiritual Court to deface them, as being set up without his consent. It was moved for a prohibition, on the authorities, that action lies by the heir for defacing the monument of his ancestors. But Eyre and Fortescue, Justices, said the ordinary was judge what ornaments were proper, and might order them to be defaced. The same was afterwards moved in the Court of Common Pleas, and denied there also. Strange, 576.

Be this, however, as it may, we recur confidently to our first position, that the setting up of this monument under the circumstances is no ecclesiastical offence, still less is one that can justify a decree of removal, in the event of its being proved that it was lawfully set up in other respects, and is neither, in itself, inconvenient nor improper. Consequently, the defendant's responsive allegation pledging him to prove all this was and is admissible. The current of authority uniformly flows this way—abstract the single case in Strange, which proceeded, it may fairly be inferred, on some such special consideration as that already suggested. Of Gibson and Prideaux, cited as authorities by the counsel for the respondent, we shall speak presently. As for the judgments said to have been delivered by Lord Stowell, in the case of Maidman against Malpas and the other, it is obvious, even on a slight inspection of these, not to descend into particulars, that they have no pretence whatever to be cited as authorities upon the present question. Degge, too, may be put out of the case—he speaks of the licence of the ordinary, or the consent of the parson and parish, in the alternative, as if either would suffice to justify the erection of a monument in a church. This is clearly erroneous—whatever becomes of the necessity for the ordinary's consent, that of the parson must at least be had—both may be necessary—but that the former either includes or dispenses with the latter is obviously a mistaken notion. The authority of Degge, therefore, we repeat, is of no weight. The real authorities then in point are Gibson and Prideaux; no mean authorities, [551] we admit, in the absence of any, or at most in the presence of a single adjudged case; which, however, might well be, and most probably was, decided upon some special circumstances of its own. But we contend that, instead of making against us as insisted, they are on our side; that they are with us to the fullest possible extent of making the facts pleaded in this allegation a good defence against the ordinary's proceeding to decree a removal of the monument, hardly admits of a question. Gibson hopes that "if monuments erected without consent, upon inquiry and inspection, be found to the hindrance of divine service" [or as the rule may fairly be extended, be found, upon inquiry and inspection, otherwise inconvenient or improper], he "hopes it will not be denied that the ordinary in such case hath sufficient authority to decree a removal;" plainly intimating that he, Gibson, could even conceive or imagine him to have sufficient authority to decree a removal in no other case. Gibson, however, is the writer least likely to compromise any fair right of an ordinary—no person had higher notions of the power and jurisdiction of the ordinary in all matters appertaining to the church than Bishop Gibson.(a) [552] Prideaux's authority is equally

Monuments, coat-armour, and other ensigns of honor, set up in memory of the deceased, may not be removed at the pleasure of the ordinary or incumbent. On the contrary, if either they or any other person shall take away, or deface them, the person who set them up shall have an action against them during his life, and after his death the heir of the deceased shall have the same, who, as they say, is inheritable to arms, &c. as to heirlooms; and it avails not that they are annexed to the freehold, though that is in the parson. But this, as I conceive, is to be understood with one limitation—if they were first set up with the consent of the ordinary. For though (as my Lord Coke says) tombs, sepulchres, or monuments may be erected for the precise and to the same identical point. "The monuments, coats of arms painted in the window, or elsewhere, penons, hatchments, &c. put up in the church for the memory of the deceased buried there, if regularly set up with the consent of the minister who hath the freehold" [not a word about a faculty], "cannot be pulled down again either by the churchwardens, minister, or ordinary. But if any of the said particulars be an incumbrance, or any annoyance to the church, or in any way hindering or incommoding the minister in performing any of the divine offices, or the parishioners in partaking of them, in this case the ordinary hath power to give his order for their removal." True it is, he adds, "And therefore no one can be safe in any new erection in a church who hath not had the bishop's licence for the same; especially in setting up altar monuments which are most-an-end (most generally) a nuisance and incumbrance to the church wherein they are placed" (see Directions to Churchwardens, 64). But this, the dictum upon which our opponents mainly rely, well consists with our interpretation of what precedes it; and the effect of the whole we [553] apprehend to be this. If monuments are regularly set up with the leave of the minister singly, the ordinary has power, indeed, to remove; but only in the event of their proving nuisances or incumbrances. But if erected by the bishop's licence as well, those who erect them are then "safe"—safe, that is, at all events—and the erections themselves cannot be removed; but, at least in point of strict law, are entitled to stand as long as the fabric of the church itself, nuisances and incumbrances, or not. So much for Gibson and Prideaux. As for the case of Cart v. Marsh, cited also out of Strange (p. 1080), it is clearly in point neither way—all which can be collected from it to the purpose is that ordinaries should exercise in such matters a prudent, as well as a legal, discretion. Now, that the official of Great Canford and Poole is proceeding imprudently in this most vexatious interference, altogether, we apprehend, can admit of no question; even granting him, which we deny, to have proceeded legally in rejecting this allegation.

Upon these grounds we insist that your Lordships are bound to pronounce in favour of the present appeal.

DECREE.

The Judges, having heard the allegation read, and advocates and proctors on both sides, by their interlocutory decree, pronounced for the appeal made and interposed in this behalf, and for their jurisdiction, or rather for that of our Sovereign Lord the King—reversed the order or decree of the Judge of the Court below appealed from, and re-[554]-tained the principal cause; and therein directed the first sentence of the second article of the said allegation,(a) and also the word "accordingly" in the second sentence to be expunged, and, so reformed, admitted the said allegation.

deceased in church, chancel, &c. in convenient manner, the ordinary must be allowed the proper judge of that convenience; inasmuch as such erecting (for so he adds) ought not to be to the hindrance of the celebration of divine service. And if they are erected without consent, and (upon inquiry and inspection) be found to the hindrance of divine service, it will not (I hope) be denied, in such case, that the ordinary hath sufficient authority to decree a removal, without any danger of an action at law. Gibson's Codex, 453, 454.

(a) Which stood, as reformed, "That previous to the said monument being so erected and set up in the said parish church, he, the said James Seager, applied for and obtained the consent of the minister," &c. See p. 543. The Court, by directing this, may be taken to have expressed its final judgment that "no practice can absolutely legalize the erection of a monument without a faculty."

REPORTS of CASES ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS at DOCTORS' COMMONS and in the HIGH COURT of DELEGATES. By J. ADDAMS, LL.D., an Advocate in Doctors' Commons. Vol. II. Containing Cases from Michaelmas Term, 1823, to Trinity Term, 1825, inclusive. In Continuation of the ECCLESIASTICAL REPORTS of Dr. PHILLIMORE. London, 1825.

[1] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS; AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

STREET v. STREET. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1823.—Sentences of local ordinaries as to the amount of (especially permanent) alimony not to be disturbed on slight grounds. An appeal by the husband, complaining that too large a sum had been allotted to the wife for permanent alimony pronounced against, and the cause remitted.

(An appeal from the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Exeter.)

This was an appeal by the husband from an allotment of permanent alimony to the wife, made by the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Exeter; where the wife had obtained a sentence of divorce from the husband by reason of adultery.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In this suit, which was originally depending in the Consistory Court of the Lord Bishop of Exeter, the wife, the respondent, has obtained a sentence of divorce from the husband, the appellant, by reason of adultery. The appellant acquiesces in the sentence so far. But the wife has also been allotted the sum of 160l. per annum, payable by the husband as for per-[2]-manent alimony. It is this allotment of alimony which the husband objects to; and from which he has prosecuted the present appeal.

I am still of opinion, as in the case of Cook and Cook (2 Phillimore, page 40), to which I have been referred, that it requires a strong case to disturb the sentence of the local ordinary upon a question of alimony. If that sentence were extreme either way, the Court would undoubtedly interfere; in the one case to modify or reduce, and in the other to augment, the alimony, so, in either case, on that supposition, egregiously misallotted. But it is not any mere slight difference of opinion as to the propriety of the allotment in point of amount which would justify this Court to itself in exercising such an interference; and for this reason in particular. The Court below must have been better informed than this Court can be, with respect to the real merits of the whole case as between the parties. It had better means, consequently, of forming its judgment upon the question, agreeably to those general principles of equity which are nearly the only ones capable of being brought to bear upon this species of question. For instance, the Court below had means of estimating the true nature and degree of the husband's delinquency; with respect to which this Court is comparatively uninformed; for the "process" only includes that part of the whole case connected with the subject-matter of the appeal, in particular.

The appellant, in his answers to the allegation of faculties, admitted an income of 502l. 16s.: and, without suspecting him of perjury, I am justified [3] in thinking him inclined to make the best, in those answers, of his own case; more especially from a circumstance to which I will presently advert. Now taking this amount of income at his own statement, I am of opinion that the allotment of alimony complained of is by no means exorbitant. Not that the Court below was not well founded in rating, as it probably did, the appellant's income something higher than he admitted it. For instance, in his answer to the 4th article of the allegation of faculties, he estimated the profits of his business, that of a coachmaker, at 250l. per annum; and that without exhibiting his books, or producing any sort of vouchers. But of two witnesses upon the allegation of faculties, who should seem to be competent judges, one is of opinion that "the appellant's business nets between 3 and 400l." and the other, "that he does not clear by it more than 500l. per annum." And there was a circumstance in the case, as already hinted, which fully justified the Court in concluding that the appellant would go at least the utmost warrantable length, for the advancement or maintenance of his own interest. The appellant had sworn in his answers that the respondent was possessed, in her own right, of certain premises, which he, the appellant, was ready and willing to take, for a term of years, at a net rent of 30l. But it was in proof that on the respondent offering to close with this proposal of the appellant, he not only refused to take the premises in question at a net annual rent of 30l., but said that "he would have nothing to do with them at any price." Lastly, these premises themselves were sworn by a builder and surveyor not to be worth more than 16l. 5s. per annum, net [4] rent. And upon this evidence the Court which had given credence, in the first instance, to the husband's statement, in allotting the alimony, pendente lite, afterwards directed the additional sum of 1l. 2s. 6d. per month to be paid to the wife: being the monthly difference between the real value of these premises so ascertained and that sworn to by the husband; at which the Court, as I have said, had been content to take them, in allotting the alimony, pendente lite, at the commencement of the suit.

But taking the husband's statement as correct, what is the result? The joint income of the parties is 527l. per annum, the wife appearing to be possessed of a separate income of 25l. per annum in her own right. Add to this the annual sum of 160l. payable to the wife by the husband under the sentence appealed from; and the wife's annual income is 185l., leaving that of the husband 342l., nearly double that of the wife. She has rather more than two-fifths of the whole; no unusual proportion, for Courts have, not unfrequently, given a moiety, and surely not an excessive proportion in a case like the present. For the husband, in this case, had originally no property. He seems at least to be indebted for all his prosperity to this marriage,(a)[1] from the obligations of which he [5] has broken, and the duties of which he has neglected to fulfil.

But the parties have one child, a daughter, and it appears in the process, by the appellant's answers to the allegation of faculties, that he pays for the education and maintenance of this daughter (pursuant to a stamped agreement) the sum of 200l. per annum, which, "under the degrading circumstances of her late situation, cannot be less:" and the appellant claims that his income of 502l. shall be taken, less the sum of 200l. per annum, which he so pays for this daughter's maintenance and education. Of what these "degrading circumstances" alluded to in the process are, this Court is, judicially, uninformed; (a)[2] but the local ordinary, though probably better, in fact, acquainted with them, declined acceding to the husband's prayer in this behalf. It is quite impossible for this Court, uninformed as it is on the subject, to pronounce that, in so doing, he acted erroneously. It is equally so to maintain that, independent of

(a)[1] It was in evidence for the respondent that Street, the appellant, was an apprentice to his wife's first husband, and that he had no property at the time he married her. On the other hand, however, it was sworn by the appellant that the wife's whole property at the time of the marriage had been settled upon her to her own separate use, that her business at the time of the marriage produced very little profit, and that its afterwards becoming more profitable was solely owing to his industry and perseverance.

(a)[2] At the hearing affidavits were tendered on the part of the appellant, stating that his daughter, at the age of 15, had eloped from Exeter with a strolling player, at the mother's instigation, &c. &c. But the counsel for the respondent objected to the admission of these affidavits, and the Court sustained their objection and refused to permit the affidavits to be read.

this, or upon general considerations, the father's improvident bargain with respect to the child can operate any way to the prejudice of the mother. Upon the whole, nothing before the Court enables it to pronounce that the sentence appealed from was founded upon a view of the case at all erroneous; under which impression it is the duty of the Court to affirm it, and to remit the cause.

Sentence affirmed.

[6] CURLING v. THORNTON. (IN THE GOODS OF THE LATE COLONEL THORNTON.) Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1823.—An allegation, responsive to a condidit—suggesting the will of a British-born subject to be invalid by the law of France; where he died, and of which country he was alleged to have died a "domiciled inhabitant;" and that the effect of that invalidity was to defeat its claim to probate in the courts of this country —rejected.—The succession to the personal estate of a British subject dying domiciled in any part of the British Empire, intestate, is to be regulated by the law of that part of the British Empire which was his domicil at the time of his death.—But quære, whether a British subject can so far "exuere patriam," as to render his property here liable to distribution according to any foreign law, even in case of his intestacy?—Though admitting this to be, it would by no means follow that his will, to be valid here, must conform to that foreign law, either upon principle or upon authority.—The rule that where property is to be distributed under a certain law, in a case of intestacy, it must be so distributed in the absence of a will valid by that law, only applies to cases in which, there being no conflict of domicils, the law by which the case must be governed, whether ultimately to be deemed a case of testacy, or one of intestacy, admits of no question.

Thomas Thornton, Esq., the party deceased in this cause, died at Paris in the month of March, 1823. Probate of his will being opposed on behalf of his widow and relict, it was propounded by his executor in a common condidit. The present question arose, on the admission of an allegation, tendered by the widow, responsive to that plea.

This allegation pleaded, in substance,

1. That the said Thomas Thornton went from England to France about the end of the year 1815, and for a considerable time resided in that kingdom—that having determined to settle there, he arranged all his affairs in this country, "so far as was necessary or practicable," and towards the end of the year 1816 finally withdrew therefrom, as a permanent place of abode, and fixed his place of residence at Paris—that, in pursuance of such determination, and in order to acquire civil rights as a domiciled inhabitant of that kingdom, he applied for, and obtained, a "Royal Ordinance," bearing date 30th January, 1818, permitting him to "establish his domicil in France," and securing to him "the enjoyment of all civil rights so long as he should continue to reside in France"—that, from the time when the said deceased obtained the said Royal Ordinance, he continued constantly to reside in France, until his death in March, 1823; save that once only, happening in Sep-[7]-tember or October, 1818, he visited this country on matters of business; and, having remained here only so long as such business required his presence, immediately returned to France—that nearly the whole of his moveable effects were removed to France, and that, in July, 1817, he purchased a considerable landed estate in that kingdom, and assumed the title of Marquis de Ponté, and continued to occupy that estate till his death, though he had entered into an agreement for the sale thereof a year or two preceding his death—that the said deceased had wholly abandoned all intention of returning to England; and that his sole establishment was in France during the last six years of his life, where he died "a domiciled inhabitant of that country;" and that, by reason of the premises, "the personal estate of the said deceased ought to be disposed of according to the laws, customs, and usages prevailing in the kingdom of France, with respect to the personal estate of persons dying domiciled therein."

2. The second article merely pleaded the exhibit No. 1, annexed to the allegation, to be a true copy of the "Royal Ordinance" mentioned in the preceding article.

3. That by the laws, usages, and customs of France, an alien, who shall have established his domicil in France by virtue of a "Royal Ordinance," is entitled to all the civil rights and privileges of a natural-born French subject, during his residence in France—that by the said laws, &c. the personal property of an alien, dying in France so domiciled, is "regulated, disposed of, and distributed" as if the same belonged to a natural-born French subject dying [8] in France; and that the said deceased having died in France, so domiciled therein, his personal estate "is regulated, disposed of, and distributed" in the same manner, and according to the same rules, as if the same had belonged to a Frenchman.

4. That by the said laws, usages, and customs of France, a French or alien so domiciled in France as aforesaid, and dying therein, cannot by will deprive his lawful widow and child of the whole of his personal property, nor bequeath, to his adulterous offspring and its mother, "an hereditary portion," but, that a will of that tenor is, by such laws, &c., null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

5. That Thomas Thornton, the deceased, left behind him Elizabeth Thornton, widow, his lawful relict, and William Thomas Thornton, his natural and lawful son, a minor—that by the will pleaded and propounded in this cause on behalf of the executor the deceased's lawful widow and child are "almost wholly" excluded from any share of the property left by the deceased; and that the same is bequeathed, by the said will, to an illegitimate daughter of the said deceased, and to her mother—consequently, that by the laws of France, the said will is null and void, and that the property in question devolves, by succession, upon the widow and lawful child, the same as if the said deceased had died intestate.

6. That in June last (1823), the said Elizabeth Thornton, widow of the said deceased, applied to the civil tribunal of First Resort for the Department of the Seine, at Paris, for letters of administration of the goods of the deceased in the kingdom of France, as dying intestate by the laws of France, and was [9] opposed in that application by the executor named in his said pretended will (the parties, respectively, in this cause)—that in August, 1823, the president Judge of the said Court, after hearing advocates and solicitors on both sides, adjudged the possession of the personal estate and effects of the said deceased to his said widow, and constituted her administratrix thereof, provisionally, or pending suit—but that "all questions as to the legality, operation, or effect of the said will, still remain undecided in the said suit, though judgment therein is shortly expected to be pronounced." (a)

7, 8. The 7th article only pleaded the exhibit No. 2 to be an official copy of the proceedings aforesaid in the French court, on the grant of administration, provisionally, or pending suit, to the widow; and the 8th was the usual concluding article.

The "Royal Ordinance" being the exhibit No. 1, was as follows:—

Præfecturate of the Department of the Seine.

Louis, by the grace of God, King of France and Navarre, to all, &c.

Art. 1. Mr. Thomas Thornton, a native of London, aged sixty years, residing in Paris, is admitted to es-[10]-tablish his domicil in France, for the purpose of enjoying all civil rights, so long as he shall continue to reside therein.

Art. 2. Our keeper of the seals, minister, secretary of state in the department of justice, is charged with the execution of the present ordinance, which shall be asserted in the bulletin of laws.

Done at Paris, 30th January, A.D. 1817, and of our reign the 22nd.

(Signed) LOUIS.

The exhibit No. 2 is omitted, as furnishing nothing material to the question at issue.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The present question respects an alleged will of the late Colonel Thornton.(a)[2] It was made and executed in this country, bearing date the 2d of October, 1818; and the testator died at Paris on the 10th day of March, 1823. It begins as follows:—"This is the last will and testament of me Thomas

---

(a)[1] Accordingly—(subsequent however to the sentence in this Court, the Prerogative Court of Canterbury), the Court of First Instance at Paris has come to a decision, pronouncing the will null and void, and condemning the executor in costs—a decision, perhaps, the more extraordinary, as British interests alone were involved in the question: for no French subject or subjects apparently were entitled to the deceased's property, or to any part of it, in either alternative; in that of the will being pronounced for, or in that of the deceased being held to have died intestate.

(a)[2] The deceased was commonly known as Colonel Thornton, having formerly been Lieutenant-Colonel of the Second Regiment of York Militia.

Thornton, of Falconer's Hall, and Boythorp, in the East Riding of Yorkshire; and of the principality of Chambord, near Blois, and Pont le Roi, Department de St. Aube, in the kingdom of France, Esq." Such is the testator's description of himself in the heading of this instrument. The instrument itself gives and be-[11]-queathes all the testator's real and personal property to his executors, in trust, for payment of his funeral expences, debts, and legacies. It directs that Priscilla Duins shall be allowed to select whichsoever of his houses, either in England or France, she thinks fit, as her residence, and shall have and enjoy all the household furniture, plate, china, linen, and other household effects which shall be in and about such house, for and during the term of her natural life; together with an annuity of 500l. It provides for the maintenance and education of Thornvillia Diana Rockingham Thornton, his natural daughter by the said Priscilla Duins, till she attains her age of twenty-one; and gives her a life interest in all his property,(a) which it strictly entails, first on her issue, and in failure thereof then, successively, on different branches of his own family. It authorizes the trustees to sell or exchange any part or parts of the real estate in England or France; but estates purchased with the produce of such sale, or those taken in exchange, must be in England only. It directs that the surplus of the personal property shall be invested in the purchase of estates, but still only in England. Lastly, it provides that furniture (in general) and other moveable effects shall be sold, and become a part of the surplus so to be invested, except plate, books, paintings, and drawings, which last shall be heir-looms, and belong, in succession, to the tenant for the time [12] being of the entailed estates. The instrument in question is very long, occupying twenty-eight sheets of paper; it is drawn up in English, manifestly with reference to English forms and the English law; and it was regularly executed by the deceased in this country, in the presence of three witnesses.

The allegation which is offered on the part of the widow, and the admissibility of which the Court is now called upon to determine, does not deny the factum of this will, as I have described it. What it does is this. It suggests, first, that the will is invalid by the law of France; and, secondly, that under the circumstances pleaded the effect of that invalidity is to defeat its claim to probate in the courts of this country.

The counsel for the executors have taken a sort of general preliminary objection to the admission of this allegation, namely, that the question sought to be raised upon it is not one which this Court, a mere Court of Probate, ought to entertain. They have contended that the will propounded in this cause being such as I have described, and having been made and executed here, in England, by a British-born subject, is absolutely, and at all events, entitled to probate in this Court, de jure, on due proof of the factum of the instrument—be its effect, or operation, what it may. Upon these last they have argued, it rests not with this Court, but with a Court of Construction, the Court of Chancery, to decide; which, being satisfied; first, that the law of France ought, in substance and effect, to govern this case; and secondly, that that law is what it is pleaded to be in this allegation, will make the executors who [13] have taken probate here, mere trustees, for the benefit of the lawful widow and child. I am not prepared to say that the objection so taken in limine is quite unfounded; but it may be unnecessary to settle that point upon the present occasion. It neither is, nor can be, denied that a will of the description of Colonel Thornton's is entitled to probate primâ facie—and that to oust its title to probate, it must not only clearly appear to be invalid by the law of France, but, by reason of such invalidity, to be also invalid by the law of this country. I proceed, therefore, at once to inquire whether such would be the just legal result of the facts stated in this allegation; taking them, for the purpose of the argument, to be not merely capable of proof, but actually proved—upon the result of which inquiry must plainly depend the question immediately at issue before the Court; the admissibility, namely, or the contrary, of the present allegation.

The facts relied upon in the allegation, by way of defeating the claim of this will to probate, are these—that, in 1815, the deceased went to France, and finally withdrew from England in 1816, the following year—that, in 1817, he applied for, and obtained, a "Royal Ordinance," authorizing him to fix his domicil in that country, and (a) With the exception of a few pecuniary legacies, of no great value in the whole —among which, however, is a bequest of 100l. to the testator's son, described in the will as the "son of Mrs. Thornton." By the will no provision is made for the widow.

assuring to him, during his residence there, the enjoyment of all civil rights—that he continued resident in France from that time till his death there, in March, 1823, only once in that time coming over to England, merely to transact matters of business (one of such matters of business plainly, from its date, being the making of the will in question)—finally, that he removed nearly all his [14] moveable effects to France, and purchased an estate or estates there in 1817, which estate or estates he actually retained to the time of his death.

The counsel, who argued in support of this allegation, have cited a variety of cases (a)[1] tending to shew that the succession to the personal estate of a British subject dying domiciled in any part of the British Empire is regulated by the law of that part of the British Empire which was his domicil at the time of his death. Thus, of a Scotchman dying domiciled in this country, the effects, both Scotch and English, are to be distributed according to the law of this country, and not according to that of Scotland, the intestate's domicil of origin—and vice versâ. The plain reason seems to be that, of British domicils, a British subject is free to select whichsoever he pleases —and, dying domiciled in any part of the British Empire, other than his domicil of origin, intestate, the fair presumption is that he intended his property to be distributed conformably to the known law of that part of the British Empire for which his domicil of origin was so, lawfully as well as in fact, abandoned. Again, if a foreigner die abroad, in his own country, leaving property here, as in the British funds, the succession to that property is to be regulated by the law of his own country, and not by that of England—for England, in such case, is merely the locus [15] rei sitæ, the law of which has little to do with the question of distribution, according to modern decisions.(a)[2] These are points definitively settled: but no case has been cited conveying to my mind that a British subject who has abandoned (if, indeed, a British subject can abandon) his forum originis for [16] a foreign domicil, is liable to the law of that foreign domicil for the distribution of his property here, even though dying intestate. I speak only of his property situate here—for it is obvious that the Courts of this country, even if entitled de jure, are empowered de facto to determine nothing with reference to the distribution of his effects situate locally in a foreign country.

(a)[1] See the principal of these, if not all these, referred to in the case of Somerville v. Lord Somerville, 5 Ves. 750, et seq. where the various cases and authorities on the subject of domicil, as connected with this particular question of succession to personal property in cases of intestacy, are stated, and commented upon, in the argument and sentence, at great length and with great ability.

(a)[2] This point is said to have been completely settled in Balfour v. Scott (Lady Titchfield's case), in the House of Lords, 11th April, 1793. Accordingly, in the Annandale cause (Bempde v. Johnstone, 3 Ves. 198), the Lord Chancellor took the question as concluded; intimating, however, a doubt of his own upon it, if the question was still open. His Lordship said, "I am bound by repeated decisions in the House of Lords to make the decree I intend to make; that the deceased had that domicil in England that decides upon the succession to his personal property, and carries the succession according to the law of England. The point has been established in the cases in the House of Lords, which, if it was quite new and open, always appeared to me to be susceptible of a great deal of argument: whether in the case of a person dying intestate, having property in different places, and subject to different laws, the law of each place should not obtain in the distribution of the property situated there. Many foreign lawyers have held that proposition. There was a time when the Courts of Scotland certainly held so. The judgments in the House of Lords have taken a contrary course; that there can be but one law: they must fix the place of the domicil, and the law of that country where the domicil is decides, wherever the property is situated. That I take to be fixed law now. The Court of Session has conformed to those decisions; according to which the Courts of Great Britain, both Scotch and English, are bound to act."

In the Somerville cause the Master of the Rolls expressed himself "as having some reason to think that our Spiritual Courts once inclined to the lex loci rei sitæ, as well as the Courts of Scotland; and that this might have furnished the rule of decision upon similar questions there, if the authority of the House of Lords had not interfered." See 5 Ves. 791.

None of the cases then, with which I am acquainted, or to which I have been referred, are in point to the case contended for by the counsel for the widow, to an extent beyond that which I have already stated. Meantime, they go fully to demonstrate one thing, namely, that the forum originis is hardly shifted—that it continues at least till it is completely abandoned, and another taken. This rule is to be collected in particular from the Somerville cause,(a) where the Master of the Rolls held the intestate's Scotch domicil, his domicil of origin, clearly to prevail over his English domicil—consequently holding that his personal property was liable to be distributed according to the law of that country, and not according to the law of England; although the intestate [17] had been principally resident, for a long series of years, and actually died, in England. In the Somerville cause, however, the question lay between two domicils, either of which, as being both British, the deceased was free to select. The difficulty of a British-born subject shifting his forum originis (not for another British, but) for a foreign domicil, to say the least, must be infinitely greater, and more considerable. It may even be doubted whether this can be—whether a British subject is entitled so far "exuere patriam," as to select a foreign domicil in complete derogation of his British; which he must, at all events, do, in order to render his property in this country liable to distribution according to any foreign law. But however that be, this is certain, that the only abandonment of his forum originis by a British subject, which is adequate to this effect, must be a total and complete one; supposing him capable, that is, of any such total and complete abandonment of his forum originis; a matter which not only rests upon no authority, but which is somewhat doubtful, I think, even upon principle.

Now to what does the case before the Court, viewed as with reference to these principles, really and substantially amount? Stript of mere averments of intention, as of fixing his sole domicil in France, and so forth (and such averments of intention, not deducible from the facts pleaded, are of no avail whatever in the cause), the allegation amounts to this—that Colonel Thornton, some years prior to his death there, went to reside in France, and soon after applied for and obtained a "Royal Ordinance," as-[18]-suring to him certain privileges, so long as he should reside in France; and that, during his residence there, he purchased an estate, or estates (which, by the way, he had contracted to sell, though they are pleaded to have been in his actual occupation at the time of his death), assuming from this, or one of these, a territorial title, that of Marquis de Ponté. But was his British domicil completely abandoned during this interval, and was France, if his domicil (properly speaking) at all, his sole domicil? By no means: this instrument, the will, itself furnishes pregnant proof to the contrary. It proves that the deceased never sold or disposed of his mansions in England—it proves that he neither parted with, nor removed to France, his valuable (I may presume his most valuable) moveables even, as plate, books, paintings, and drawings; for the will makes, or purports to make, these heir-looms upon his English estates. In short, it proves, as with reference to provisions upon which I shall presently observe, that the deceased, in his own mind and apprehension, never ceased to be an Englishman; and that as this country was the place of his own nativity and personal sojourn during, by far, the greater portion of his life, so to this country it is that he himself was looking as the fixed seat and permanent habitation of his successors and posterity. Why upon these considerations, upon the application of these principles, if correct, to the case before the Court it can entertain, perhaps, little doubt that the personal property of the deceased ought to have been distributed according to the law of this country, and without any reference to that of France, even though he had left no will, and the case had been one of intestacy.

(a) "The third rule I shall extract,"* said the Master of the Rolls, in delivering judgment in the Somerville cause, "is, that the original domicil, or, as it is called, the forum originis, or the domicil of origin, is to prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested, and carried into execution, an intention of abandoning his former domicil, and taking another as his sole domicil." 5 Ves. 787.

* Namely—from the opinions delivered by Lords Thurlow and Loughborough, the former in Bruce v. Bruce, the latter in Ommaney v. Bingham, in the House of Lords; and from the cases and authorities referred to, and brought forward in those cases.

[19] But the case in question is not a case of intestacy. The deceased left a will. Now admitting, for argument's sake, that this Court would have been bound to defer to the law of France in the supposed case, that of an intestacy, will it necessarily follow that it is also bound to defer to it in the actual one, that of the deceased having left a will? This, again, appears to me somewhat questionable, even upon principle. Cases of testacy are subject to different considerations from those of intestacy, in this respect, for obvious reasons. In the latter case, for instance, the question lying between two domicils, the intestate's property is to be distributed according to the law of this or that, in virtue of his own implied directions to that effect: to ascertain which the real question in every such case is, which of the two is it to be presumed that the testator himself considered to be his domicil? But there can be neither room nor need for any such inquiry in the case of a will: testacy supposes, ex vi termini, express directions from the testator relative to the disposal or distribution of his property: and that law must obviously govern, in the case of every will, to which the will itself is found (not by a mere casualty, but technically, and, therefore, on the testator's part designedly) to conform—provided, that is, the testator be entitled to a voice in the premises. Hence it should seem by no means to follow universally, even upon principle, that a will to be valid must strictly conform to that law which would have regulated the succession to the testator's property, if he had died intestate. But whatever be the supposed foundation for a different notion upon principle, it [20] plainly rests upon no footing of authority. No adjudged case, not even a single obiter dictum, has been cited which can be taken to countenance that notion. In the Somerville cause, for instance, it was ruled that, the deceased dying intestate, the succession to his property was to be regulated by the law of Scotland. But is it any where hinted, even arguendo, in the long and elaborate report of that cause, that had the deceased left a formal, technical, will, strictly valid, in consequence, by the law of this country, its non-conformity to Scotch law, under the circumstances, would have amounted to a total defeazance of that will? Is it any where hinted, in other words, that the deceased in that cause was only testable (and as to all his property) in the precise manner and form, and subject to the strict rules and limitations imposed by the law of Scotland upon testacy? I am confident that nothing occurs throughout that report upon which such an inference can be fairly raised. Not that if it had occurred it might have furnished any rule of very strict application to the present case. Scotland, in the Somerville cause, was the forum originis. Here the forum originis being this country, and the will being such as I have described, it might possibly, at all events, be entitled to probate here, even though null and void by that law (as, for instance, the law of Scotland or of Jersey, could the deceased be argued to have been domiciled there), according to the provisions of which this Court would have been bound to decree a distribution of his effects, had he left no will but died intestate.

[21] At the same time it is true with all this that, where property is to be distributed under a certain law in a case of intestacy, it ought to be so distributed in the absence of a will valid by and according to that law. But this rule only applies to cases in which, there being no conflict of domicils, it admits of no question by what law the case, whether ultimately to be deemed one of testacy or intestacy, ought to be governed. Upon this principle the Court proceeded in a case to which I shall presently advert, that of Nasmyth.(a) But the Court is quite prepared, were it necessary, to deny the fit application of that rule to a case circumstanced like the present; both for reasons which have appeared and for others to be stated in the sequel, which may possibly render its unfitness of application to the present case still more apparent and still less disputable.

The case set up on the widow's part is one, I have said, utterly destitute of authority. On the contrary, a case has been cited by the counsel for the executor which is pretty precisely in point the other way. The Duchess of Kingston made a will at Paris, which (being neither holographic nor executed in the presence of two notaries, nor executed in the presence of two witnesses and one notary, but in the presence of three witnesses merely), according to the then custom of Paris, [1786], was absolutely null and void. But the testatrix being by birth an Englishwoman, and the will being in English and duly executed according to English forms, it was not only admitted to probate here,(b)[1] (which is ample to make it point [22] to the question at issue), but it was also deemed valid in France, if the judgment of a French lawyer of eminence (a)[1] is to be relied on—whose opinion to that effect, taken expressly upon this very case, is printed and published in the first volume of the "Collectanea Juridica." The duchess, however, had not only taken up her residence in France (where she also died), under "letters patent registered in the Parliament of Paris," couched in terms of privilege, it should seem, full as ample as Colonel Thornton's "Royal Licence," but her will, the instrument in question, was actually made and executed at and in Paris. Here the will was made in England—during the testator's stay in which his French domicil was at least suspended; and his rights as a British subject, supposing them to have been ever waived or forfeited by, clearly reverted to him.

And this, by the way, together with some provisions of the will itself, upon which the Court is pledged to advert, suggests another principle fairly invocable into the case, and by which, were it necessary again, the claim of this will to probate might be still further strengthened and sustained.

It is said, in substance, by Lord Mansfield in the case of Robinson and Bland, as reported by Mr. Justice Blackstone,(b)[2] that contracts are to be ex-[23]-pounded according to the lex loci or law of the place in which they are made, save only where the parties, at the time of making them, had in view a different place; an exception which makes the rule itself well consist with Huber's principle (a)[2] that contracts are to be expounded according to the lex loci in which they are to be executed.

Now, taking the principle, mutatis mutandis, to be as applicable to wills as to contracts, what does this principle suggest with reference to the case before the Court? The instrument in question is not only made in this country, but it is to this country that the testator himself limits its full and final effect and operation. The surplus of his personal effects is to be invested in the purchase of estates in England only—such estates as he dies possessed of, either in France or England, are made liable to be exchanged for others at the discretion of his executors and trustees, but such other estates, so taken in exchange for any that he dies possessed of, are expressly required to be in England only. Here, then, the will was both made and was to be finally executed; and these provisions, again, plainly negative the case set up in the allegation of a voluntary total abandonment of his native country by the testator; and prove him, upon his own shewing, to have never ceased to be an Englishman.

[24] In Nasmyth's case,(a)[3] which has been deemed so precisely in point by the counsel for the widow, the principal material circumstances were almost the reverse of these. The deceased was a Scotchman by birth, and though he died here, it was merely in transitu; for it is not suggested that either in law or fact he was ever domiciled in this country. Scotland, too, was the locus in quo the will was made; in which it was found; and in which, properly speaking, it was to be executed. Upon a question touching the validity of such a will made by such a testator, the Court thought (and still thinks) that it was bound to defer to the law of Scotland—this country being merely in Nasmyth's case the locus rei sitæ—the place in which the property, or rather a part of the property, purported to be conveyed under the will, was locally situate. In the present case this is the forum originis—it is also quoad hoc, I think, the forum domicilii; for I very much question whether this deceased, at all events, was ever so domiciled in France as to render his property here liable to distribution according to the law of France, if he had died intestate—this, again, so far as regards the property which a sentence of this Court can affect, is the forum rei sitæ, a circumstance, perhaps, not wholly immaterial, taken in conjunction with others, though of little or even of no moment standing alone—this, lastly, is the forum contractus as it were; for the will was made in this country; was to be executed in this country; and was drawn up plainly with reference and in strict conformity to the highly technical requisites, in [25] that behalf, of the law of this country. Under these circumstances, how totally inapplicable the case of Nasmyth is to the position contended for by the counsel for the widow in the present case, must, after what has already fallen from the Court, be too obvious to require any comment.

(b)[1] Probate was opposed here, non constat upon what grounds by the next of kin. But the cause proceeded no further than to the examination of witnesses on a common condidit propounding the will. The opposition of the next of kin was then withdrawn: and the Court thereupon in 1791 decreed probate to the executors.

Upon the whole, being satisfied that the facts pleaded are insufficient to affect the validity of the will which has been propounded in this cause, the Court has no difficulty in saying that the present allegation must be rejected.

Allegation rejected—costs were prayed against the widow, but the Court refused to give costs.

HARE AND OTHERS v. NASMYTH. (IN THE GOODS OF DR. JAMES NASMYTH.) On the validity of a will made by a domiciled inhabitant of Scotland the Court here will differ to the law of Scotland: and will pronounce in favour of the will, or that the deceased died intestate, according as that question is determined by the Scotch Court of Probate.

[Distinguished, Curling v. Thornton, 1823, 2 Add. 21. Followed, De Bonneval v. De Bonneval, 1838, 1 Curt. 870. Referred to, Croker v. Marquis of Hertford, 1844, 4 Moo. P. C. 360.]

The suit of Hare v. Nasmyth, twice referred to in the "judgment," or rather that part of it material to any question of domicil, was briefly as follows:—

The deceased in that cause, Dr. James Nasmyth, usually resided at Hope Park, near Edinburgh; (a) but in the year 1812 he came to London, where, though intending from time to time to return into Scotland, he remained till his death, which took place on the 7th of December, 1813. He left behind him certain testamentary papers, which were propounded in Hilary Term, 1815, by the asserted executors, in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury (the deceased having left large personal property within the Province of Canterbury (b)); and the admission of the [26] allegation propounding them was opposed by counsel for the next of kin upon grounds, however, quite distinct from any question of domicil. The Court [Sir John Nicholl] expressed itself as inclined to think that the legal presumption against the papers propounded was, as contended, too strong to be encountered by the circumstances pleaded, and consequently that the allegation was inadmissible; as laying no case capable, if proved, of giving the papers propounded legal validity according to our law. At the same time, it appearing on the face of the proceedings that the deceased was a domiciled subject of Scotland, the Court itself suggested (a suggestion upon which it subsequently acted after mature deliberation) the propriety of suspending its proceedings until a suit, stated to be then depending in the Courts of Scotland, touching the validity of the identical papers propounded in this (the Prerogative) Court should be decided; for the reasons and upon the principles stated and illustrated to the foregoing judgment—intimating that it might feel it its duty to pronounce for the validity of the testamentary papers, or that the deceased had died intestate, according as the Courts of Scotland should determine that question, either upon general principles, or upon principles applicable to the subject, if any, peculiar to Scotch jurisprudence.

Proceedings in the Prerogative Court were accordingly suspended, and the admissibility of the allegation propounding the asserted will and codicils of the deceased was never finally debated. For the papers in question having been, in effect, pronounced for by the tenor of three interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of Scotland, bearing date on the 18th day of May, the 9th of June, and the 14th November, 1815; and also of an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session there, bearing date the 7th day of June, 1816, the next of kin of the deceased declined any further opposition to probate passing in the Prerogative Court; and probate of the asserted will and codicils was thereon decreed, by the Prerogative Court, to the executors on the second session of Michaelmas Term, 1816; official or authenticated copies of the sentences of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court of Session in Scotland being first brought in.

(a) The deceased in early life went to India: but he returned to Scotland in 1798; and from that time to 1812 he usually resided at Hope Park House, as above.

(b) The deceased, in addition to considerable real and personal property in Scotland and the Island of Jamaica, was stated to have left personal property in this country to the amount in value of 70,000l.

Subsequent to this, however, the next of kin appealed from the above interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary and of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland to the House of Lords; [27] and that appeal, having been duly prosecuted, came to a final hearing on the 27th of June, 1821; when their Lordships were pleased to reverse the said interlocutors and to find that the asserted will and codicils were of no effect or avail in law as testamentary dispositions. Upon this a proctor on behalf of the executors brought in the probate of the said asserted will and codicils of the deceased, decreed as aforesaid by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury and consented to the same being revoked—whereupon the Court, on the fourth session of Michaelmas Term in that year, proceeded to revoke the said probate of the asserted will and codicils; and, finally, to decree administration of the goods of the deceased as dead intestate (according to its own original impression) to certain next of kin—an official copy of the judgment of the House of Lords, above referred to, having first been brought into Court by the proctor for the next of kin.

HULME v. HULME. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1823.

—Cruelty may be without actual personal violence; and such cruelty (at least), when coupled with adultery, may found a sentence of separation on both grounds. (On the admission of the libel.)

This was a cause of separation, à mensâ et thoro, by reason of cruelty and adultery, promoted by Harriet Hulme, of the parish of St. George, in the county of Middlesex and diocese of London, against her husband, John Hulme, of the same parish, county, and diocese.

The libel pleaded "that the parties were married in the month of January, 1819, and that they continued to live and reside together from that time till the beginning of February, 1820; that the said Harriet Hulme then quitted her said husband by reason of his violent conduct towards her, pleaded and set forth in the libel, and that she had never since lived or [28] resided with him: it also pleaded that in the same month of February, 1820, the said Harriet Hulme exhibited articles of the peace against her said husband, the said John Hulme, at the General Sessions held, for the county of Middlesex, at the Sessions House at Clerkenwell, and that thereupon the said John Hulme was bound by the justices to keep the peace towards his said wife, himself in 200l. and two sureties in 100l. each."

In objection to the admission of this libel, so far as it went to set up a case of legal cruelty, it was argued that the cruelty was laid to consist in menaces only, it not being pleaded that the husband had carried these or any of them into execution; even so far as to be betrayed, in a single instance, into the commission of actual violence towards the wife. The case was distinguished in this respect from that of Otway v. Otway (2 Phillimore, 95); in which a similar objection had been taken and over-ruled (b) —as, though menaces were principally relied on in that case, still some (minor indeed) acts of violence were also charged on the husband, in order to found the prayer of the wife. The different circumstances of the parties to the two suits respectively in point of age, condition, &c. were also insisted upon: and the case of Otway v. Otway, throughout, was shewn to be materially distinguished from the present in many particulars; especially with respect to the more specific nature of the charges and the time within which the proceed-[29]-ings were commenced in the case of Otway v. Otway. The menaces, or even acts of inchoate violence (so calling them), charged in this libel, were admitted to be of the grossest description; (a) it was also admitted that menaces only suggesting the probability of great personal violence might possibly constitute a case of legal cruelty. But the ground of holding the fitness of divorce, by reason of cruelty consisting in menaces only, was argued to be this—the probability of menaced violence, especially of a certain description, leading to and terminating in actual violence, of which Courts are bound to interfere, not only for the redress, but also for the prevention. Hence it had constantly been inquired in such cases, was the court to wait till the mischief was done, till the offence was consummated, before it intervened? Here it was said that argument does not apply: the parties have been separated upwards of three years, nor is it suggested that the husband is seeking either to compel, or even to persuade, the wife to return to cohabitation. Added to this, the wife has exhibited articles of the peace against the husband: and the husband is actually bound to keep the peace towards her, himself in 200l. and two sureties in 100l. each. Consequently, the Court is not called upon, in this instance, to interfere for the prevention of mischief—the wife has resorted [30] for that to another tribunal, the interposition of which she does not suggest to have been ineffectual: so that the ordinary ground for dealing with menaces as with legal cruelty seems to fail in this case. But,

(b) Namely, on the admission of the libel; though no report of the argument or judgment is in print that the editor is aware of.

(a) For instance it, was pleaded that the husband threatened on one occasion "to cut his wife's arm off and beat her brains out with it;" and on another (a few days after her confinement) "to pull her out of bed and kick her up and down the room:" also that he "once seized a red hot poker and brandished it and threatened to run her through with it," and that he often attempted to strike her, &c. &c.

The Court was of opinion that the husband's conduct as pleaded, notwithstanding all this, was of a nature to found a case of legal cruelty, and consequently that the libel was admissible in toto.(a)

MILLER v. BLOOMFIELD AND SLADE. High Court of Delegates, Michaelmas Term, 1823.—An allegation—responsive to a libel thentofore admitted in the cause, pleading a church-rate including "stock in trade." [See vol. i. p. 499]—suggesting, 1st, that the parishioners were omitted to be rated for "shipping;" 2dly, that several parishioners possessed of stock in trade were altogether omitted to be rated in the said rate, and consequently that the rate was invalid—directed to go to proof.

This was a question as to the admission of an allegation responsive to the libel thentofore given and admitted in the cause: for which, and for the nature and circumstances of this cause, see ante, vol. i. p. 499, et seq.

The allegation (in substance pleaded)

Art. 1. That the church-rate, the subject of the suit, was not made agreeable to the then present poor-rate for the said parish as pleaded in the said libel; for that parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish, the owners or proprietors of ships of the burthen of twenty-four tons register each and upwards, were rated and assessed for the said ships or vessels to the said poor-rate, but were wholly omitted to be [31] rated and assessed for the same to the said church-rate for the said parish. And the article went on to plead that the several parishioners whose names were set forth in a paper writing or exhibit annexed, marked A, were proprietors of the several ships or vessels expressed of the tonnage expressed, and were rated and assessed, for the said ships or vessels, at the sums expressed to the poor's rate in force for the said parish at the time of making the said church-rate; but that such parishioners were altogether omitted to be rated and assessed for such ships or vessels to the said church-rate.

2. The second article pleaded that the mode of making the church-rate within the said parish had not been uniform, but had varied from time to time, in manner following, viz. "That from the year 1751, or thereabouts, until in or about the year 1773, lands, messuages, and tenements within the said parish, and personal property or stock in trade, including therein ships belonging to parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish, but not money in the public stocks or funds, or otherwise at interest, were rated and assessed to all the different church-rates"—that "from the year 1773, until in or about the year 1792, lands, messuages, and tenements, within the said parish, and personal property belonging to the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish, including therein ships and money in the public stocks or funds, or otherwise at interest, were rated and assessed to all the different church-rates:" —that "from the year 1792, until in or about the year 1800, such lands and tenements, stock in trade, and ships only (but not money at interest in the stocks or otherwise, as in the interval between 1751 to 1773) were so rated [32] or assessed"

(a) This cause came to a final hearing on the by-day after Trinity Term, 1824, when the libel was held to be proved in both particulars; and a divorce was consequently pronounced for on both grounds.

—and, lastly, that "from the said year 1800, till the present time, such lands and tenements, and stock in trade, but neither money at interest, as above, nor ships, had been rated and assessed to the different church-rates made for the said parish." And the article further pleaded that Miller (the defendant) "was not by law rateable to the said church-rate both for his messuages, tenements, and hereditaments, and also for his stock in trade in the said parish, and that, therefore, he was not justly rated and assessed to the said rate or assessment as aforesaid," nor was such rate or assessment made agreeable to the usual mode of making the church-rate in the said parish, as pleaded in the libel.

3. The third article pleaded—that the several parishioners, twelve in number, whose names were set forth in the paper-writing or exhibit marked B annexed, were then, and at the time of making the said rate, possessed of stock in trade within the said parish: but, together with other persons also possessed of stock in trade in the said parish at such times, were altogether omitted to be rated, either to the said poor's rate, or to the said church-rate for the same.

4. The fourth was a general concluding article; praying that the said church-rate might be pronounced to have been unduly made, and assessed, and that Miller, the appellant (the original defendant), might be dismissed from the suit, and from all further observance of justice therein.

The counsel for the appellant were proceeding to argue against the admission of the allegation, but were stopped by the Court.

[33] Per Curiam. Mr. Justice Best. The rateability of stock in Pool to the church, generally, was determined, at least sub modo, by the Court upon the admission of the libel; a decision with the principle of which none of the facts pleaded in the allegation about to be debated seem to the Court materially to interfere. They even establish the substantial averment of the libel, that stock has uniformly been rated to the church in Pool; though the practice under circumstances may have varied, as to the particular kinds of stock included, from time to time, in the several rates. Accordingly, the allegation must, at all events, be reformed, by striking out that part of the second article which pleads that the appellant was "not liable to be rated, both for his lands and tenements, and also for his stock in trade." At the same time, we are clearly of opinion that, of the objections taken to this particular rate, one at least must ultimately be fatal. If stock in trade be taxable to the church, so also must shipping be, especially in Pool; where shipping are taxable, in common with other stock to the poor, under a decision of the Court of King's Bench, made as with reference to this town of Pool in particular.(a) Again, of parishioners holding stock in trade in Pool, some are pleaded to be omitted altogether in the rate. This also would probably be fatal to the rate; but that the prior objection would be (of course taking the fact to be as pleaded, namely, that shipping are omitted to be rated altogether) seems to the Court to be nearly certain. Under these circumstances, would it [34] not be advisable for the vestry to desist from enforcing the present rate; and to make a new rate, including both shipping, and the stock, if any, of parishioners omitted in the present rate? Such a rate this Court might hold to be valid; and, probably, neither the present appellant, nor any other parishioner, after this intimation of the Court's opinion, would object to the payment of his proportion of a rate so constructed. Should this suggestion be acceded to, it will preclude the necessity of counsel going through a detail of their objections to the admission of the present plea.

The counsel for the appellant and respondent, after some deliberation, having mutually, for themselves, conditionally acceded to this suggestion.

Per Curiam. As for the present, the allegation, with the suggested omission, must stand admitted.

The Judges who sat, upon the admission of this allegation, were Mr. Justice Garrow, Mr. Justice Best, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Jenner, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Gostling, Dr. Dodson, and Dr. Lee.

[35] OLIVER AND TUKE v. HEATHCOTE. In the Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1824.—"Personal answers" are not confined to being mere echoes of the plea, accompanied with simple affirmances or denials; but the respondents are further at liberty to enter into all such matter as may fairly be deemed not more than sufficient to place the transactions as to which their answers are taken in what they insist to be the true and proper light.—An objection taken to "answers" for redundancy, held, upon this principle, not to be sustained; and, consequently, over-ruled.

(Upon an objection to "personal answers.")

Josias Cockshut Twisleton, the party deceased in this cause, late of Osbaston Hall, in the county of Leicester, died the 30th March, 1821, aged 82 years. A will of the deceased, bearing date the 4th of March, 1818, was propounded on behalf of the Reverend John Oliver, and John Tuke, two of the executors named therein; and was opposed on the part of Mary Heathcote (wife of Bache Heathcote, Esq.), his only child.

It had been pleaded on her part, in reply to a condidit given in on behalf of the executors, that the deceased, for many years prior to the date of the will in question, was labouring under mental delusion, of which her allegation had also stated a variety of supposed instances; and, that he was not in possession of testamentary capacity at the time when the said will purported to bear date.(a) It was pleaded by [36] the executors in rejoinder that the deceased, though a man of singular and eccentric habits, and profuse in his expenditure, or an "unthrift," never laboured under mental delusion until several months subsequent to the month of March, 1818, the date of the will. And in affirmance of that averment they had proceeded to state numerous matters of moment and concern, in which the said deceased was engaged up to that period, and which he personally transacted; with the knowledge and approval (so pleaded) of the very parties now setting up that he was insane at those times, and had been so for years preceding.

Among other specific instances of the deceased's capacity, up to the period aforesaid, pleaded by the executors, was the following, as stated in the ninth article of their rejoinder, or second allegation:—

"That, after the said Josias Cockshut Twisleton, the party in this cause deceased, had made and executed his last will and testament, bearing date the 4th day of March, 1818, to wit, on or about the 9th day of the said month of March, he, the said deceased, went from his said house at Osbaston, to an inn at Burton-upon-Trent, known by the sign of the Queens, and did there meet Mr. William Osborne, of Burton-upon-Trent, aforesaid, attorney-at-law, by appointment; for the purpose of entering into, and he did then and there enter into, and sign, a contract or agreement with the said William Osborne, as the attorney of Messrs. Peels, near Derby, for the purchase of an estate near Derby, called the Pastures, adjoining or contiguous to an estate then the property, or in possession of, the aforesaid Bache Heathcote, for the sum of thirteen thousand pounds, or thereabouts. That the terms of the said purchase had been [37] previously settled by or between the said William Osborne, as the attorney for the vendors, and the aforesaid Cockshut Heathcote, Esq., the grandson of the said Josias Cockshut Twisleton, Esq., the party deceased, on the part of him the said deceased. And he, the said Cockshut Heathcote, Esq., was the person who, on behalf of the said deceased, corresponded with the said William Osborne respecting the said purchase. That on the said occasion when the said deceased so went to Burton-upon-Trent, and entered into such contract or agreement, he was accompanied thither, in his carriage, by the said Sarah Cockshut Twisleton, his wife, and the said Cockshut Heathcote, his grandson; and he, the said Cockshut Heathcote, was present with the said deceased and the said William Osborne during the whole of the time that was occupied in transacting the said business. That when the contract for the said purchase was so entered into and signed, he, the said deceased, gave a draft for the amount of the deposit money to the said William Osborne, drawn on a Mr. Robert Plummer Weddall, who [as pleaded in the seventh article of the allegation] had contracted for the purchase from him, the said deceased, of a part of his estate at Goole in the county of York; and he,

(a) In the month of November, 1818, the deceased had been found a lunatic, and to have so been without lucid intervals, for the space of two years then last past, under a "commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo," which issued about that time out of Chancery, on the petition of Sarah Cockshut Twisleton, his then wife. And Mr. and Mrs. Heathcote respectively, his son-in-law and daughter, afterwards petitioned for and obtained a "commission of lunacy" against the deceased; and were appointed committees of his person and estate under that return.

the said deceased, as a reason for paying the said deposit by such draft, told the said William Osborne that he had then lately sold an estate to the said Robert Plummer Weddall, and that he had not the least doubt of such draft being duly honored, or to that effect: but the said draft was not honored. That the said Josias Cockshut Twisleton, the party in this cause deceased, was, at and during all the time hereinbefore mentioned, perfectly rational and sensible, and well knew and understood [38] the nature of the contract or agreement which he then signed or entered into; and well knew and understood what he said and did, and what was said and done in his presence, and was fully capable of contracting for the purchase of the said estate, called the Pastures, and of doing any other act of that or the like nature. That the said Bache Heathcote is now in possession of the said estate, called the Pastures, under the contract or agreement hereinbefore mentioned; and the said Cockshut Heathcote acted, throughout the transaction as to the said contract or agreement, by the directions or with the knowledge and approbation of the said Bache Heathcote, or of Mary Heathcote his wife."

The "personal answer" of Mrs. and Mr. Heathcote, the next of kin, and her husband, to this article of the executor's allegation was as follows:—

"To the ninth position or article of the said allegation these respondents answer and say, they believe that in the course of the said deceased's journey from York to Osbaston, in the month of February, 1818, he heard that an estate in Worcestershire was on sale; and that the said deceased, then labouring under the delusion that he had very extensive estates, producing a rental which he at various times stated to amount from 30,000l. to 70,000l. a year, and that he had large sums of money at his bankers, unproductive of interest, declared his determination to stay at Osbaston a few days only; and then of proceeding from Osbaston into Worcestershire, and of purchasing that estate; and that he also expressed a wish to purchase other estates which he heard were to be sold: and the respondents, being apprehensive that the said deceased [39] would, under such aforesaid delusion, proceed into Worcestershire, and involve himself in further pecuniary difficulties by entering into a contract with parties perfectly unacquainted with him for the purchase of estates of great extent and value, the consequence of which might be ruinous to himself; and with the view of diverting his mind from his proposed journey into Worcestershire informed him that the articulate estate, called the Pastures, was to be sold. That the said deceased immediately declared his intention of purchasing it, and desired the respondent's son, the said Cockshut Heathcote, to go over to Burton and buy the said estate. That the said Cockshut Heathcote, having afterwards informed the said deceased of the price asked for the said estate, he, the said deceased, without having seen the same, or knowing the quantity or quality of the land, or having taken the opinion of any one as to its value, or ever asked a single question respecting it, declared that the said estate was very cheap, and that he would purchase it; that the respondents, finding that the said deceased was determined to purchase some estate, and to prevent his making an injurious purchase which might involve him, and his family, in embarrassment and litigation; as the said estate called the Pastures was an advantageous purchase, on consulting some of their friends, were advised to let the said deceased purchase the said estate; and the terms of the said contract having been settled without the said deceased taking any part therein, save as hereinbefore set forth, and the contract having been prepared for execution, the respondents admit," &c. &c. [40] i.e. admit the actual purchase of the estate, &c. nearly in effect, as stated in the plea.

This "answer" was objected to upon the grounds, and for the reasons, stated in the Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This answer is objected to on the score of redundancy. Redundant in some sense it undoubtedly is; but the question to be determined is whether it be viciously so. For the rest, I have always understood that answers were not confined to being mere echoes of the plea, accompanied with simple affirmances, or denials; but that respondents are at liberty to go into all matter not more than sufficient, in fair construction, to place the transactions as to which their answers are called for in, what they insist to be, the true and proper light. And in accordancy with this principle, instances have occurred within my memory in which, where "answers" had been partially read by counsel, I mean the answer to some one article, for instance, or position of a plea, the Court has itself directed other parts of the same answers to be also read; in order that the true course, as represented in the answers taken as a whole, of that transaction to which the answers in that part of them read by counsel immediately related might appear in evidence. And this I take to be due less ex gratia to respondents than to be what they are entitled to ex debito justitiæ.

Now if this be the true principle applicable to "personal answers," the exception taken to those before the Court can hardly be sustained. Who does not see that the transaction to which this answer re-[41]-lates is placed in a very different light by the answer to that in which it stood under the plea? The fact, per se, would undoubtedly be strong to shew, not only that the deceased at the date of this transaction was a capable agent; but also that he was so treated by the very persons now seeking to impeach his sanity. Accompanied with its history furnished in these answers (and which the respondents are precluded from furnishing by no rule of law that I am acquainted with), it assumes at least a different aspect; though to what precise extent the suggested motive is a satisfactory explanation of the admitted fact in this instance it is needless at all events for the present to inquire.

The objection, as I collect from the argument, founds itself upon this, that the matter excepted to should have appeared in plea; for that appearing as it does, merely in answers, it is matter to which the executors can have no opportunity of cross-examining. But this objection applies equally to every statement made in answers, and it is one which seems to me for other reasons hardly to be tenable. Extra articulate matter in a deposition is reasonably objected to on this principle, namely, as being matter to which no interrogatories could be addressed by the adverse or objecting party. But then a deposition, if unobjected to, is evidence in the cause. Answers only become so if read by the adverse party, which, being at liberty either to do or omit, it rests with the adverse party either to make or to exclude them from being evidence in the cause by a very simple process. Nor does it materially alter the case in this respect that the Court is privileged to look into the answers, even [42] though unread, for it may be safely left to the Court's discretion to make all such deductions and allowances as the case requires; so as in no instance to attach any undue weight or influence on the respondent's side to answers which, not being read, are not before the Court, strictly and properly, as evidence in the cause. Again, much of answers, perhaps usually the most stringent part, consists of matter which is not capable of being put in plea. All such matter then is admissible in answers; and yet is matter to which the other party has no opportunity of cross-examining. How, in this very case, for instance, could the motives by which these parties were actuated, as they insist in assenting to, or rather in not dissenting from, the purchase of this estate by the deceased, be put in plea? or, if put in plea, who was capable of deposing to them? But were the respondents bound to admit the fact without an accompanying statement of these motives? Certainly not. For all these reasons it seems to me that the answers are not viciously redundant in this part of them; and that I am bound to over-rule the present objection.

Objection over-ruled.

DOKER v. GOFF. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1814.—A regular attestation clause without any subscribed witness affords but a slight presumption against the legal validity of a testamentary paper, perfect in other respects: but that presumption is infinitely slighter where the writer's intention to have it regularly attested is to be collected only from the single word "witnesses" at the foot of the paper.—Quære, whether a paper so circumstanced can, in all cases, be considered an unfinished paper so as to let in evidence against it? and note to what that evidence must (at all events in some cases) be confined.

John Goff, formerly of High Street, in the borough of Southwark, a police officer, was the party deceased. He left a widow (party in the cause) and [43] nine children. From the month of June, 1821, the deceased had been resident in Holland, whither he had gone in order to avoid being arrested by the creditors to whom he had become liable as the security of a person named William Goff; and where he died on the 28th of November, 1822: the deceased was accompanied to Holland by Elizabeth Smith Doker (the other party in the cause), with whom he had previously cohabited; and with whom he continued to cohabit, in Holland, until her return to this country, at the time and under the circumstances stated in the judgment. The question before the Court was the validity of a paper set up as the will of the deceased by this Elizabeth Smith Doker.

The paper in question was as follows :—

28 day of October 1821.

In the Name of God Amen.

I John Goff, of N°. 15 in Koe Straat in the City of Amsterdam in Holland formerly of the Borò of Southwark in the County of Surry being of sound memory mind and understanding do make this my last Will and Testiment here by from all former Wills and Testiments at any time heretofore made—in the direction of my first place I desire to be decently buried at the ʌ Executrix Elizabeth Smith Doker my preasent Housekeeper and after the payment of my Funeral and Expences for Adminestraing to this my last Will aforesaid to and all the debts I may owe at the time of my decease I give and bequeath unto Elizʰ. the Last and only Will of John Goff.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The Court, in determining this cause, must be governed by the same principles as if the property at stake were more considerable: (a) and by the same, it is sorry to say, as if the case set up on the part of the executrix had a less unfavourable aspect than that with which it actually presents itself.

The deceased left this country in June, 1821, accompanied by this woman Doker, with whom he [45] cohabited until March, 1822, when she returned to England, after much mutual altercation, not unaccompanied with some personal violence on both sides, principally, it should seem, in consequence of the deceased having formed a connexion with a Dutch woman named Blawmn, whom he picked up in Holland. After he had been in Holland four or five months, though probably before his acquaintance with this Dutch female, he wrote the testamentary paper propounded by Doker. Neither the handwriting of the paper, nor the testamentary capacity of the deceased at the time of writing it, is questioned: the real and sole question is, whether the deceased did or did not consider it a finished and operative paper in its present state. If the Court is bound to conclude it to have been such, in the deceased's view and apprehension of the matter, there is an end of the case. No proof of his having intended to make another will, or to dispose of his property differently, will or can, in that event, avail to defeat it: and the Court will be bound to decree probate to the executrix, how inofficious soever this paper may be, and how repugnant soever it may be to the feelings of the Court to pronounce in its favor.

The first thing to be the regarded is the form and appearance of the paper itself. It is a large sheet of thick paper; and such a one as a person might naturally select about to make a final disposition of his property. The date "28 day of October, 1821," is twice written; it is twice sealed, one of the two seals bearing the deceased's initials, the other a common device, but both seals appearing to have belonged to the deceased; it is signed by the deceased in five [46] places. On the margin is also written, "The last and only will of John Goff." The purport of this paper is to give all the deceased's "worldly property," after payment of his debts and funeral expences to Elizabeth Smith Doker, whom the testator appoints by it his sole executrix, and the guardian of his natural daughter Louisa Daniels.

The will, of course, would have been perfect if the testator had stopped here: but he has written at the foot of the paper the word "witnesses:" and this is the single circumstance on the face of the paper upon which it can be argued to be an unfinished paper. It is a circumstance, however, in my judgment, in the highest degree equivocal in any case. Even a regular attestation clause, without any subscribed witness, affords but a slight presumption against the legal validity of any testamentary paper; and that presumption is infinitely slighter, and has always been so held, where the testator's intention to have it regularly attested is to be collected from the single word "witnesses" appearing at the foot of the paper. But in the present case that presumption is (nearly, if not altogether) rebutted by the following circumstances, for which the Court has not to revert to extrinsic evidence, but collects from the paper itself. In the first place, the word "witnesses" is written so near the bottom edge of the paper as hardly to leave room for witnesses to have undersigned it; and, secondly, there are these words in the margin, "The last and only will of John Goff," which I must presume to have been the words last written by the deceased as pleaded, although there is no direct proof of this. Nor is the deceased's condition, obviously an illiterate man, as [47] appears from the wording of the instrument, not to be taken into the account. Better general information, à fortiori, technical professional habits, might have founded a different inference: but nothing is, I think, more improbable than that this testator should conclude the paper in question imperfect from its not having been regularly attested, notwithstanding the species of attestation clause (if it can be so called) apparent on the face of the paper.

Upon these considerations, to which others might be added, as, especially, the pains obviously bestowed upon it, I have some difficulty in considering this an unfinished or imperfect paper on the face of it—the only circumstance which can render parol evidence against it admissible. At all events, under the circumstances, the parol evidence in this case must, I think, be confined to shewing that the deceased himself did not regard this as a dispositive instrument in its present shape; but only as a preparatory will, or one in progress merely towards actual completion.

Now what is the case set up in opposition to this paper? In the first place, it is pleaded, and witnesses have been examined to prove, that subsequent to the date of the paper, the deceased and Doker had violent quarrels, which terminated in the latter finally quitting the deceased, and returning to this country, as I have said, in March, 1822. And several declarations are also pleaded and spoken to by witnesses (exclusive of some others which I shall notice presently), that "Doker should never have a sixpence of his money," but that "the whole should go to his wife and children," or to that effect.

[48] Here, however, in the first place, the witnesses examined to these particulars speak with a warmth, and in a tone of evident exaggeration, which puts the Court on its guard against relying too implicitly upon their testimony. The conduct of the witnesses in this respect is natural, nor is it quite inexcusable. The widow, subsequent to her husband's decease, went over to Holland, and was received into the house of Mr. and Mrs. Binns (the principal witnesses to these particulars), with whom the deceased and Doker, then passing as husband and wife, had resided during the period of their joint residence in Holland. The subject of this will, and the deceased's whole conduct towards his family, was of course, and is admitted to have been, much canvassed between the widow and these parties: it was natural, consequently, that they should feel a warm wish to set it aside, as being a will made in favour of a prostitute, to the total exclusion of the deceased's lawful widow and children. There is one circumstance in particular indicative of this bias of the witnesses. They represent the deceased as professing himself at all times, after Doker's departure, a penitent husband, anxious to efface the remembrance of his former conduct to his wife by his future treatment of her: they do not say a word about the Dutch woman, Blawmn, with whom he was notoriously cohabiting, from the time of Doker's departure till his death; and who appears to have been the principal, if not the sole, cause of Doker's leaving him at all. The suppression of that fact alone would suggest to the Court the necessity of considering this part of their evidence with some grains of [49] allowance. But, after all, to what do the facts and declarations so spoken to amount? Admitting these quarrels between the deceased and Doker, to any extent—admitting the deceased to have made the declarations, and to have been sincere in making them (though not improbably he was insincere, and merely made them, supposing him to have made them, to reconcile himself to, and to ingratiate himself with, these people, the Binns's), they are both quite consistent with the deceased having considered this to be a finished will; in which case no change of intention, however probable in itself, or however probably deposed to, can have the slightest effect in defeating its validity; the deceased being admitted to have died without doing any other, or further, testamentary act. It remains also to be observed that there are facts in evidence, at variance with the statements of the witnesses upon one of these heads in many particulars. For instance, it is in evidence, in spite of the total rupture between the deceased and Doker, as they represent it, that the deceased furnished Doker with money for her expences on her return to England; that he also gave her an order to a person with whom he had deposited a bed and some bedding to deliver it up to her for her use; that immediately upon her arrival in England she took up her residence at his brother's, in compliance with the wishes of the deceased, where she continued to reside till after his death; that he made frequent inquiries respecting her welfare; and that, on one occasion (in May, 1822) he sent her a note (which is exhibited), in which he says that he "freely forgives" and promises "not to forget her."

[50] But the deceased is also pleaded by the widow to have repeatedly declared that the will in Doker's possession was good for nothing—that she, Doker, had stolen a paper from him, purporting to be a will, but that the same was not witnessed, and that she could make no use of it to deprive his wife or children of his property. If this were so, it were something—these are stringent declarations as pleaded, and come at once to the point. But the witnesses who depose to them are so inconsistent with each other, and are so flatly contradicted by the face and appearance of the paper before the Court,(a) that it is quite impossible [51] for it to place any reliance upon this part of their evidence. On the other hand, there are two persons [52] much in his confidence, examined upon Doker's allegation, who speak to direct recognition by the

(a) For instance, John Binns deposed that a day or two before Doker left Holland she produced to him, the deponent, a paper-writing, saying, "Mr. Binns, here's a will Mr. Goff has made, and if you and your wife will sign it" (meaning, according to the deponent's impression, as witnesses) "it may come into use sometime." This the deponent declined, saying, "He would not do it for all Amsterdam." The paper so produced was not read by the deponent, nor, though acquainted with the deceased's hand-writing, can he depose to its having been written by the deceased. He remembers just looking at it to see if it was signed, which it was not: of that he has no doubt: he cannot swear that there was no signature to it, but he does swear that he saw none, and that he believes that if the same had been signed he must have observed it.

Ann Binns deposed that, whilst at Rotterdam with Doker, whom she had accompanied thither just before her sailing for England, Doker, in her search for something at the inn there which she had misplaced, put her hand on a paper, which she pulled out, saying to deponent, "Here's a will of old Goff's; it is neither signed nor sealed, but it would have been good if I had been his wife; will you sign it?" On deponent's refusing, she said, "There are plenty of people in England who will, and it may be of use one day. I'll read it to you." It began, "I leave to Elizabeth Smith Wayling,* my present housekeeper, all my property," &c.

And both these witnesses, Binns and his wife, deposed that on subsequently acquainting Goff that Doker had got something of a will of his "he flew into a violent rage, and at first talked of sending a 'police man' after her, but was quieted by reflecting that it could be of no use to her from its not being signed," adding, "he had put his hand to no paper. No," said he, "Jack Goff does not do so."

A witness named Jane Ribbing deposed that, some days after Doker had left Holland, Goff told the deponent (who had previously heard him say that he had written part of a will, but would not sign it) that she, Doker, had got that paper from

* It is to be observed that, according to Binns's deposition, Doker had first passed as Mrs. Goff. After she knew her not to be Goff's wife she passed by the names of Mrs. Smith or Mrs. Wayling. Binns says she never heard of her by the name of Doker, nor knew that to be her true name till after the death of the deceased.

deceased of this instrument, as an effective will in Doker's hands. In the course of a conversation between the witness Raitt and the deceased, relative to the state of his affairs in the May preceding his death, the deceased said, "I have settled all that; I have made my will:" and on Raitt expressing some surprize at the deceased never having shewn it to him, he added, "I have it not: it is in England;" plainly alluding to the will in Doker's hands, for there is no vestige of any other. The evidence of the brother, George Goff, is even still more explicit: he speaks to having been told by the deceased, whilst on a visit to him at Rotterdam, in the September only preceding his death, that "Betsey had got his will." The words, he says, were as he, the deponent, best recollects them, "I have made a will, and Betsey has got it with her." And I see nothing to justify the Court in repudiating the evidence of this witness, confirmed as it is by facts in the cause; though it might otherwise, for reasons that need not be stated, be entitled to little credence.

Upon these considerations I hold that I am bound by law, in deference to established precedents, to pronounce this to be a valid will; and I decree probate of it as such to the executrix. And I also think that, in directing the expences of this suit to be taken out of the estate, I am bound to except those occasioned by the allegation given in on the part of the widow (which the registrar will ascertain in the best way that he is able); and which, I regret to say, must be borne by the widow.

[53] ROBSON AND WAKEFIELD v. ROCKE. (IN THE GOODS OF THOMAS CHARLES PATTLE, Deceased.) Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1824.—A will propounded—the direct evidence to the factum of that will stated and held to be sufficient, corroborated by various facts and circumstances to entitle it to probate, if not itself impugned and discredited in the strongest manner—attempts to impugn it by attacking, 1st, the character of the witness; 2d, the probability of the disposition; 3d, the genuineness of the signature, stated and held to fail—the will pronounced for, and the opposing parties condemned in costs.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a case of some weight and novelty, considered with respect to the magnitude of the property at stake, and the nature of the several proceedings in the cause—especially as viewed in connection with that (extraordinary) application which has been made to the Court at the instance of one of the parties since the cause was concluded. In order to furnish a distinct view of the case it is necessary that the Court should state the history of the deceased and his several testamentary acts—an outline of the principal proceedings in the cause—the proof adduced in support of the instrument propounded—and the grounds upon which that proof is sought to be impugned. Upon the general result will depend the propriety of the Court's proceeding at once to a sentence; or of its opening the case to farther investigation in the manner, and for the reasons, stated in that application to which it has just adverted; but of which it postpones, accordingly, a particular consideration to that of the other parts of the case.

The deceased in the cause, Thomas Charles Pattle, died at Macao, in China, on the

him, for he could not find it, but that it was of no use to her, for that it was not signed nor sealed nor witnessed. "Jack Goff," he said, "don't put his name to a paper."

And another witness, Benjaman Rolf, deposed to having been told by the deceased "that he had made no will—that he had given a woman with whom he formerly cohabited, whom he called Mrs. Smith,* a false will, being neither signed nor sealed nor delivered; which could be of no service to her; a copy of which he then shewed the deponent, who read part of it: but all that he remembers of the contents is that it purported to bequeath certain property to Elizabeth Wayling,* or a person of a name very similar to that.

It must be obvious upon this evidence that these witnesses were either deposing at random, or of some other paper, or were purposely deceived and misled either by Doker or by the deceased himself; in any of which cases, as observed by the Court, their evidence could be of no avail to defeat the instrument now propounded by Doker.

* It is to be observed that, according to Binns's deposition, Doker had first passed as Mrs. Goff. After she knew her not to be Goff's wife she passed by the names of Mrs. Smith or Mrs. Wayling. Binns says she never heard of her by the name of Doker, nor knew that to be her true name till after the death of the deceased.

26th of November, 1815; leaving a wife and one daughter, an only child. The amount of his property, which was wholly personal, is not precisely ascertained; but it may be safely estimated at 140 or 150,000l. He had been [54] many years abroad in the civil service of the East India Company; he came to England in 1802, but returned to China in 1805; attained a high station in the council of the factory of Macao; and died there, as I have said, in 1815. Upon going out to China in 1805 he left his wife and daughter in this country, where they continued to reside till his death.

Previous to this departure in 1805 the deceased made a will, which is before the Court, bearing date in April of that year. By this will he bequeathes his whole property to his wife and daughter. The deceased had also living at that time a father, two brothers, three sisters, an uncle, Mr. Haselby, who attests this will, and numerous friends; but the will of 1805 has no legacy to any one of these. It is to be observed, however, that the deceased's property at this time amounted to from between 10 to 20,000l. only.

It is in evidence that in the year 1814 the deceased had made, or said that he had made, another will, the substance of which is in some measure before the Court in Sir Theophilus Metcalf's affidavit of scripts. It will be sufficient to say of this at present that it should seem to have been a will in which his collateral relatives and friends were largely remembered; probably about one-half only of his property, which had then very much increased, being given to his wife and daughter. Letters, too, are before the Court written by the deceased in January and February, 1815; the one to Mr. Haselby, the other to his friend Mr. Becher. In the former he tells Haselby that he has given him 3000l. by his will; in the latter he tells Becher that he has "put down" Haselby for 5000l. in his will; adding that he should not object [55] to pay him interest as on that sum until his death puts him in possession of the principal.

At this time the deceased's health had began to fail. Upon his return from Canton (whither it was his duty to go up, as it is termed, at certain periods) to Macao in the beginning of the year 1815 symptoms of dropsy and water in the chest had appeared. In the summer, however, of that year, being something better, and having been recommended a sea voyage, he accompanied Captain Langford of his majesty's ship "Alpheus" to Manilla, whence he returned about the middle of August; Captain Langford kindly consenting, at some inconvenience if not loss to himself, to return at once to Macao, on the deceased becoming suddenly much worse at Manilla. During this voyage to Manilla and back the deceased was attended by the ship's surgeon, Mr. Edwards, and his assistant Mr. Allen, with the attentions of which latter he was so much pleased that on his return to Macao he prevailed on Captain Langford to give Allen his discharge. From that time till his death Allen continued much about the deceased; occasionally writing letters for him, which the deceased merely signed and so forth.

In the months of September and October preceding his death the deceased's dropsical disorder, in the whole, increased upon him; though, like most dropsical patients, he was better sometimes, and at other times worse. His usual medical attendants at Macao were Messrs. Pearson and Livingstone, gentlemen attached in that capacity to the factory; but the first of these, Mr. Pearson, accompanied the factory to Canton in September (1815) and did not return [56] thence to Macao till after the deceased's death. From September, consequently, Mr. Livingstone was his sole medical attendant.

In a letter written by Livingstone to the widow, soon after his death, accompanying a watch which the deceased had desired him, Livingstone, to forward to his wife if he did not recover, are the following expressions:—After entering into some particulars of his last illness, and stating that he suffered little subsequent to his return to Macao, until his death, on the 25th of November, "with his mind powerful, and memory perfect, to the last," except from "two severe attacks of difficulty of breathing," indicative of water on the chest, the writer thus proceeds: "After one of these, which did not give way till all the usual resources of medicine had been tried, he had seen me a good deal alarmed; he inquired whether I considered him to be in much danger; I told him frankly that another attack might destroy him in an hour; he said he was not afraid to die, but wished to have my real opinion that he might have his affairs properly arranged; this was on the 18th of October: he informed me he meant to send for Mr. Croft, a law gentleman from Bengal, &c." of course, though not so expressed, to assist him in such proposed arrangement. It is a will alleged to have been made by Mr. Croft under these circumstances, dated the 20th October, 1815, that is propounded in this cause.

The contents and form of this will are briefly these: The interest of 20,000l. is given to the deceased's father, Thomas Pattle, for life, the principal at his death to the wife of the deceased; or in the event of his father surviving her, to the daughter; [57] 20,000l. are given to his wife, and 30,000l. to his daughter, on her attaining her age of twenty-one, absolutely; 15,000l. to his brother James Pattle; 5000l. each to his three sisters, Mrs. Rocke, Mrs. Mitford, and Mrs. Lay. The residue (after payment of these and other legacies; among which are 1000l. to Mr. Livingstone; 1000l. to Mr. (originally Pearson, but altered to) Shank; 3000l. to the two Mr. Ross's, father and son; and 1000l. each to his five executors) is directed to be equally divided and distributed between the children of his brother James Pattle, and his sisters, Mrs. Rocke, and Mrs. Lay. Such, in substance, are the contents of this will. As to its form, it is written on two sheets, and occupies five sides, of large thick paper; there are several little alterations, the principal being the substitution of the name of Shank for that of Pearson, which I have already noticed, on the third side; and the interlined additional bequest, on the fifth side, of a pipe of Madeira, to each of his executors—this latter is evidently written by the writer of the will—the name of "Shank" is written in a different hand, and with different ink—the instrument is subscribed, "Thomas Charles Pattle," but there are no witnesses.(a)[1] [58] Immediately upon the death of the deceased, namely, upon the 26th of November, the day following, this instrument, such as I have described it, was found amongst the deceased's papers, in a sealed-up envelope thus indorsed, "the last will and testament of Thomas Charles Pattle, Esquire," addressed, "to Sir Theophilus James Metcalf, Bart.; George Templar, Hastings Nathaniel Middleton, William Frazer, and Charles Magnac, Esquires, executors; to be opened by either two of them that are in China at the time of my death." It is accordingly opened by two of the executors then in China, Mr. Frazer and Mr. Magnac; and they at Canton, on the day following, the 27th of November, make an affidavit before Mr. Elphinstone, the chief of the factory, as to the plight and condition of the instrument when found; with respect to those erasures and interlineations, of which I have just spoken, still apparent on the face of it.

The will, with this affidavit and envelope attached to it by a sealed tape, is immediately sent to England; and brought into this Court, where probate of it is taken by two of the executors; the one, Mr. Middleton, being sworn on the 29th of May, 1816, and the other, Mr. Templar, on the 21st of June, the month following. At first it should seem that the body of the will was supposed to have been written by the deceased: for when Mr. Allen, a friend of the deceased, acquainted with his manner and character of hand-writing attended here, on the 30th of May, 1816, as one of the two persons selected to authenticate the instru-[59]-ment in that respect (this being requisite prior to probate, as a will, of any unattested paper actually passing to the executors) he does, I make no doubt very innocently, though somewhat too precipitately, subscribe and make an affidavit that "the whole body, series, and contents of," as well as "the signature to" this will, are of the deceased's hand-writing.(a)[2]

(a)[1] To explain this circumstance of there being no witnesses, Croft had deposed that this was pursuant to his advice; he not conceiving it to be necessary, as the deceased had no real property; and as it appeared to him that having it attested might create unnecessary difficulties, there being persons in England who could easily prove the deceased's signature to it. "The possible difficulty," he says "which he, the deponent, contemplated was, that as the only persons who could be procured as witnesses were those resident in China, it might become necessary, in the event of there being a dispute respecting the will, to send out a commission to China, to examine them." He had before deposed that the only person actually present was a half-cast Chinese woman; who did not understand English.

(a)[2] On the attendance of Mr. Larken, another friend of the deceased, who, as proposed, was to join in Mr. Allen's affidavit, on the 16th of June (prior to Mr. Templar's being sworn) he discovered the mistake. His name accordingly was struck out of this affidavit, in which it was originally intended that he should join with Mr. Allen. And Mr. Larken was sworn to a separate affidavit, which went to the hand-writing of the subscription only.

And really, the body of the instrument propounded in this cause is written in a hand so similar to the subscription, in point of general character, that a person recognizing the latter by inspection, and making this sort of affidavit pretty much as a matter of form, without any circumstance whatever to excite his suspicions, or to suggest to him the necessity of any critical examination of the body of the instrument, might have fallen into this error very excusably. It is neither a circumstance of any great moment in itself: nor does it seem to have excited any doubt or suspicion among the parties interested at the time: for,

In June, 1816, the widow, on behalf of herself and daughter, filed a bill in Chancery; calling upon the executors to pay into Court the legacies due to them under this will, assumed, of course, to be valid. Accordingly, the sum of 70,000l., to which their legacies (that to the father inclusive) jointly amounted, was actually paid by the executors into that Court; [60] and the widow and daughter have, in consequence, enjoyed their share of the deceased's property bequeathed to them by this will, ever since the month of April, 1818. But in 1819, three years after, the probate is called in; and the executors are put, by these same parties, on proof of the will, per testes.

The daughter, however, though still a minor, had married a Mr. Wakefield in this interval; and he should seem, from what now appears, to have been the principal mover of this suit, to which he was party, as the guardian, and in right of his wife, from the very beginning. It is quite impossible therefore for the Court to consider him, in effect, as a mere intervener, although formally he does appear in that character; having been cited as the person upon whom her interest devolved, on the death of Mrs. Wakefield, in the progress of the suit. But it is manifest, from the whole course of the proceedings that he is, and has been, from the very beginning, the effective party opposing this will: such I am bound to consider him, and as such principally responsible for the whole conduct of this cause. He it is who instructs the proctor: he it is who collects, I might almost say instructs, the witnesses: it is on his behalf that the proctor and counsel originally retained in the cause are acting at the hearing; although Mr. Wakefield now suggests an interest separate from that of the widow, who, it should seem, had the preferable claim at least to their services; to which Mr. Wakefield indeed, in his character of intervener in the suit, could have no claim. I should say that the widow, having married again, is the party, Mrs. Robson, and that the third party, Mr. Rocke, appears as guardian of the resi-[61]-duary legatees, in the room of two of the executors in whose name it was commenced; but who have died in the course of this suit. I must here too observe that this suit has occupied nearly four years, as the first allegation, or that propounding the will, was given in in February, 1823. Where the blame of this lies I do not at present stop to inquire. I notice it, principally, in order to protest against the time which this suit has occupied being deemed the fault of this Court, or of its forms; it might have been brought to a hearing, for any thing that appears to the contrary, in one-fourth of the time, if the parties had wished it.

Having thus furnished a general outline of the case itself, and the proceedings had in it, it now becomes time to inquire whether the executors have answered the demand which has been made upon them to prove the factum of this will in a satisfactory manner—taking into consideration the time and the circumstances under which they are so called upon, and the following circumstance in particular.

Upon the first allegation, that propounding the will, being given in by the executors, they applied to the Court for a requisition to China in order to examine witnesses there upon it; which application was resisted by the parties opposing the will, on account of the expence and delay which it would occasion, in common, to both parties. To that application, so resisted, the Court, under the circumstances, refused to accede: but in refusing, it did so upon this special implied condition, namely that the case on the part of the executors should be fairly met by their opponents, and that secondary evidence, to some extent, in favour of [62] the will, should be acquiesced in, on their parts, as the executors were deprived, in all probability, of primary evidence in its favour, solely in consequence of the Court's acceding, in effect, to their own prayer. This is a circumstance not to be lost sight of; and it accounts for the evidence in favour of the will being, in some parts of it, less stringent than it otherwise probably would have been. For instance, Mr. Livingstone's evidence to the instructions, No. 2, and that of other witnesses to many not unimportant parts of the case, would probably have been had, if the widow and next of kin had made no objection to a requisition going out to China, as prayed by the executors, in the first instance.

I now proceed to the proofs furnished by the executors, under these circumstances, of the factum of this will, the only direct witness to which is the writer of it, Mr. Croft; being the "Mr. Croft, a law gentleman from Bengal," whom Mr. Livingstone had mentioned in his letter to the widow that the deceased proposed sending for, on suspecting that his illness might terminate fatally.

It seems that just about this period, or in the beginning of September, 1815, Mr. Croft, accompanied by his wife, had arrived at Macao from Calcutta, in the course of a voyage undertaken for the benefit of Mrs. Croft's health. He had become acquainted, at Calcutta, with Mr. James Pattle, the deceased's brother, and was the bearer of letters from him to the deceased, among which was a letter of introduction for himself and Mrs. Croft. The deceased was too ill to receive them into his own house, but he placed them in that of Sir Theophilus Metcalf, then at his dispo-[63]-sal, in consequence of its owner's absence from Macao, where they resided till the beginning of November.(a) During this interval Croft (the husband) often called upon the deceased, who admitted him or not according to circumstances; the length of his visits being regulated by the state of the deceased's health and spirits at the particular times when they happened to be paid.

The following is the history, as furnished by Mr. Croft in his deposition, of the making of this will:—On the evening before the will was executed he is sent for—he finds the deceased labouring under a great difficulty of breathing; apparently almost at the last gasp; but he soon recovers so far as to be able to converse—the deceased then tells him that he has sent for him in order to draw up his will—Croft answers that, not having his books with him, he will not undertake to draw it up technically and professionally; but will write it, as a friend, from his dictation—the deceased assents to this, and desires him to sit down and write accordingly. A paper is then written by Croft, from the deceased's dictation, which, having been read and approved by the deceased, is taken away by Croft, in order that he may copy it out fair for execution. In the course of the evening he receives two additional instructions,(b) which I shall presently notice; with which, and those taken as above, he proceeds to prepare the instrument in question. On the following day he carries it to the deceased, to and by whom it is read over—some corrections are made in it, at his own suggestion; and the [64] deceased finally executes the instrument, being at that time in a state of perfect capacity. When executed, the will is left in the deceased's custody, who saw Croft several times after; but made no further observations to him on the subject of it. He had quitted Macao, on his return to Calcutta, about a fortnight or three weeks, when the deceased died.

The above is a mere general outline of Croft's account; but it warrants an assertion that, in that account itself, if credible, the Court is furnished with direct proof of the factum of this instrument; or, in other words, it is furnished with direct proof that this instrument was drawn up from instructions given by the deceased, and that it was executed by him, being at the time of sound and disposing mind and memory. As to this last particular, indeed, it may be observed, once for all, that no doubt has even been suggested with respect to the deceased's perfect capacity at this period: he survived this transaction five weeks; and it is in evidence, from a host of witnesses, that he was fully capable to the last; and that his mind to the last was as much alive as it had ever been.

Such, then, is the direct positive evidence to the factum of this will. In confirmation of it we have,

1st. The finding of the instrument, as already described, immediately upon the death of the deceased in a sealed-up envelope; one of the seals used bearing, I observe, the deceased's crest and cypher. And this a fortnight or three weeks after Croft, the writer of the instrument, had quitted Macao.

2dly. There are five old and intimate friends of the deceased attesting the genuineness of the signature—persons well acquainted with his hand-writing, from

(a) Croft himself was absent about a fortnight of this time, having gone to Canton. Canton is distant about 60 miles from Macao.

[65] his correspondence, both private and official—forming that opinion and belief, not upon a hasty and casual inspection, but after doubts had been raised as to the genuineness of the signature—assigning, as their ground of opinion and belief, its perfect resemblance to the deceased's usual signature in that peculiarity of character which belongs to and distinguishes the hand-writing of most individuals. Evidence to hand-writing is, at best, inconclusive; but of that species of proof I will say that the witnesses here produced have furnished as strong and as satisfactory a sample as well could be furnished. These circumstances, in conjunction with others which will naturally disclose themselves in the progress of this inquiry, so corroborate the direct evidence in favor of this will, that unless that evidence be impugned and discredited in the strongest manner, the will itself is fully established.

The opposers of the will have endeavoured to subvert the force and effect of this evidence in several ways. But their counsel have principally argued and objected, in order to this—1st, The character of the witness, Croft, which they have represented to be such that the Court can place no reliance upon his evidence; especially none, in favor of such a will, which: 2dly, they have maintained that hardly any evidence could sustain, from the improbable mode in which it purports to dispose of the property of the deceased: 3rdly, and lastly, they have contended that, independant of all this, the pretended signature to this will is proved (as it was expressly alleged) to be a forgery, and not of the hand-writing of the deceased; which if it be proved, then of course there is an end, both of Croft's evidence, and of the whole [66] question. It is necessary therefore that the Court should examine, briefly, each of these several grounds of objection.

1. And here, in the first place, it is to be observed, in estimating the credit due to this witness, Mr. Croft, that his general character has not been put in issue: no plea has been given stating no witness has been produced to depose that he is a person not fit, from his general character, to be believed upon his oath. His moral character in a particular transaction has been attacked, through the medium of interrogatories addressed to him; and pretty successfully, as far as that transaction goes. It appears, by his answers, that he had married, in this country, a daughter of Sir Edward East, whom he accompanied to India on his being appointed Chief Justice at Bengal, in 1813. At Calcutta he entered into partnership with Mr. Cumberbach, an attorney, and continued in partnership with him till 1816. The will in question was made in 1815; up to which period, and until long after, Croft's moral character stood unimpeached; so that nothing at that time, apparently, pointed him out as a fit instrument to be selected for the commission of a gross fraud and forgery. In 1818, however, it appears that he, a married man, resident with his wife at Calcutta, seduced a young woman, only 19 or 20 years of age, the daughter of his former partner, Mr. Cumberbach—a case of seduction, it is true, attended with some circumstances of great aggravation. The father brought his action for this, and recovered heavy damages; and Mr. Croft left India and returned to Europe. Now what, or whether any, palliatives to this grossly immoral conduct on his part existed, as in the lures and temptations thrown out [67] by the young lady, or otherwise, I shall not stop to inquire: it can admit of little excuse, and of no justification. But that the Court should presume him, from this one transaction, capable of committing a gross act of fraud and forgery two years before, and of supporting it by as gross perjury two or three years after, is a proposition which I am bound to withhold my assent from both by law and reason. Mr. Wakefield's counsel have contended that the witness, Croft, is to be swept out of the case: that however is going a length to which the Court is quite unprepared to follow them, upon any such grounds as they have stated: at the same time he is certainly not a witness omni exceptione major; he is, to a certain degree, tainted. The Court therefore will resort to other criteria than his mere oath of the integrity of this whole transaction relative to the will in question; and will briefly consider what confirmation his statement respecting it derives, as well from admitted facts and probabilities in the case; as upon other considerations fairly applicable, as tests of the credit due to the account given of it by this witness in particular.

Among these other considerations a first, and not the least material, is that the deposition of this witness itself, which is long and special, carries with it strong internal marks of truth and fairness. So far as the Court is enabled to judge, it presents a candid, unreserved, undisguised relation of facts. He is called to speak to this transaction nearly five years after it had taken place; it might well be that in that interval some of the particulars had escaped his recollection altogether, and that others, once forgotten, would revive as circumstances connected with them gradually sug-[68]-gested themselves to the witness. This alone would be sufficient to account for the statement of a transaction so remote being, to some extent, erroneous and confused. The memory of this witness may, not improbably, be a treacherous one. It is also to be remembered that means have been resorted to of betraying him into inconsistencies, or contradictions, to speak the most favorably of them, a little extraordinary. He had been questioned in a very unusual manner (not to say intentionally tampered with) by the opposers of this will at the outset of the cause. The Court alludes to a letter addressed to Croft in December, 1819, by Mr. Wakefield; and conveyed to him at Marseilles, where he then resided, not by the ordinary conveyance of the post, but by a special messenger, Mr. Humphries, an attorney (who afterwards travelled with the witness from Marseilles to Paris); a letter consisting not merely of general inquiries, but making up a set of special interrogatories containing a pretty strict cross-examination of Mr. Croft relative to all the circumstances of this long by-gone transaction. Now, first, as to this mode of proceeding, it is one in my judgment very objectionable. Croft was the alleged writer of the will; a witness whom the executors must have been expected, and indeed whom they were bound, to produce. General inquiries of him as to whether he, in truth, was the writer of the will, and as to whether the deceased gave him instructions for it, and subscribed it, and was in a state of testamentary capacity at the time, might not be improper, even in the projected opposers of it; in order to determine them as to whether, and to what extent, they would persist in their projected opposition. But to require written answers to a long [69] string of interrogatories as to such a transaction, of the nature of those addressed to this witness, and before he had seen the original papers in the cause, was a course of proceeding neither very usual, I repeat, nor very proper; although the court is willing, in candour, to acquit the writer of this letter of any improper intention at that time. What however has the result been? The witness not only, apparently in the most unreserved manner, returns a full general answer by letter to that so addressed to him; but he also answers distinctly, in writing, all the queries in the several interrogatories, as far as his recollection then served him. And this letter, and these answers, are now introduced into the cause, in order to discredit the witness, as by reason of variations between them, and the deposition. After all, however, to what do those variations amount? Upon my mind, candidly and impartially considered, they produce, for reasons presently to be stated, a quite contrary effect to that for which they have been invoked into the cause.

These answers of Croft confirm as fully, in substance, the factum of this will; or, in other words, that it was written from the instructions, and that it was subscribed by the hand, of a capable testator; as the deposition: the principal variations are these: in the answers it is said—1. That the instrument was completed and signed at one sitting: 2. That the daughter had a legacy of 50,000l. and was also the residuary legatee. It seems that this statement was erroneous in both particulars; accordingly a correct statement, and consequently one varying from the above, in both particulars, was given in the deposition, of which an abstract has already been furnished.

[70] Now as to this first variation, the witness does not suppress that his impression at the time of his answering Mr. Wakefield's queries was that the instrument was completed at one sitting. He candidly admits this upon his examination in chief, and says that "he could not have deposed merely from unaided recollection that the will was not then signed; and that what he then wrote" (namely, from the deceased's dictation, as above) "became the draught of his will; for the impression upon his mind was that such had been the fact, till in the month of March last (i.e. in the month of March, 1820, for this witness was examined in the July of that year) copies of the instructions (i.e. the two additional instructions sent to the deceased in the evening of the day when the instructions, as already stated, were taken) were shewn to him by Mr. Gatty, Wakefield's solicitor, at Paris; and they refreshed and corrected the deponent's memory, so as to enable him to depose, &c." that is in brief, as already stated in the abstract of his deposition. The witness speaks to the same effect, only with greater particularity, in answer to the third interrogatory, with every appearance of fairness and candour, and which the Court sees no reason to distrust, even after all that has been urged in objection to the credit of this witness.

An explanation equally satisfactory is given of the other variation. He says, in answer to the third interrogatory, "The respondent did, in his letter to Mr. Wakefield, state the impression upon his mind to be that the legacy to the daughter was 50,000l.; which he stated, as he did every thing else, from recollection; and, by referring to the will, as he has [71] now an opportunity of doing, he sees very plainly how the misconception arose, she having an absolute bequest of 30,000l. and a contingent bequest of 20,000l. She was therefore to have eventually what he, rather erroneously, stated her (as he then believed her) to be entitled to absolutely." He admits also having stated, according to the then impression of his mind, that the daughter was the residuary legatee. The account which this witness gives of his communications with Sir Theophilus Metcalf, in answer to this same fifth interrogatory, as to the erasure of Pearson's name and the substitution of Shank's—his not attempting to account for this, &c. (not to advert to it more particularly) has every mark, to my mind, of truth and fairness.

As to Croft's mistake, indeed, with respect to the disposition of the residue, so far from impeaching the credit of his general narrative, it goes far to confirm it in my judgment. Taking this transaction to have passed in mere ordinary course, as the witness relates, there is nothing unnatural or improbable in Croft having forgotten, after an interval of four years, to whom the residue was bequeathed by this will. It was a matter of no moment or interest to him; nor is it at all surprising that it should have made no deep impression upon his memory. But on the other hypothesis, on the supposition of this being a fraud on the part of Croft, in conspiracy with some other person or persons, its main object must have been to deprive the daughter, then Miss Pattle, of the residue. And that Croft could possibly have so far forgotten the main object of the fraud, as to hold out to Wakefield that his wife was the residuary legatee at any time, is a circumstance so improbable that this very mistake [72] is a strong confirmation of the transaction having actually passed as he describes it.

Thus far, then, the attack upon the credit of this witness fails in its object. Admitting him, however, to be so shaken in credit as to require even all that corroboration which an accomplice requires, examined upon a criminal prosecution, still, in my judgment, the testimony of this witness has that corroboration. Some of the numerous corroborations which it derives, as well from the res gesta as from the testimony of other witnesses, have already been adverted to. Again, that the deceased made a will at this time, through the agency of Croft, must be admitted from Livingstone's letter to the widow. It is in evidence too, not only that soon after the making of the will such was generally reported at Macao to be the fact, but that it was mentioned specifically to Mr. Ross at the time, as that gentleman deposes, by Croft, by Livingstone, and he, Mr. Ross, thinks, by the deceased himself. Again, as to the contents of the will, the pencil instructions, No. 1, are proved to be in the deceased's hand-writing; as the instructions, No. 2, are proved to be partly in the hand-writing of the deceased and partly in that of Mr. Livingstone.(a) Accordingly, [73] the bequests and directions furnished by these instructions are embodied in this will. Both these instructions, I should say, were carried by Croft to Bengal and preserved; nor are they produced by him, as to corroborate his own evidence, now that the will is questioned, but they were delivered by him to Sir Theophilus Metcalf in the following

---

(a) These instructions Nos. 1 and 2 were as follows:—

No. 1.

"Please to add

"£1000 to A. Pearson.

"Ditto to J. Livingstone.

"All my goods and wines to be sold for the general purposes of my will, except a pipe of Madeira to each of my executors. "T. C. P."

No. 2.

"I hereby empower my present attornies George Templar and Hastings Nathaniel Middleton, esquires, to sell all my stock in the 3 per cent. consols, and East India Stock, for the general purposes of my will. "Thos. Chas. Pattle.

"19 Oct^{r}. 1815."

"My dear Sir,—Mr. Pattle wishes the above clause to be inserted in his will, because at present his attornies have no power to sell, only to receive and reinvest. —Your's truly, "John Livingstone."

year at Bengal; when inquiries were made about the substitution of Shank's name for that of Pearson; and he, Croft, should seem to have actually forgotten their existence, till copies of them were shewn to him, in 1820, by Mr. Gatty, at Paris. If there be any fraud then Livingstone must be a party to it: as also must Allen, for the name of "Shank" and the indorsement on the envelope are now proved to have been written by Allen. In short, so strongly does all this corroborate the evidence already stated, furnished by Croft, as to the immediate factum of this instrument, that the adverse parties have been constrained to meet it by setting up, in fact, a new case, almost at the hearing, which I shall advert to presently; equally unfounded, however, as that originally set up, either in proof or in probability.

2d. It has been attempted, however, to be maintained in argument, secondly, that the dispositive part [74] of this will is so highly improbable as to present a nearly insuperable obstacle to its being considered the deceased's own act. Let us see upon what foundation that argument rests, or, in other words, whether the dispositive part of this will has any thing of that "high improbability" sought to be ascribed to it.

The deceased had a wife and daughter—an only child. Towards his wife more has been said of his fondness than could be of his fidelity, for his conduct in that particular does not seem to have been quite pure. The truth and sincerity of his love for his daughter admit of no doubt: he was particularly attentive to her education; and constantly expressed himself, when speaking or writing of her, in the warmest and most affectionate terms. Now it is said that the amount of property left away from this only daughter is so improbable as to furnish, of itself, a serious obstacle to the alleged validity of this will: and, by way of heightening this improbability, the Court is reminded that the deceased had made a will, leaving to his wife and this daughter his whole property, in 1805.

Now here, in the first place, does it at all follow that, because the deceased left his wife and daughter his whole property, consisting of from 10 to 20,000l. in 1805, he should also leave them his whole property, consisting of from 140 to 150,000l. (after a ten years' separation from them) in 1815? I see little or no connexion between the two propositions, the one of which has been assumed as the so probable consequence of the other. The deceased might think in 1815, as many persons do who have acquired large fortunes abroad, that his collateral relations had, then, some [75] claim upon his bounty. He might think his daughter amply, and more safely, provided for by a part of his large property in 1815 than by a bequest of the whole. There could be no room for such considerations in 1805, when his whole property was at least ten times less in amount; and not more than sufficient to leave his wife and daughter decently and comfortably provided for; which I must presume to have always been his first object.

Again, the circumstance of there being no legacy in this will to his uncle Haselby is said by the opposers of the will to be nearly incompatible with its genuineness; the more especially as the deceased had mentioned in letters of January and February, 1815, that he had "put down" Haselby for 3 or 5000l. Now such "declarations," as they have been termed, are the slightest circumstances possible in a case like the present, either in favor of or against a will. The letters in question are dated in January and February, 1815; in the course of that year the deceased had earnestly and repeatedly pressed Haselby to come out to China, which he had declined. This might induce him to alter his mind and omit Mr. Haselby. But the very evidence produced by the opposers of the will, in order to shew the improbability of Haselby's omission, does incidentally, by a consequence of which probably they were not aware, render the general tenor of this will, as to the dispositive part of it, by no means incredible. It proves that even in 1814 the principle of the will of 1805 had been departed from; and that the deceased had given, or intended to give, considerable legacies away from his wife and daughter. Nor is it at all improbable [76] that a testator who bequeathes 3 or 5000l. to an uncle should endow his brothers, sisters, and their families, with even as liberal a portion of his testamentary bounty, as is purported to be conveyed to them by this obnoxious will.

Observations of a similar import apply to another similar argument, only with still stronger effect, inasmuch as the "declarations" upon which it is founded are of a much looser texture. The deceased, it seems, had promised Captain Langford to "do something for his son;" a promise which I admit, as insisted, that he never performed, provided this is to be taken as his will. But a circumstance of this nature is a mere feather, if placed in the scale as a counterpoise to that weight of evidence by which this instrument is authenticated. The deceased, in making this promise, might have been insincere; or he might have altered his mind; or he might have forgotten it. It was likely that there should be such a legacy in his will: but is there not being so unlikely as to assist materially in proving this or any will said to be his, to be a fabrication and a forgery? I am of opinion that it is a circumstance too trivial and remote to have any such effect whatever.

But since the opposers of this will, in their zeal to impress on the Court the improbability of the dispositive part of it, have thought fit to refer it to some testamentary dispositions of the deceased in 1814; those who defend it are surely at liberty, by way of rebutting that inference, to refer it to other testamentary dispositions of the deceased, of nearly the same date, which are before the Court, if not in strict formal proof, still, in my judgment, sufficiently in proof [77] to justify this use of them on their part. At all events, they are sufficiently in evidence for the Court to avail itself of them, in order to ascertain whether the dispositive part of the will now propounded really is so utterly improbable as its opponents would represent it. I allude to the paper marked (A) annexed to the affidavit of scripts of Sir Theophilus Metcalf.

It appears that in June, 1814, the deceased shewed Sir Theophilus Metcalf a memorandum which he had written in the blank page of an Encyclopædia consisting of sums and initials; being, as he said, an abstract of the legacies contained in a will, which he, the deceased, had then lately made. This Encyclopædia was afterwards given by the deceased to his friend Captain Ross, and the paper in question was copied in 1817, by Sir Theophilus Metcalf, from that book.(a) Among others is Mr. Haselby's legacy of 3000l. Most of the legacies correspond in amount with those in the will now propounded. Some are enlarged—the legacy, [78] for instance, to the brother, Mr. James Pattle, is enlarged from 10 to 15,000l. Probably the deceased's property had increased between April, 1814, and October, 1815. The sum of 60,000l. is put down without any initials; but as neither the father, wife, nor daughter are noticed in this abstract, this sum of 60,000l. (made 70,000l. in the will) was clearly intended for them. The disposition of the residue is not mentioned; nor was the deceased himself probably aware, even nearly, of its exact amount. It is in evidence that, only very shortly before his death, he was under great uneasiness as to a considerable sum due to him from a person named Beale, who subsequently became a bankrupt; though not, I think it appears, until after the deceased had obtained payment of his debt. It might be very difficult, under these circumstances, for the deceased himself to calculate what the residue of his property at any given time would actually nett to those persons selected for his residuary legatees.

Now it should seem upon the general result that the legacies minuted in this abstract amount to about 114,000l., of which only 60,000l. seem to have been intended by the deceased for his father, wife, and daughter: being nearly in the same proportion to what then, probably, was his whole property, as the bequests to them under this will bear to his whole property at the time of his death. If then to conjectures upon loose probabilities as to the dispositive part of this will this abstract, made by the deceased himself, of the will of 1814, may be opposed with any sort of propriety, the whole inference, slight as it is, arising from the asserted improbability of the dispositive part of it, stands completely refuted. I term it a slight inference, and upon

---

(a) The script, paper (A), was the copy so made by Sir Theophilus Metcalf of these sums and initials; over against which were placed the names of the persons to whom he conceived the initials to allude in the following manner:—

"10,000l. J. P.—His brother, James Pattle.
5,000l. S. R.—His sister, Mrs. Rocke.
5,000l. E. M.—His sister, Mrs. Mitford, &c."

Sir Theophilus Metcalf had sworn that, "Being well acquainted with the family and friends of the deceased, he was enabled, as well from a perusal of the said memoranda, as from the explanation which the deceased himself had given to him of the meaning of the same, to ascertain all the persons to whom the several initials applied." At the head of this paper was the sum of 60,000l. without any initials: opposite to which was written by Sir Theophilus Metcalf, "This sum, I conceive, was meant for his wife and daughter."

general principles, for this reason. All presump-[79]-tions, either for or against an alleged will, arising from the particular disposition which it purports to make of the deceased's property, are but vague and loose at the very best; inasmuch as the varieties of human opinion, as to what is or is not a fit disposition of property by will, are almost infinite.

3. I proceed, thirdly, to the evidence in proof of the direct charge of the signature to this instrument being a forgery.

This Court has often had occasion to observe that evidence to hand-writing is at best, in its own nature, very inconclusive; affirmative from the exactness with which hand-writing may be imitated; and negative from the dissimilarity which is often discoverable in the hand-writing of the same person, under different circumstances. Without knowing very precisely the state and condition of the writer at the time; and exercising a very discriminating judgment upon these; persons deposing, especially to a mere signature not being that of such or such a person, from its dissimilarity, howsoever ascertained or supposed to be, to his usual hand-writing, are so likely to err, that negative evidence to a mere subscription or signature can seldom, if ever, under ordinary circumstances, avail in proof against the final authenticity of the instrument to which that subscription or signature is attached. But such evidence is peculiarly fallacious where the dissimilarity relied upon is not that of general character, but merely particular letters; for the slightest peculiarities of circumstance or position —as, for instance, the writer sitting up or reclining, or the paper being placed upon a harder or softer substance, or on a plane more or less inclined—nay, the materials, [80] as pen, ink, &c. being different at different times—are amply sufficient to account for the same letters being made variously at the different times by the same individual. Independant, however, of any thing of this sort, few individuals, it is apprehended, write so uniformly that dissimilar formations of particular letters are grounds for concluding them not to have been made by the same person. Of the deceased, at least, the hand-writing was not so uniform as to render such dissimilarity a test (and it is the one principally relied on) safely applicable to the proof of this signature being a forgery. The Court has before it thirty letters written by the deceased, when in perfect health, and even finely written. The body in a small, fine, rapid hand; the signatures larger, but still in a masterly hand. Yet in the formations of the particular letters, especially those composing the signatures (nay, in the signatures themselves), nearly every sort of variety occurs. Sometimes the deceased signs "Tho^{s}. Cha^{s}." sometimes "T. C." only. And the particular letters, especially the initials "T. C. P.," are as various as can well be conceived in their particular formations. Subject to these preliminary observations, I address myself to the direct proof of this signature being a forgery—only further premising that if Courts, from their experience, have always been in the habit of expressing suspicions of the nature which I have described as to evidence upon hand-writing generally, there never was a case tending to justify and confirm those suspicions more strongly than the present.

The best, usually perhaps the only proper, evidence of hand-writing is that of persons who have acquired [81] a previous knowledge of the party's hand-writing from seeing him write, and who form their opinion from the general character and manner of this, and not from criticising particular letters. Of this class of witnesses only three are produced to prove this signature a forgery, namely, Lord Torrington, Mr. Drummond, and Mr. Baring.

The first of these, Lord Torrington, had not seen the deceased subsequent to 1810 or 1811; and what does he say? "He cannot depose that he believes the signature not to be of the hand-writing of the deceased." He admits, however, having been told by Major Robson that "very great doubts existed as to whether the signature were not a forgery;" and yet, deposing under the prejudice which these suggested doubts would naturally give rise to, "he will not venture to say that he believes the signature not to be that of the deceased in the cause:" there is such a "similarity of character," he cannot depose that "he believes the signature not to be his." It has been truly, I think, insisted that this is evidence rather favorable than adverse to the genuineness of this subscription.

Nor is the evidence of Mr. Drummond, the second witness, in its general effect, very dissimilar: for he cannot take upon himself to depose that he does not believe the signature to be the hand-writing of the deceased: "he can only depose," for reasons stated, "that he has doubts:" he admits that the signature, "at first view, does appear in his judgment to have the character of the deceased's subscription." What then are the reasons upon which this deponent rests his doubts? I should first however premise that [82] Mr. Drummond had not seen the deceased write after 1807; and that he too had been told, like the first witness (namely by Mr. Wakefield), that the signature in question was believed to be a forgery.

According, then, to his recollection, the final "ss" of the Christian names "Thoˢ." and "Chaˢ." were usually made by the deceased without any curve inwards at the foot; and the capital P, in the surname Pattle, in one connected flourish, i.e. with a double loop at the bottom. The signature differing from the deceased's usual signature (according to his recollection) in the particulars is the ground upon which this witness's doubts are founded.

Now here, in the first place, as to the capital P, I have already observed, speaking of his letters, that the deceased made his capitals in a variety of different ways. But will it be believed that of his signatures to three exhibits annexed to the very allegation upon which the witness is deposing, the P in Pattle is made in no one instance in the mode suggested by this witness, as the usual mode; but that they are all in the same form as in the signature to the will? As to the final "ss," the deceased being manifestly a rapid writer, made his "ss" more frequently by a mere dash of his pen, without curving inwards at the foot, though there are many instances to the contrary in most of the exhibits. Nay, here again, in the very first of the three exhibits annexed to this allegation, the final "s" in the "Thoˢ." is written in the one of these modes; and in the "Chaˢ." it is written in the other. So extremely fallacious are the criteria sought to be relied upon. I will only further observe on this head, that of the two allegations given by the [83] opposers of this will, there being three exhibits annexed to the first and two to the second, the signatures to the three former are as dissimilar to those to the two latter exhibits as can well be imagined. The three former are signed "Thoˢ. Chaˢ. Pattle," in a beautiful hand—the two latter are signed T. C. Pattle only; and this hardly legibly. The deceased then was obviously not so uniform a writer that observations of this sort can be much depended upon.

The third witness, Mr. Baring, is more positive—he does venture an opinion to this signature being a forgery: he participates in the scepticism, and to some degree in the confidence, of those witnesses who, from their skill in hand-writing alone (as I shall presently observe), arrive unanimously at the same conclusion. Indeed, it may be well questioned whether Mr. Baring does not more properly belong to this latter class of witnesses than to the one in which I am considering him. He is evidently a witness who plumes himself as a judge of hand-writing generally—of the deceased's hand-writing in particular he has had little knowledge, nor had he seen the deceased write subsequent to 1801. At best, however, his knowledge of the deceased's particular hand-writing was slender and remote—his prejudices against the signature were recent and probably strong: for he admits that Mr. Wakefield had, previous to his examination, affirmed to him, "that the will would be found a forgery." Now what are the reasons by which Mr. Baring fortifies his belief as to this signature being what it was so asserted?

His first reason is that the signature is not in the same hand-writing as the address on the envelope. So [84] far he happens to be right: but who ever said that the address on the envelope was written by the deceased? Not the propounders of this will at any time; though the opposers at one time did, namely, just so long as suited their own purpose. The indorsement on the envelope is now admitted on all hands to have been written by Allen. Meantime, of the professional gentlemen, if I may so term them, deposing to hand-writing, of whom I shall say more presently, there are several who depose that the signature is in the same hand-writing as the address. So that we have this curious feature in the case. Mr. Baring who deposes to his belief of this signature being a forgery, under an impression that the address on the envelope was written by the deceased, assigns, as one of his reasons for that belief, the "signature" being in a different character from the "address." Other witnesses again, who depose to the same belief under a conviction that the address on the envelope was not written by the deceased, assign as one of their reasons for that belief the "signature" and "address" being written in one and the same character.

His second reason is that "the top of the T in Thomas is of a greater length than the deceased was accustomed to make, or ever made it in the days of his best writing." It might be sufficient to say that this "T" does not purport to have been made "in the days of his best writing." The deceased was in bed, and sick and feeble; which might well of itself account for this "T" differing from those which he made "in the days of his best writing." Thus it should seem that the reason were frivolous though the fact were true. But there is some reason to believe that the witness is [85] mistaken in his premises, as well as erroneous in his conclusion. The objection is that the flourish at the top of the "T" in "Thomas" is too long: it extends however only to the first small "t" in the surname of Pattle. Now, in the signature to the very first exhibit annexed to the opposer's allegation, the flourish is longer, actually extending two letters beyond, that is, to the "l" in "Pattle," instead of merely to the first "t."

The next reason is that this same "flourish" is too firm to be consistent with the tremulous appearance of the remainder of the signature. This is surely too weak a reason for serious discussion; not to mention that, in his opinion of the "tremulous character," at least of the whole of the remainder of the signature, this witness is not outborne by those other witnesses, who speak as professors on this subject, and regard it in a scientific light. But independent of this, parts of a signature so made might well be more tremulous and others less so, according as the deceased, sitting up in bed, shifted from a more to a less convenient posture, or vice versa; or even according as, remaining in the same position, he bestowed more or less pains on the different component parts of it.

This witness's next reason is that some of the letters in "Thoˢ." are painted or touched up. This is the old objection of which, as a general objection, I shall say more presently. Meantime, if the fact were so, it proves nothing—for the deceased was not in that state of extreme bodily debility as to be incapable of retouching some of the letters if not sufficiently clear, as struck off in the first instance.

[86] Mr. Baring's last reason is that the signature bears a strong resemblance in point of hand-writing to the body of the instrument, particularly the letter "s" in "Thoˢ." Now admitting this similarity, it proves nothing; the deceased's hand-writing certainly has something, as already observed, of similarity to Mr. Croft's. But when this witness puts in the similitude of a single letter, the letter "s," this last reason really becomes unworthy of grave judicial remark.

Of the evidence to hand-writing, thus far, this then is the general account. Three witnesses are produced to prove this signature a forgery, no one of whom was intimately acquainted with the hand-writing of the deceased, or had seen him write for a number of years. Two of the three have doubts, but concur in the general similarity of this to the deceased's admitted signatures; the third disbelieves, but assigns reasons for that disbelief, in no degree valid in my judgment to justify and sustain it. On the other hand, there are five witnesses of as high respectability, deposing from an intimate, and much more recent, intercourse and acquaintance with the deceased and his subscriptions (and this, too, after doubts had been suggested of its genuineness) to this being his actual signature; and so deposing from similarity, not of particular letters, but of general character; ordinarily the only safe criterion upon which to form an opinion upon such a subject. It would surely be waste of time to attempt to sum up this evidence on both sides in order to strike a balance.

But the opposers of the will have obtruded on the notice of the Court evidence (if it should be so called) [87] to this part of the case of a somewhat different species. I mean the opinions of persons who, without any previous knowledge of a party's hand-writing, think they can judge, from their skill and experience in such matters, whether a signature, for instance, said to be his, be so or not, by comparing it with other, his admitted, signatures; and who also undertake by certain indications to determine, from the general appearance of hand-writing, whether it be written in a natural or an imitated character. This species of evidence has been constantly held, both subdivisions of it, the lowest and weakest that can possibly be offered. The first subdivision indeed, or evidence to hand-writing that rests upon mere comparison, is inadmissible at common law: if indeed the observation does not rather apply to this branch of evidence, in both its subdivisions, under the authority of the case of Gurney v. Longlands (5 B. & Ald. 130), the last case in which any question respecting it has occurred at common law that I am aware of. Inclining strongly to this view of the subject, the Court, so far as regards the present case, might say at once that the effect of this evidence, be it what it may, would fail to bring the scale as to proof of hand-writing even to an equal balance; much more would fail to turn it, and convict this instrument of fabrication and forgery.

But the evidence of this species actually adduced in the present cause suggests some considerations into which the Court may, not unusefully, enter, as applicable to this subject generally.

Here are seven witnesses of this class examined in the present case—five of the seven being persons in [88] official situations (three in the post-office and two in the bank): added to these are an engraver and a law stationer. Now to what, taken in its general result, does their evidence amount?

In sustaining the case which they are produced to, namely, that this signature is a forgery, these gentlemen all agree. At that end in common they all arrive. But, though they agree in their conclusions, they differ so widely in their premises—the reasons, comparatively few, which they assign in common, are so vague and unsatisfactory—in many not unimportant particulars they so flatly contradict each other—and in others, most, if not all of them, in turn, are so flatly contradicted by admitted facts in the cause—that their evidence, taken as a whole, fails to induce any suspicion even upon my mind of this instrument being, what they so confidently pronounce it, a forgery. For instance, as to the vague and inconclusive character of most of their common reasons, the circumstances, I observe, which they nearly all assign as their reasons for deeming this signature to be written in a feigned and not in a natural hand, may be amply accounted for by the deceased's state and condition at the time of this instrument being signed. One common reason is the old objection, as I again term it, of "painting:" (a)[1] [89] there can scarcely be a less certain criterion. Many persons have a trick, or knack, or habit, of retouching their letters; it was that, well known to his contemporaries, of a late eminent advocate in this Court; (a)[2] most of whose notes and opinions might be easily convicted of being forgeries, according to this criterion. It may happen to any person, not in the habit of it, to pass over his letters a second time, from a failure of ink in the pen that traced them in the first instance. In short, this circumstance of painting is, itself, extremely trivial. Again, as to contradicting each other, some of these witnesses are confident that certain letters, exhibited by the opposers of the will, are not of the hand-writing of the deceased—others are as confident that they are of his hand-writing. Lastly, as to the contradiction which certain of the witnesses experience from admitted facts in the cause, there are several of them pretty confident that the body of the will, the subscription to it, the pencil instructions, and the indorsement on the envelope, were all written by one and the same individual, namely, Croft. The weight of evidence so preponderates as to justify me in terming it an admitted fact in the cause that they are the hand-writing (to say nothing of the signature) of three different persons, viz. of the deceased, Croft, and Allen. Nay, the indorsement is now suggested by Wakefield himself to have been written by Allen; and affidavits, filed on his part, are actually before the Court, in which that fact is distinctly sworn to.(b) Witnesses so deposing, to say the least, are completely neutralized; and it may be sufficient, [90] so far as respects the present case, to dismiss their evidence with that single remark. But, as with reference to general practice, I earnestly recommend that no attempts should be made to obtrude such evidence on the Court in any future case. It occasions considerable certain expence; that any benefit should result from it is most unlikely; but that any considerable benefit should, may be safely pronounced nearly impossible. In aid of a good case it is wholly superfluous, as the Court deemed it, for instance, in the case of Saph v. Atkinson (see ante, vol. i. pp. 212, et seq.), where it is to be recollected that the Court had made up its mind to pronounce against the will before it adverted to the direct evidence adduced in proof of the signature to it being a forgery at all. That in support of a bad cause it is, at best, merely unavailing, this very case may serve to shew. Meantime these professors ordinarily, as in this instance, speak their opinions with a confidence which renders the admission of their testimony in such cases even highly mischievous; from its probable tendency to mislead, not indeed the Court, but its suitors, to the almost unavoidable creation of expence, and delay, and inconvenience to both parties. If it should be asked, of what use, then, is the art which these gentlemen profess, if it can never be depended upon? In what cases may it be fairly invoked, and to what objects safely applied? I answer: its legitimate use I take to be this—it may be reasonably resorted to by parties whom a suspicious or suspected instrument purports to deprive of a legal benefit, for their own private information, in [91] the first instance; it may be safely relied on to the extent of suggesting the propriety, on their parts, of caution, doubt, and inquiry. But whether evidence to hand-writing of this species can ever be of much, if of any, avail, under circumstances not very extraordinary, when the authenticity of the instrument comes to be finally determined upon by the competent forum (a matter which must depend upon almost infinite, more stringent, considerations) is what, for reasons sufficiently apparent, I much incline to doubt. Still, with all this, this Court, which is subordinate to a higher tribunal, may not feel itself warranted in altogether rejecting such evidence, if tendered to, and pressed upon it, against the uniform course of, at least, its modern practice. But this Court would not regret having the sanction of the superior tribunal, the Court of Delegates, either to reject such evidence altogether, or at least to confine its admission to those (perhaps nearly unsupposable) cases of such high doubt and nicety that a mere feather weight would give a preponderancy to the evidence for or against the instrument; when it might be resorted to, after publication, by direction of the Court itself, for its own information; which I incline to think was actually the old mode of introducing such evidence into these causes.(a)

(a)[1] To assist the Court in detecting this, a glass of high powers, said to have been used by these gentlemen in order to its detection, was offered to the Court at the hearing. This offer the Court peremptorily declined—observing, in substance—that glasses of high powers, however fitly applied to the inspection of natural subjects, rather tended to distort and misrepresent, than to place such objects in their true light—especially when used (their ordinary application in the hands of prejudiced persons) to confirm some theory or preconceived opinion.

[92] It only remains to observe that the case set up by the opposers of this will, which I have thus gone through in detail, and which I think in no degree effectual to defeat the claim of this will to probate, had all along to contend with one nearly insuperable obstacle, à priori; for it ventured to charge a direct fabrication and forgery in the absence of that which could alone render them at all probable. An instrument is not forged without some inducement; nor can there be a conspiracy without conspirators. Now what, even as suggested, was the inducement, and who were the conspirators in this case are, up to this instant, to the Court at least, profound secrets. Not only no proof is offered, but it is not even suggested in plea, in concert with whom this asserted fraud and forgery on the part of Croft were perpetrated. As to the fabrication of this will by Croft, ex mero motu, and not [93] in concert with anybody —the very supposition of it is absurd—for it neither conveys, nor purports to convey, any benefit whatever to Mr. Croft, either directly or indirectly. The parties principally benefited under this will, the brothers and sisters of the deceased, and their families, were thousands of miles off, in this country. The brother James, to be sure, was at Calcutta; from which place Croft had then recently sailed to Macao. Was he the conspirator? Was it in concert with him that this gross fraud was schemed and executed by Croft? Impossible! How were opportunities for the practice of this

(a) Machin and Tyndall v. Grindon and Others. Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 3rd December, 1756.

A codicil bearing date in 1755 was propounded and pleaded to be all written by the deceased. The adverse party pleaded on the contrary that it was not his hand-writing, and pleaded, in supply of proof, several receipts dated in 1752, which were alleged to be the deceased's hand-writing, and to differ from the codicil both in the character and manner of spelling.

Dr. Simpson objected to these exhibits, as having been written three years before the codicil, in which time a man's hand-writing might greatly vary, and therefore as no evidence to prove the codicil not to be the deceased's hand-writing.

But I was of opinion that they are a species of evidence that might induce a probability for or against the codicil; and that such exhibits have always been received as evidence, and therefore I admitted them.

It should seem from the above case (which is copied from Sir George Lee's "manuscript book," by favor of Dr. Phillimore. See 1 Phill. p. 166) that the present practice is one of some standing. See further on this head, generally, the case of Beaumont v. Perkins, 1 Phill. 78, and the cases of Reilly v. Rivett, and Heath v. Watts, as stated in the notes on that case.

fraud to be anticipated when Croft left Calcutta? For instance, how could it be foreseen that Croft, on arriving at Macao, would find the deceased in a dying condition, and bent upon revoking a recent will, in order to make a new one, through his instrumentality? Croft was a perfect stranger to the deceased, nor indeed on terms, it should seem, of particular intimacy with his brother, James Pattle—not even, I observe, his attorney.

An hypothesis, set up by the counsel for Mr. Wakefield at the hearing, is equally unsubstantial with that which would represent this forgery as a concerted scheme between Croft and Mr. James Pattle. It is, that a will was actually made for the deceased by Croft in the manner which he has deposed—only—that this is not that will: in other words, that the will so made has been subducted; and that this is a supposititious will that has been substituted in its room. Now, here again, as to who were the privies to this fraud, and what were the inducements, the Court is left in the dark—nor is the suggestion (for it is merely such) to which I am adverting borne out by any one fact in [94] the case with which I am acquainted. On the contrary, facts are in evidence that, in conjunction with what appears on the face of the instrument itself, render this hypothesis hardly capable, as it is wholly unworthy, of a serious refutation.

For instance, this envelope was addressed to the executors (it is now admitted on all hands) by Allen, being the person who substituted the name of Shank for that of Pearson on the third side of the will. This last is proved by the opposer's own witness, Captain Langford (confirmed by Ross), who deposes not only to the address on the envelope, but to the name of "Shank," over the erased named of Pearson, being in Allen's hand-writing. Now, of what plausible explanation is this circumstance capable, on the hypothesis of this being a supposititious instrument, substituted for the genuine will? On the contrary, admit it to be the genuine one, as deposed by Croft, and the circumstance almost explains itself. Croft leaves the will, when executed, with the deceased—he hears and knows no more about it. The deceased, though in full possession of his mental faculties, is ill, and peevish, and fretful—he is worried about money concerns—Pearson has gone with the factory to Canton, and has never once, as he complains, come down to see him. Is it any thing unlikely that the deceased, in this mood, should strike out his name, and substitute another's, before directing this will to be sealed up? Now, if this resolution was adopted within the last fortnight or three weeks of his life, Croft could not be the agent; for he had left Macao and returned to Calcutta. The deceased, however, had still two persons about him, whom he occasionally employed, [95] as he himself told one of the witnesses, as "secretaries," Livingstone and Allen. Livingstone, of the two, was least constantly about him, except as a mere medical attendant—nor was it probable that he should be selected, by preference, to strike out a legacy to his friend and partner, Pearson. Allen was the very person of all others whom the deceased would naturally employ, not only to address his will when sealed up, but to alter this legacy: accordingly it is in the hand-writing of Allen that not merely the address on the envelope, but the name of Shank, substituted for that of Pearson, is proved to be. How strongly this corroborates the whole transaction, as well as how inconsistent it is with the hypothesis now set up, is too obvious for comment.

If the case rested here it would only remain that the Court should pronounce this instrument amply proved. But an application made to the Court just previous to the hearing, and still persisted in, is first to be disposed of; being an application "to rescind the conclusion of the cause, in order," it is said, "to let in fresh evidence." But that application, in substance, comes to this: the parties who oppose this will, finding or fearing that they have failed to sustain their original case, crave leave to abandon it, and to set up a new case altogether.

Now this sort of application is one that, obviously, the Court can seldom be expected to accede to—admitting it, as it does, to be not impossible for parties to suggest a new case, even in this stage of a cause, which the Court safely might, and for the sake of justice would, admit to proof. In the present instance it might be sufficient to say that the Court is too [96] satisfied of the claim of this will to probate, as the genuine and last will of the testator, for its conviction to be shaken by the case which is now attempted to be made on the part of Mr. Wakefield, the person in whose sole behalf this application is made—and that no evidence of which that case is capable would induce it to come to a different conclusion, or to pronounce against the force and effect of the will which has been propounded, and, in my judgment, has been proved in this cause. In this view of the subject, it might be sufficient for the Court to proceed at once to its sentence—the more especially as Mr. Wakefield's counsel, with due delicacy towards the Court, as well as with great judgment towards their client, have kept this part of his case in the back ground as much as possible. But as mysteries are always best avoided, and as those decisions, correct in themselves, are always most satisfactory, of which the reasons are also given, I shall state very briefly what the suggestions are upon which this application is founded: in order to obviate any possible misconception of the grounds upon which I hold myself bound to reject it.

The suggestion then is, that the deceased made a will subsequent to this, namely, on the 28th of October, of a different tenor and effect—in which case, to be sure, there is an end of the will propounded in this cause, whether it be genuine or a forgery—and that on the same 28th of October he caused a letter to be written to Mr. Templar, one of his executors, which he signed—adding at the foot of that letter a memorandum, which he also signed, containing the substance of this will—which letter, however, was never forwarded to Mr. Templar. The bequests of this sug-[97]-gested will are as follows:—2000l. per annum to the widow, during widowhood; to be reduced to 1000l. per annum in case of her marrying again; and a specific legacy of 50,000l., together with the residue, to the daughter; after payment of certain other specific legacies to friends and relations, amounting probably, in the whole, to 16 or 18,000l. Hence it appears that under this will Mr. Wakefield, who sets it up, would be entitled at least to 100,000l.

Now the will itself is suggested to have been fraudulently destroyed; so as not to be producible in any event: but that is not all. The letter to Mr. Templar, with this memorandum at the foot of it, is also suggested to have been recently lost (a) by Mr. Wake-[98]-field, out of his pocket, just on the eve of its being deposited in the registry of this Court (though not till after it had been shewn to divers persons, and copies of it had been taken); so that this "letter" is forthcoming no more than the original will. The body of this letter, I should say, is suggested to be in the hand-writing of Allen, who died, some years back, at Manilla.

Now here, in the first place, it is not immaterial to consider how far the utmost proof of which this suggested case is capable would really advance Mr. Wakefield's object—only premising that of any particulars relative either to the making or the destruction of the will itself, nothing is suggested. Who wrote it? who attested it? who destroyed it? who substituted the forged will? what were their motives, or what their inducements? nothing as to all this is even suggested. The Court has a mere suggestion, upon hearsay, that such a will was made and was destroyed.

Of what proof then is this letter capable, even if recovered and produced before

---

(a) Of the paper so suggested to have been lost by Mr. Wakefield, the following is a copy:—

". . . gives me hopes, though I am in a very weak state, and sometimes fear the worst. You will, I hope, receive a duplicate of my will soon after this—but, if not, pray take great care of this. God bless you, my dear friend, and believe me ever,—Your sincere and attached friend, "THO^{s}. CHA^{s}. PATTLE."

"Substance of my will.

"Thomas Pattle, my father, 500l. a-year for life. At his death the principal to become part of the residue of my property. James Pattle, William Pattle, Sarah Rocke, and Eliza Mitford, 1000l. each, &c. &c."

(At the foot.)

"Read and approved by me, and signed to make it valid, in case of any accident to my will at Macao, the 28th of October, 1815. "THO^{s}. CHA^{s}. PATTLE.

"J. W. Croft."

In support of the motion to rescind the conclusion of the cause a variety of affidavits were tendered from persons to whom the paper had been shewn, as to the body of this paper being in the hand-writing of Allen. There were also affidavits made by Mr. Joseph Hume, and one or two others, to their belief (speaking from a comparison of hand-writing), of the signatures "Tho^{s}. Cha^{s}. Pattle" and "J. W. Croft" being genuine. In several of the former affidavits the indorsement on the envelope of the will was also sworn to be in the hand-writing of Allen.

the Court? It can merely, as the case is laid, consist of evidence to the hand-writing of Allen, and to the deceased's subscription; the rule of this Court being that evidence to hand-writing only is incapable of substantiating any disputed instrument as a will. But the Court is promised no such evidence; for the paper is lost—or if [99] such evidence, it must be all ex parte; there can be no counter evidence. I am also to recollect that, in the event of a copy of this letter being propounded, the parties who propound it are subject, in no case, to an indictment for forgery; they are not acting, consequently, under that responsibility. It is true that the name of Croft, as a sort of attesting witness, is suggested to have appeared upon this paper. But were Croft himself produced to its genuineness, and in support of the case now set up, he would be discredited, in toto, by the evidence that he has already given in this cause. The obvious presumption would be, that he had been corrupted and bought over.

Now, under these circumstances, even if some plausible and unsuspicious account of the finding of this letter could be suggested—giving a probable history of where it was first discovered—in whose hands and keeping it had been for the last eight years, and so on—still the letter itself, à fortiori a copy of it, is capable of no proof which would justify the Court in pronouncing for it as containing, in substance, the deceased's will. But the suggested history of the "finding" of this letter is neither plausible nor unsuspicious: on the contrary, it is most extraordinary in itself; and pregnant with suspicion on the very face of it. It is this—

Eight years after the death of the testator, and four from the commencement of the present suit, some anonymous person writes to Major Robson, who had married the deceased's widow, relative to certain testamentary papers of the deceased, asserted to be under his control, or in his possession. Not receiving, in answer, a satisfactory communication from [100] Major Robson, he addresses Mr. Wakefield, through the two-penny post, in the month of June last (1823), on the same subject. He continues to write Mr. Wakefield anonymous letters, but will give no address; and will receive no answer, but through certain mysterious advertisements in a newspaper. He offers him, in these, 10,000l. not to bring this suit to an issue—an offer which he repeats at Paris, though why, at either time, is not suggested. The correspondence is thus carried on for some time—but this mysterious person will consent to no interview (or, as Mr. Wakefield expresses it in his affidavit, "will venture upon no disclosure of facts") in England—he will only consent to an interview at Paris. To Paris Mr. Wakefield goes, accompanied by his brother and a solicitor; where, at length, the parties meet; and where this paper, the "letter," is finally delivered to Mr. Wakefield by his late anonymous correspondent, after a solemn promise and written engagement entered into on his part "neither to disclose his name, nor to give any information which may lead to its disclosure, under any circumstances;" previous to, and without which, he had refused to consent to any interview, or to make any disclosure connected with the subject, even at Paris. And this is the suggested history of the "finding," if it may be so termed, of this instrument. I should add, indeed, that this mysterious person is suggested to have disclosed, at this interview, that a letter, similar to the one then delivered to Mr. Wakefield, was in the possession of one Smith, formerly a seaman on board the "Alpheus," but then (and still) absent in the West Indies, as quartermaster, on board of his majesty's ship the "Ganges:" [101] but how it came into Smith's possession, or why he has kept it back for the last eight years, &c. &c. is neither explained, nor attempted to be.

In my judgment a plea setting up such a case as this would have been inadmissible at the very commencement of the cause. But to open the cause, in this stage of it, after the publication of the evidence, upon such grounds, is really quite out of the question. The suggestions contained in these affidavits, taken in themselves (for the Court has not even seen the affidavits filed by Major Robson in reply), howsoever sustained, are incapable of leading to any other conclusion than that at which the Court has arrived upon the evidence: and the Court must, therefore, at once, pronounce in favor of the will propounded in this cause.

The only remaining consideration is that of costs. The parties calling in the probate were neither barred by any lapse of time, nor even by their having acted, and received their legacies, under the will: they had still a right to call for proof of it per testes, if they suspected it not to be genuine. Here, however, their right stops—and they are clearly subject to the costs occasioned by their having pleaded this instrument to be a fabrication and a forgery, having produced slight, if any, grounds to justify such a proceeding. Upon this principle, and in further consideration that, although in possession of their own legacies, they have now for upwards of eight years intercepted the stream of the deceased's testamentary bounty to his other legatees, the Court is of opinion that it is bound, in justice, to give costs from the time when the parties who oppose this will gave an allegation.

[102] DEW v. CLARK AND CLARK. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, Extra Day, 23rd Feb., 1824.—In a rejoinder to or upon a responsive allegation, the only facts strictly pleadable are those either contradictory to, or explanatory of, facts pleaded in the allegation to or upon which it rejoins; and those noviter preventa to the proponent's knowledge; though the court may, in its discretion, permit facts to be pleaded which came under none of those descriptions, under certain circumstances.

[See further, 3 Add. 79.]

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased in this cause, Ely Stot, died in the month of November, 1821. He left a will, which was propounded in a common condidit, in Trinity Term, 1822, by Mr. Thomas and Mr. Valentine Clark (two nephews of the deceased, as being the children of a deceased sister), his two residuary legatees; and a counter allegation on the part of Mrs. Dew, his only child, was given in, and was admitted on the same day.(a)[1] A second allegation on the part of the residuary legatees was filed in June, 1823; and the present question respects the admissibility of a plea, tendered on the part of the next of kin, responsive to this second allegation of the residuary legatees.

The case originally set up in opposition to the will, on the part of Mrs. Dew, was principally one of partial insanity. Her allegation charged that the deceased, from her earliest infancy, had taken an aversion to her, his only child, founded purely on mental illusion; and that the will in question sought to be impeached was the immediate and direct offspring of that insane and irrational antipathy, and not of a [103] sound and disposing mind and memory. At the same time, it distinctly charged upon the deceased something of general insanity, or insanity unconnected with such aversion towards his daughter, especially betraying itself upon religious matters and concerns.

The counter plea to this, on the part of the Mr. Clarks, was long and special, consisting of thirty-one articles, accompanied with several annexed exhibits. Its objects, briefly stated, were two: 1st, to establish the deceased's general capacity; and, 2dly, to shew that his treatment of his daughter in particular, if harsh or severe, was still not insane or irrational: for that it was justified or excused by misconduct on her part, into some circumstances of which it entered with, at least, no too great apparent feeling or delicacy, as at this time; though the ultimate propriety of this course of proceeding, or the contrary, must obviously much depend on the proofs to be made in the cause.

The allegation now tendered to the Court, in part, consists of facts contradictory or explanatory of those set up in that last mentioned, to which it responds. Such facts are, I think, entitled to be pleaded: so also are those facts material to the question at issue, if any, noviter preventa, to the proponent's knowledge: but so are not any other facts whatsoever, at least as of strict right. At the same time, if any facts are here pleaded which, though coming strictly under none of these descriptions, yet still are both important in themselves, and bear directly upon the will, the subject-matter of the suit, the Court will be disposed, in the exercise of its discretion, to admit them in the present instance for the two following [104] reasons:—In the first place, it will be extremely unwilling to exclude any facts really bearing upon the case of an only child, so nearly disinherited, and so attacked, in point of character, merely from their not having been pleaded at precisely the requisite time, according to strict form. 2dly. The Court will be justified to itself in conceding this indulgence by what has been stated to it as to the particular course of the prior proceedings; (a)[2] a statement

(a)[1] See ante, vol. i. pp. 279, 285.

(a)[2] It was said that the plaintiff's first allegation had been hastily constructed, and was brought in on the same day with the condidit, namely, on the by-day in Trinity Term, 1822, in order to found an application (acceded to by the Court) for leave to

of which it sees no reason to entertain any doubt or suspicion, confirmed as it is by what appears on the records of the Court, and which certainly distinguishes the present case from ordinary cases, in this particular. But, independent of these special considerations, as the whole matter had been put in issue by the prior pleas, the Court would, undoubtedly, have excluded all facts not either explanatory or contradictory, or newly come to the proponent's knowledge— facts of which three descriptions, I have already said, she is entitled, de jure, [105] to plead: and which, consequently, the Court is also, de jure, bound to admit. Upon these principles, it seems to the Court that parts of this allegation are admissible, and that other parts it is bound to reject.

The case set up in the first part of the plea to which this allegation responds is, that the deceased (though "of a violent and irritable temper," and of "great pride and conceit"—though "very precise in all his domestic and other arrangements," and one who entertained "high notions of parental authority"—though "of rigid Calvinistical principles," and deeply impressed with ideas "of the total and absolute depravity of human nature," of the necessity "of sensible conversion," and of the expediency of "confessing to others the most secret thoughts of the heart," yet still) "at all times before, and down to the end of the year 1820, conducted and managed the whole of his pecuniary and domestic affairs, as well as all professional and other matters of business, in a rational manner;" was "of sound and perfect mind, memory, and understanding;" and was fully competent to the performance of any act "requiring thought, judgment, and reflection."

Now, the 1st article of this allegation appears to me strictly contradictory of that part of the defendants' case to which I have just adverted. It pleads, in substance, that the deceased did not, to the time specified, "conduct himself and his concerns, pecuniary or domestic, in a sane and rational manner"—for "that he frequently gave ridiculous and contradictory orders to his servants and trades-people"—that he would frequently, when cattle were being driven by [106] his house, "rush into the street, abuse the drivers, and insist, with violent oaths, that no such cattle should pass his door"—that he would frequently ring up his servants in the middle of the night and insist "that it was morning, refusing to be persuaded to the contrary"—"that he would frequently be low and desponding, and cry for hours together without any apparent cause or motive"—and, finally, that in these and many other respects he so conducted himself, long prior to the year 1820, as to induce his neighbours, friends, and others to believe him of unsound mind and incapable of managing himself and his affairs.

The above is, in substance, the 1st article of the plaintiff's allegation before the Court; and it seems to me entitled to be admitted as strictly contradictory of the first case made in the plea given in by the defendants. The principal objection taken to it—namely, that it departs from the case originally set up by the plaintiff, which is said to have been one of partial insanity—appears to me to be sufficiently obviated by this consideration. Such partial insanity was, originally, and I presume still is, what the plaintiff means principally to rely upon. At the same time the deceased was distinctly represented, even in her first plea, as labouring under insanity upon points not connected with those delusions which he was charged to have felt with respect to the character and conduct of his daughter, the plaintiff, in particular. In this view of them the plaintiff's former allegation well consists with this part of her present plea—sufficiently well, at all events, to entitle it to go to proof; especially under the circumstances to which the Court [107] has already adverted, connected with the bringing in of her former plea.

But the succeeding articles, from the 3d to the 9th, both inclusive (for of the 2d take the depositions of certain material witnesses, far advanced in life, upon it, de bene esse, in the course of the then ensuing long vacation; that a supplement was originally intended to have been given in on the part of the plaintiff, in the shape of additional articles; and that such intention had only been abandoned on its becoming known to her professional advisers that the defendants' counter plea would be of a nature absolutely to require a rejoinder, in which rejoinder such supplemental matter might conveniently be embodied. And it was said to be under these special circumstances that supplemental matter to the original plea was introduced into the cause, in this late stage of it.

the Court will presently dispose), appear to me inadmissible in this stage of the cause for several reasons. They purport, each, to allege some specific fact in proof of the general charge conveyed in the 1st article.(a) But of these the whole, with the exception of the 9th, are very considerably remote in point of date, and are to some extent equivocal as proofs of actual insanity; whilst the most material may be examined to, either under the 1st article of the present, or under articles of the same proponent's former allegation. Upon these con-[108]-siderations I think them either inadmissible or not necessary to be admitted in this stage of the cause, and consequently shall reject them.

The 2d article is of a different description, and is, I think, proper to be admitted, notwithstanding the remoteness, in point of date, of the transaction to which it refers. It pleads that some time in the year 1800 the deceased insisted on his daughter, who was only eleven years of age, passing the night with one of his female patients, then resident in his house, labouring under insanity; and that he actually compelled her so to pass the night, as a punishment for some crime of which he alleged his said daughter to have been guilty. This I think a material fact. This irrational mode of punishing a child only eleven years old (for such I conceive it), even supposing her to have been guilty of some delinquency, has, I think, a strong tendency to shew that the deceased's general treatment of, and conduct towards, his daughter was, as set up on her part, irrational; and that it was not justly incurred by any misconduct of which she had been guilty; which is the case laid in the second, and perhaps most material, part of the adverse plea.

The 10th article is also, I think, clearly admissible. It had been pleaded in the 17th article of the allegation to which it responds that the said Charlotte Mary Dew (then Stot) frequently made to her said father and other persons voluntary promises, as well written as verbal, to strive to correct her "vile disposition," to "bend and subdue her stubborn will," &c. &c. which promises the article concluded by pleading that the person who gave them had con-[109]-stantly broken and disregarded. And in part supply of proof of the premises so pleaded five several exhibits, being original letters from his said daughter to the deceased, were annexed to the allegation; containing such admissions of misconduct accompanied with such promises of reformation and amendment.

It is now, in effect, pleaded on the part of the daughter, in this 10th article of the allegation under review, that she did occasionally make to her said father, and also to other persons, admissions and promises to the effect charged and pleaded in the adverse allegation, but that such promises were not voluntary: on the contrary, that they were extorted from her by the deceased; and were written under great mental anguish and anxiety, arising from previous harsh treatment and its threatened repetition, either under his immediate dictation or under that of persons to whom the deceased had made false representations of her character and conduct. And the article concludes with expressly averring that his said daughter faithfully regarded and performed her promises of endeavouring to conform her conduct to the rules laid down by the deceased, so far as the same were practicable; although all her efforts to please him, and secure his affections, were rendered hopeless and unavailing by the

(a) For instance, the 3d article pleaded that the deceased gave orders (probably before 1808, though no precise date was assigned to this transaction in the plea) that the baker who supplied him with bread should ring the house-bell without putting his feet on the steps leading up to the house-door, which was impossible; and that he flew into violent rages, and threatened to dismiss him on this impossible condition not being complied with on his part. The 4th article, that on a servant having given him notice that he meant to quit his place, in the year 1808, the deceased rushed upon him, forced him into a corner of the room, and attempted to cut his nose off with a razor. The 5th, that in 1810 he stuck up a notice to the Bishop of Durham, who attended him as a patient for medical electricity, requiring him to clean his shoes before he came into the house. The 6th pleaded a certain transaction between the deceased and a Mr. Willatts, whom the deceased took a fancy to on seeing him at St. John's Chapel, Bedford Row, expressive at least of great eccentricity. The 7th, that the deceased frequently spoke, in the most inflated terms, of the cures which he performed with his electrical machine; and solemnly ascribed to himself supernatural powers, in effecting the same, &c. &c. &c.

general unsoundness of the deceased's intellects, and by the gross delusion under which he laboured in particular, as to his said daughter's conduct and character. This 10th article, so in part explanatory, and in part contradictory, of those material averments contained in the 17th article of the adverse allegation must, I think, clearly be admitted.

[110] The 11th, the 12th, and the 13th are also either directly contradictory or explanatory of facts or charges made in the plea to which it responds, and are consequently admissible on the same principle as the 10th.

The 14th article pleads that, in the month of February, 1821, a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo issued out of Chancery at the petition of Mary Stot, the wife of the deceased, to inquire of the lunacy of the deceased; who was stated in the petition to then be, and to have been for the last three weeks, so far deprived of his reason and understanding as to be incapable of governing himself, and managing his affairs—that in the return to that commission the deceased was certified to have been found of unsound mind from the 1st day of January preceding, under which return a commission of lunacy was afterwards applied for and obtained—and that the whole of the above proceedings took place in the absence, and without the knowledge of the said C. M. Dew, or her husband, who were entirely ignorant of the same till after their actual conclusion. All this appears to the Court very material, and proper to be pleaded, even in this stage of it, under the special circumstances of the cause. It is an important fact in the cause that the deceased was, at least in the latter part of his life, found to be insane; and the daughter's ignorance of these proceedings is material on this account; it may assist, at all events, in explaining why, when the deceased was so found to be insane, his insanity was found by the jury only to have commenced on the 1st of January preceding, and [111] was not carried back to an earlier date. At all events, the daughter, as not being a party to that proceeding, is in no sort bound by the finding of the jury, as to the particular date of the commencement of the deceased's incapacity.

The 15th article only pleads certain exhibits to be official copies of some of the legal instruments referred to in the preceding article; which being admitted, this, together with the exhibits themselves, must also of course be admitted.

16, 17. The 16th article is to this effect: it pleads that the husband of the said C. M. Dew, in her right as the daughter and sole heiress at law of the deceased, became entitled to certain freehold property of which the deceased died possessed, in the event of his legal intestacy—that with a view of putting at issue the legal validity of the said will considered as a devise of real property an action of assumpsit was brought in his majesty's Court of King's Bench by Mr. Dew against John Fletcher, a devisee in trust named in the said will, for the recovery of a certain sum of money received by the said John Fletcher, on account of rent which had become due on the said property subsequent to the death of the deceased, expressly grounded upon the deceased's incapacity to devise the said property as a person of unsound mind—that the said action was in substance defended, after pleading the general issue, by Mr. Thomas and Valentine Clark, the defendants in this cause—and that on the 20th December, 1822, a verdict was found for the plaintiff in the said action, with costs, which were assessed at the sum of 376l. 1s. 3d.; the original sum as for the recovery of which the said action was [112] brought, having been the sum of 3l. 18s. 9d. only. And the 17th article pleads the third annexed exhibit to be a true copy of the final judgment given in the said action.

The admission of these articles has been opposed with much warmth, but not, I think, with equal success. As facts and circumstances not unconnected with the matter at issue, I think that this action and verdict may fairly be pleaded: they are strictly noviter preventa to the proponent's knowledge: for they have occurred subsequent to the admission of her former plea. The case is one of a nature to require every illustration: nor is the Court disposed to shut its eyes to any fact or circumstance whatever which is capable of illustrating it by no too remote a probability. It will be for the Court to guard against the admission of this part of the plaintiff's case operating unduly to the prejudice of the defendants: their apprehension of which prejudice is obviously the real ground of their objecting to its admission.

It has been said that the plaintiff was naturally anxious to submit her case, in the first instance, to a jury, that with such a case she had a much better prospect of succeeding with a jury through the medium of their feelings than of obtaining the sentence of a Court, constituted as this is, in the exercise of its judgment. The Court has no scruple in avowing that it participates to some extent in the feeling with which a British jury may be supposed to have looked at a case of this description: at the same time it is fully aware of the propriety of suffering its feelings in no case to be biassed to the prejudice of its judgment; nor will the Court shrink from the task of con-[113]-sidering this, like other cases, impartially, according to the known and recognized laws of evidence when, if ever, it presents itself to it for final adjudication: however painful to itself individually may be the conclusion at which, in its judicial capacity, it is forced by this process to arrive.

The Court has also been told or reminded of the original backwardness of Courts, like this, of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in permitting the husband, who is suing for a divorce by reason of his wife's adultery, to plead the verdict recovered in an action for damages brought by him against the alleged adulterer at common law. The fact, however, of such verdicts being and having long been pleadable in such suits is beyond all question; and the very principal objection to their reception in such cases is one, according to the plea, wholly inapplicable in the present. It was constantly objected that the wife was no party to the action for damages; and this was always represented as constituting the hardship of suffering the verdict in such action to be pleaded to her prejudice. But that no similar objection applies in the present instance is quite obvious according to the plea—for the action is pleaded (however the fact may be) to have been in substance defended by the identical parties who are now defending the suit in this Court.

18, 19. The 18th article also seems to the Court admissible. It pleads that the defendants in this suit were for years well acquainted with the deceased's unnatural conduct to his daughter, and that Mr. Thomas Clark, one of the defendants, wrote and sent a letter to the deceased under an assumed or feigned name, in the month of February, 1807, reproaching him [114] with such conduct as well towards his said child as towards his own sister, a widow (mother of the defendants) by suffering her to languish in extreme poverty and wretchedness without any relief or assistance, although himself in affluent circumstances. And it also pleads that the deceased entertained no regard or affection for his nephews, the defendants: and that he had neither seen nor had any communication with them for nearly twenty-four years before and down to the time of his death.

Now this article appears to me directly responsive to the case set up in the plea upon which this allegation rejoins, it being that the plaintiff experienced from the deceased no other harshness or severity than was the just or natural result of her own misconduct. It can never be deemed immaterial to shew, nor is the plaintiff in my judgment precluded from shewing, that one, at least, of the defendants entertained or expressed very different opinions in 1807; and although many years have elapsed since those opinions were expressed, yet it is to be remembered that the plaintiff was at that time a woman grown (seventeen or eighteen years old), and that even then she had been guilty, according to the defendants' case, of much of that misconduct now imputed, as justifying the aversion with which the deceased is admitted to have regarded her. Neither is it immaterial (nor inadmissible, even in this stage of the cause, I think, under the peculiar circumstances of it) that the deceased was upon no terms of intimacy or communication with the defendants, in whose favor the plaintiff, his only child, is virtually disinherited by this very will, the validity of which is at issue between the parties in the cause. The 19th article, with its accompanying [115] exhibit, the original letter referred to in the 18th, is a necessary appendant to that article, and must consequently be admitted as of course.

20, 21. The 20th and 21st, the only two remaining articles of this allegation, seem also to the Court proper to be admitted. The defendants had averred in the 30th article of their plea that the plaintiff and her husband had acquiesced in the deceased's will by formally consenting in the month of January, 1822, that certain funds and effects of the deceased, then in Chancery, should be transferred to the defendants as administrators of the deceased's property with this will annexed. She now pleads in this 20th article of her allegation, as explanatory of that fact, that such partial acquiescence was in effect caused or occasioned by the liberal professions, both verbal and written, of esteem and affection made to her by the defendants shortly after the death of the deceased; and by promises held out that arrangements should be presently entered into for admitting her to a participation with themselves of the benefit derived to them under the deceased's will. And certain exhibits are pleaded in the 21st article to be notes or letters written by the defendant, Thomas Clark, with the knowledge and privity of his co-defendant, to the plaintiff, in the months of November and December, 1821, expressive of such esteem and affection, and allusive to such proposed arrangements. What its final effect in the cause may be I will not undertake to anticipate; but I think that this is matter explanatory of a not immaterial adverse fact pleaded in the defendant's allegation; and consequently that the plaintiff who propounds is strictly at liberty to go into proof of it.

[116] Subject to these observations I admit this allegation, with the exception of those articles from the 3d to the 9th inclusive, which I reject for reasons already stated.

Allegation admitted as reformed.

USTICKE v. BAWDEN. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1824.—An allegation setting up the revival of a will upon the cancellation of subsequent testamentary papers, under which only it had stood revoked—admitted to proof.—The legal presumption is adverse to an unfinished or imperfect will: but to the revival of a former uncancelled, upon the cancellation of a latter revocatory will, the legal presumption is neither favorable to nor adverse. The law, having furnished that principle, retires; and leaves the question one of intention merely, and open to a decision either way, according to extrinsic facts and circumstances.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Stephen Usticke, late of Penwarne House, in the county of Cornwall, Esq., was the party deceased in this cause: he died possessed in his own right of [117] certain real estates estimated at the value of 400 or 500l. per annum; and of some personal property, though said to be not very considerable: he had also a life interest in the mansion house and an estate at Penwarne bequeathed to him by his late uncle, Sir Michael Nowell, under the circumstances and subject to the condition (presently to be stated) as pleaded in the second article of the allegation before the Court; the admissibility of which was the immediate point at issue in the cause.

The deceased left at his death the following testamentary papers:—

1. A regularly executed will bearing date on the 1st of July, 1807. By this instrument he gave and devised all his real property, of what nature or kind soever, to John Vigurs, in trust for Frances Elizabeth Bawden (party in the cause) for life, and after her death to two other persons for 500 years, in trust to raise, by sale or mortgage of such estates, the sum of 900l. to be paid in legacies of 300l. each to three of his nephews. Subject to this trust the testator devised all his said estates, after the death of Miss Bawden, to his nephew, Lewis Charles Peters, for life; with remainders, successively, to his heirs male and female; in default of such heirs to another nephew, with similar remainders; and in default of issue, male and female, of such other nephew, to his, the testator's, right heirs for ever. He also bequeathed by his said will a leasehold brewhouse and premises to Miss Bawden for life (remainder to his nephew, Day Perry le Grice), together with all his personal estate and effects, absolutely; and appointed Miss Bawden his sole executrix.

[118] The second testamentary paper was,

2. A will, bearing date the 5th of January, 1821, made and cancelled under the circumstances pleaded in the 9th and 10th articles of the allegation. By this will of the 5th of January, 1821, the testator bequeathed an annuity of 400l. to Miss Bawden for life; and the rest of his estate, both real and personal, after payment of certain legacies (of which the principal was an annuity of 80l. for life to his niece, Miss Lenny Peters) to his nephews, Michael Nowell Peters, and Charles Lewis Peters, absolutely.

3. The third testamentary paper was a will, bearing date the 8th day of January, 1821, made and cancelled under the circumstances pleaded in the 11th article of the allegation. Its principal object seems to have been to give Miss Bawden, in addition to her annuity of 400l., all such goods, chattels, and effects as the deceased should die possessed of, to and for her own use and benefit, absolutely. For the rest, it agreed in substance with the will of the 5th of January preceding; especially as to the disposal of the residue.

 From which admission of the above allegation and exhibits, as reformed, an appeal was interposed in due course by Mr. Thomas and Mr. Valentine Clark to the High Court of Delegates. This appeal was heard in that Court on Friday, the 9th of July (1824): when their Lordships were pleased to affirm the sentence appealed from, and to condemn the appellants in the sum of 100l. "nomine expensarum."

The Judges who sat under the commission were Mr. Baron Hullock, Mr. Justice Park, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Coote, Dr. Burnaby, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Gostling, and Dr. Lee.

4. The fourth testamentary paper was a codicil to this will of the 8th of January, 1821, and bearing date on the 20th of the same month, pleaded in the 11th article of the allegation. It reduced Miss Bawden's annuity for life to 200l.; but otherwise ratified and confirmed the said will.

5. The fifth, and last, was an unfinished testamentary paper, without signature or date, but pleaded in the 12th article of the allegation to have been made and written by the deceased, considerably subsequent to January, 1821. In this unfinished paper Miss Bawden's annuity was also fixed at 200l. only.

[119] A proctor for Miss Bawden had propounded the whole of these testamentary papers: but the case, in substance, on her part, laid in the allegation before the Court was that the will of 1807 had revived in consequence of the cancellation of the several testamentary instruments as pleaded, by and under which only it had stood revoked.

The allegation pleaded—

1. That Stephen Usticke, the party deceased, died on the 26th of January, 1823, leaving a brother, the Reverend Robert Michael Nowell Usticke (party in the cause), and, together with three sisters, and several nephews and nieces, entitled in distribution to his personal estate and effects, if pronounced to have died intestate.

2. That the deceased, above five-and-twenty years before his death, became acquainted with, and attached to, Frances Elizabeth Bawden (party in the cause), a lady of respectable family and connexions, and that he engaged to marry, and subsequently would have married, the said F. E. Bawden, but for the disapproval of his uncle, Sir Michael Nowell, from whom he had great expectations; that Sir Michael Nowell died in 1802, having first by his will, bearing date the 25th of April, 1797, left the deceased his mansion-house, for life, and a freehold estate of 1500l. per annum; but upon express condition of his not marrying Miss Bawden; in which case he, the testator, revoked such devises, and limited over the devised premises to other uses.

3. The third article merely pleaded the paper-writing No. 1, exhibited in supply of proof, to be a true copy of that part of Sir Michael Nowell's will, [120] relative to the devises pleaded in the preceding article.

4. That the attachment of the deceased and Miss Bawden continued to subsist after the death of Sir M. Nowell; that no marriage took place between them by reason of the penalty annexed to that occurrence in Sir M. Nowell's will; but that, in 1802, Miss Bawden was induced to take up her residence with the deceased, and that she had lived and cohabited with him as his wife, from that time till his death—that she was visited by many of his family, both male and female, and that the deceased constantly felt and expressed the greatest regard and affection for her, throughout, and during the whole period of, their said cohabitation.

5. That in April, 1803, the deceased made and executed a deed of gift of various personal property (a) to Miss Bawden (described therein as his intended wife), her executors, administrators, and assigns for ever; on condition of her permitting him the use and enjoyment of the same during his life-time, and with a proviso that the deed should be void in case of his [121] survivorship; and that he delivered this deed to Miss Bawden, in whose custody it remained till the 8th of January, 1821,

(a) Viz. "All his household furniture, plate, linen, &c., horses, cattle, corn, hay, &c.; live and dead stock; and, finally, all his goods and chattels of whatsoever nature, lying or being at the house which he then occupied at Mawnan, in the county of Cornwall, and on the lands and tenements attached thereto; and also on the tenement of Boskenning, in the said parish of Mawnan." Very few of the goods and chaetels mentioned in this instrument were in the testator's possession at the time of his dath, or, if in his possession, capable of being distinguished from those at Penwarne, in which he had only a life interest—upon which and other (legal) grounds it was admitted to be very doubtful whether this deed of gift, though in existence, could have any operation.

when it was given up by her to Mr. Edwards, of Truro, the deceased's friend and solicitor.

6. The 6th article only pleaded the exhibit No. 2 to be the original deed of gift, pleaded in the next preceding article.

7. That the deceased, during the last twenty years of his life, expressed, at various times, and to divers persons, his intention of amply providing for Mrs. Usticke (as Miss Bawden was generally called); on which occasions he commonly added, when speaking to persons in whom he confided, that "she had sacrificed every thing for his sake."

8. The 8th article pleaded the factum of a will, bearing date the 1st of July, 1807, made and executed by the deceased, in duplicate,(a) in the presence of witnesses; and now propounded, on behalf of Miss Bawden, the sole executrix named in it.

9. That, in or about the beginning of January, 1821, the deceased, with his own hand, wrote and made a new will; and executed the same, also in the presence of witnesses, on or about the 5th day of January in that year, when the same bears date.

10. That about that time the deceased, having expressed, as with reference to his testamentary arrange-[122]-ments, his regret at Mr. Edwards, his attorney, not being at hand, the attendance of that gentleman was bespoke by Miss Bawden; that the deceased, on seeing him, shewed him the will of the 5th of January, 1821, and gave him instructions for divers alterations to be made in it; and that Mr. Edwards immediately converted the same, by alterations and interlineations, into a draft for a new will, which the deceased, on the 8th of January in the same year, duly executed in the presence of witnesses, having been prepared by Mr. Edwards, pursuant to such instructions, in manner aforesaid; that, upon the execution thereof, the deceased delivered the said will to Mr. Vigurs, his apothecary, who, after several months, returned it to the deceased, at his request; that the deceased, some time afterwards, but when the proponent is unable to propound, cancelled the same by tearing off his signature from the several sheets of the said will; and also wrote, with his own hand, as well several memoranda on the backs of the sheets, as various alterations in the body of the said will, either prior or subsequent to the said cancellation; that Mr. Edwards took possession of the will of the 5th of January, 1821, upon the execution of that of the 8th of January, and retained the same till after the deceased's death.

11. That soon after executing his said will the deceased, with his own hand, wrote a codicil to his said will; and executed the same in the presence of two subscribed witnesses, on the 20th of January, 1821.

12. That a considerable time subsequent to January, 1821 (but when particularly the proponent is unable to propound), the deceased began a new will to secure a [123] provision for Miss Bawden [a paper exhibited in the cause, in the deceased's handwriting, but] without date or signature.

13. That some short time before his death the deceased frequently expressed his desire to see Mr. Edwards, his solicitor, who lived at a great distance from him, in order finally to arrange his affairs, but did not send for him, or appoint any day for his attendance; that three days before his death Mr. Vigurs, his apothecary, said to the deceased, whom he perceived to be in great danger, speaking on the subject of his will, "I hope you have made no alterations to the injury of Mrs. Usticke," meaning Miss Bawden, so called; when the deceased replied, "No; die when I will she will find that she is left better than Sir Michael left Lady Nowell;" and that the property left by Sir Michael to Lady Nowell, so referred to by the deceased, nearly equalled in amount the property left by the deceased himself to Miss Bawden by the will of July, 1807.

14. That some time after the death of Sir Michael Nowell the Rev. Robert Usticke (party in the cause) sought, by means of an ejectment, to obtain possession of the mansion-house of Penwarne, in the county of Cornwall, being part of the estate devised to the deceased by Sir Michael Nowell as aforesaid, on the alleged ground that the deceased was actually married to Miss Bawden—a marriage forbidden, under pain of forfeiture, by the will of Sir M. Nowell; that the deceased deeply resented

(a) The duplicate of this will was said still to be in the possession of Messrs. Shephard and Adlington, solicitors, in London, who had prepared it; in the same state, of course, as when executed by the deceased: it was not suggested that this duplicate had ever been in the deceased's possession.

this attempt to deprive him of his property, and from this and other causes became at variance with, and was never reconciled to, his said brother, to the day of his death.

[124] 15. The fifteenth article pleaded the finding of the above several testamentary papers [which were all exhibited in the cause] subsequent to the death of the deceased, viz. the will of 1807, in a drawer under lock at Penwarne, to which the deceased had always free access up to the time of his death; the paper bearing date the 5th of January, 1821, in the possession of Mr. Edwards; the cancelled will of the 8th of January, 1821, and the unfinished testamentary paper in a desk in the deceased's counting-house or office; (a) and the codicil of the 20th of January, 1821, in the possession of Mr. Beauchamp, a relation by marriage, to whom the deceased had delivered or sent it, sealed up, with a request that he would take care of it.

16. The 16th and last was the usual concluding article averring the truth of the premises.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. I think that this allegation is clearly entitled to go to proof. The point for the Court's ultimate decision will be whether the cancellation of a latter will by the testator did, or did not, amount to the revival of a former, only revoked by that will so itself subsequently cancelled. Upon that point it would be premature to express a decided opinion in the present stage of the cause. The case set up in this allegation is in affirmance of that revival; for the facts averred in it are supposed, and are pleaded in order, [125] to shew that a former will of this deceased did revive, upon the cancellation of a latter, expressly revocatory of that former will in its uncancelled state. I think it quite impossible to say that these facts, as pleaded, are incapable of justifying the Court in arriving at that conclusion, so that the allegation is clearly, I repeat, not inadmissible. Much of course indeed must depend, looking to its final effect, upon the nature and degree of proof by which the facts pleaded in it are substantiated. Much also must depend upon the strength of the adverse case; should an adverse case, that is, be set up for the next of kin, either by means of interrogatories, or by that of a substantive independent plea.

Where an allegation propounds an imperfect testamentary paper, it being a clear principle that the legal presumption is adverse to that paper, the allegation must contain facts of a sufficiently stringent nature to encounter and repel an adverse legal presumption, in order to insure its own admissibility. But an allegation pleading facts more equivocal is admissible, either way, in a case like the present: for in neither alternative, as I take it, is there any adverse legal presumption to encounter or repel. This Court is founded in holding, under the sanction of the superior Court, that the legal presumption is neither adverse to, nor in favor of, the revival of a former uncancelled, upon the cancellation of a latter, revocatory will. Having furnished this principle the law withdraws altogether; and leaves the question, as one of intention purely, and open to a decision either way, solely according to facts and circumstances. This, I conceive, is the true principle to be extracted [126] from the judgment of the Court of Delegates in the case of Moore v. Moore and Metcalf (see 1 Phillimore, pp. 375 and 466)—a case determined, after an able argument, upon the fullest consideration.

It is quite unnecessary to inquire what principle would be applicable to a case of this description totally nude of circumstances; as I think it next to impossible that such a case should ever occur. If ever such a case actually does occur, it will be for the Court to deal with it according to the best of its judgment, pro re natâ. But I can scarcely figure to myself a case either without concomitants, or with these so nicely balanced that neither side prevails. There must always, I think, be circumstances in both scales; and preponderating circumstances either in the one or the other, so as not to leave the case itself where the law seems to leave it, purely in equilibrio.

The present case, at all events, is not one of that description: on the contrary, taking the facts to be true, and to be encountered by no adverse case (the former of which I am bound to assume, and the latter I am not called upon to anticipate) its circumstances are numerous, and, I must say, strongly in favor of the revival. There are strong circumstances tending to shew the deceased's intention to leave a will of some sort in favor of Miss Bawden, and not to die wholly intestate. But the question

(a) This counting-house or office was described in the argument as a private room in the garden, detached from the house, of which room itself the deceased always kept the key, as well as that of the desk in it, in which the testamentary papers in question were found.

clearly lies between the will of 1807 and an intestacy, under which Miss Bawden is, of course, left without any provision. The cancellation of the will of the 8th of January clearly did not revoke that of the 5th—for the will [127] of the 5th of January itself was cancelled by its very conversion into a draft for this will of the 8th of January. The codicil of the 20th of January expressly refers to this will of the 8th of January; and was cancelled, ipso facto, by the cancellation of that will; with which it must be taken to stand or to have fallen. The mere incipient testamentary paper is of no effect or avail in law—it is without date or signature—non constat, precisely, even according to the plea, when it was written—and although it might as pleaded have been written "considerably subsequent to January, 1821," yet still, I observe, that it is written on paper which has the water-mark of 1808, being, however, in either event, equally unavailing in law. The question clearly then, I repeat, lies between this will of 1807 and an intestacy—which the circumstances pleaded are strong to shew that the deceased at no time ever contemplated. His intention to provide for Miss Bawden after his death is evidenced by a series of facts, independent of the general probabilities of the case: in particular, by the deed of gift of 1803 and by the will of 1807, to which he adhered stedfastly, for any thing that appears to the contrary, for fourteen consecutive years, namely, till the year 1821. And though, subsequent to 1821, his mind does seem to have fluctuated as to the provision to be made for this lady in point of amount (whether from diminished regard, or, as suggested, from the decreased and decreasing value of his property,(a) or from some or other cause), yet still this [128] whole series of scripts is strong evidence of his intention, at all times, to leave Miss Bawden provided for at his death in some sort—which must be defeated by an intestacy, under which she can take no benefit.

Again, the declarations pleaded to have been made by the deceased to his apothecary, Mr. Vigurs, three days before his death, are strongly confirmatory of the case set up in the allegation—as it is difficult, or rather impossible, to say to what they refer if not to the will of 1807. The Court is fully aware of the danger of relying too implicitly upon declarations: it is fully aware that they are open in all cases to suspicions of insincerity on the one part, and of misapprehension, at least, on the other: under this impression, it will examine these declarations, when they are before it in a final shape, and in conjunction with all the circumstances of the case, with the utmost caution. But if entitled to any credit, they must go some way to justify an inference that the deceased, at the time of making them, held this will of 1807 to be operative—and, consequently, that he must have considered it to revive upon the cancellation of the subsequent will of 1821.

The same conclusion is strongly fortified by another fact pleaded. The will of 1821 had been out of the deceased's possession: it had been delivered to his friend, Mr. Vigurs, I presume, for safe custody. But the deceased reclaims it—and, having so done, he [129] cancels it, carefully and deliberately, in a highly formal manner, namely, by tearing off his signature, at that time affixed to every one of the five several sheets of which this will consisted. But the will of 1807 is pleaded (at least sub modo) to have been always in his own possession, and in a place to which he had access. It is not for the Court at present to conjecture to what the proof of this fact so (I admit to some extent equivocally) pleaded may ultimately amount. But should the fact be proved to have been, at all, as pleaded—à fortiori, should it be proved that this will of 1807 was, or must be taken to have been, not unfrequently under the deceased's own notice and immediate inspection, his not having cancelled this in as careful a manner as he had cancelled the will of 1824—and, still more, his not having cancelled it at all—will certainly raise a strong presumption that he meant it to revive and become operative on the cancellation of that instrument by which only it had been revoked.

Upon these considerations—and without going more minutely at present into all the circumstances of the case, the Court is satisfied of the propriety of admitting this allegation.

Allegation admitted.

(a) It had been suggested, in the course of the argument, that a decrease in the value of the deceased's property had actually taken place about that time, to a considerable extent, as well from the general depreciation of landed property at that time, as from particular circumstances connected with the failure of a brewery, in which the deceased had been in some measure interested or concerned.

[130] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY DAWE AND NOCKOLDS v. WILLIAMS. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1824.—Articles against a parishioner for "brawling," &c. by reading a "notice of vestry," in church during divine service, without due authority, admitted to proof.—An objection to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain a suit for "brawling" by "letters of request," over-ruled.

(By letters of request from the archdeaconry of Huntingdon.)

This was a cause or business of the office of the Judge, promoted by William Dawe and Martin Nockolds respectively, parishioners, inhabitants, and churchwardens of the parish of Tring, in the county of Hertford, archdeaconry of Huntingdon, diocese of Lincoln, and province of Canterbury, against Henry Williams, also a parishioner of the said parish, for his soul's health, &c. and especially for having "created a disturbance in the parish church of Tring aforesaid during the time of divine service therein," and for having "quarrelled, chode, and brawled, by words, in the said church, during such time." It was a proceeding in this Court, the Court of Arches, in the first instance, by virtue of "letters of request," under the hand and seal of the "Commissary of the Lord Bishop of London in and throughout the archdeaconry of Huntingdon."

The criminal charge as contained in the third of six articles, exhibited on the part of the promovents, was as follows:—That "on the morning of Sunday, the 24th of August, 1823, and during the time of divine service in [131] the parish church of the parish of Tring aforesaid, he, the said Henry Williams (the defendant), not being a churchwarden, overseer, or officer of the said parish, did enter into the porch of the said church and affix, and leave affixed, on the door of the said church, a written notice, in the words and figures, or to the effect following, to wit, 'Take notice, that a vestry will be held in this church on Friday next, the 29th day of August, at three o'clock, to choose new churchwardens in the place of the present ones.' Signed 'George Kingsley, Charles Belcher, overseers; Adam Morton, William Firth, Thomas Woodman'—that he, the said Henry Williams, then entered the said church, accompanied by Adam Morton, an inhabitant of the said parish, and having taken his seat with the said Adam Morton in his pew, did, during the time of divine service therein, and immediately after the Rev. Charles Lacy, the minister then officiating in the said church, had concluded reading the Nicene Creed, stand up in the said pew, and, not regarding the sacredness of the place in which he then was, and without any lawful authority whatever, did irreverently read aloud a notice in the words, or to the precise effect of the said written notice, so affixed, as aforesaid, on the door of the said church; and did, moreover, then and there irreverently and indecently chide and brawl, in the presence and hearing of the congregation then assembled in the said church; and did thereby, and by so reading aloud the said notice as aforesaid, interrupt the performance of divine service, create a great disturbance in the said church, and give great offence to the congregation assembled therein." The [132] articles concluded by praying that the defendant might be "duly corrected for such offence according to the exigency of the law;" might be "admonished to refrain from the like behaviour in future;" and might "be condemned in the costs of the suit."

In opposition to the admission of the "articles," it was submitted that the act charged upon the defendant had nothing of that malus animus, on the face of it, which it was contended was essential to the offence of "brawling." What, it was said, is the intrinsic character of the act? When any thing is to be proposed to the parishioners relative to the general management of the parish, the churchwardens are the proper persons to call a meeting of the parish. If the object of that meeting be personal against the churchwardens (as in this instance), it may be (as the fact was in this instance) that they refuse to call a vestry. What then are the parish to do? Are they not to meet in vestry at all? That can hardly be. But if parishioners are to meet, legally in vestry, a prior "notice" in church, similar to the one in question, is absolutely requisite under Mr. Sturges Bourne's act (58 Geo. III. c. 69, s. 1); which says not a word as to whom vestries shall be called by, or at all prescribes the course to be pursued when the churchwardens, the persons authorized to call them in the first instance, refuse or decline—an omission possibly fit to be supplied in the event of any revision of that act. Under these circumstances, it should seem, primâ facie, that such notice of vestry must be given in church without the authority of the churchwardens; and that the parish, in deputing one of their body to [133] that office, took the only step capable of being taken. The notice in question, even as pleaded, was signed by the overseers and other (respectable) parishioners: so that the parishioner deputed to the office of reading it in church was, surely, sufficiently authorized to protect him from being dealt with, for having merely executed that office, as a "brawler." Other modes, indeed, may be suggested in which the parish possibly might have proceeded. It may be said, for instance, that they might have moved the Court of King's Bench for a mandamus to the churchwardens to call a vestry. But, not to mention the circuity and expensiveness of this (the only mode which readily suggests itself), such suggestions, it was said, are foreign to the argument—that confining itself, as it does, merely to shewing that the act charged evinces nothing of that malus animus, on the face of it, essential to the offence of brawling; and which, unless the Court infers, from the intrinsic character of the act itself, it is bound, it was argued, to reject the articles.

Should it be said that "this was a calling of a vestry for an illegal purpose," and that hence the Court will infer "malice," the answer is: 1st, non constat, that this was a calling of a vestry for an illegal purpose; but even granting it to have been, still, 2dly, it was not a calling of a vestry for any purpose so illegal, on the face of it, that the Court will infer any malus animus in the defendant on that account. The power of parishioners to remove their churchwardens, in case of their wasting the goods of the parish (or, it may be presumed, in case of their other misbehaviour), is pretty broadly laid down in many [134] books of authority. "Churchwardens," says Mr. Justice Blackstone, "may not waste the church goods, but may be removed by the parish, and called to account" (1 Bla. Com. 394). And it is said to have been ruled by the Court of King's Bench two centuries ago that parishioners may displace their churchwardens, though chosen for a time certain, before the expiration of that time (13 Co. 70). And indeed it should seem, as the law now stands, pretty essential that parishioners should have some such power. "In ordinary repairs," says Bishop Gibson (Cod. 1, 396), "the churchwardens need not take the sense of the parishioners; and, though indiscreet or over expensive, are entitled to be reimbursed by the parish for what they have expended, so it hath been truly expended, and without profit to themselves; because the parish have constituted them their trustees. Nor have the parishioners, he adds, any remedy but by complaint to the ordinary, in order to their removal." And Prideaux in his "Office of Churchwardens" (sections 32 and 33) is even still more pointed as to parishes being, in these respects, in the discretion (it might almost be said at the mercy) of their churchwardens. Gibson, it will be seen, has coupled this power of parishioners to remove their churchwardens with the necessity, or at least the propriety, of a complaint to the ordinary, in the first instance, in order to such their removal. But this, probably, might be the very course meant to be pursued in the present instance: it was not necessary in the published "notice of vestry" objected to, to enter into any particulars of the course meant to be pursued by the parish. "In order to choose new churchwardens," [135] might well stand for "in order to take the requisite legal steps for the choosing of new churchwardens"—leaving those steps to be ascertained by the vestry when actually met.

Under these circumstances, it was submitted that the mere reading of a notice of vestry, at the time and in the manner charged, was no brawling on the face of it, the churchwardens, the proper persons to call vestries on parish matters, refusing to convene a vestry (as they naturally would) for the purpose specified, and Mr. Sturges Bourne's act providing that no vestry shall be holden without a previous notice in church of the holding of such vestry, and of the purpose for which it is intended to be held.

Should the alleged offence be argued to consist in the violation of the rubric, the answer is—that the proceeding in this instance is not as for any (real or supposed) violation of the rubric, but for the offence of brawling. The citation is in that form—so are the articles, which are silent as to any violation of the rubric, and only object to the defendant the offence of brawling. Indeed, as to a violation of the rubric, any proclamation in church during the time of divine service, unless "by the minister himself," and "of something either prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, or enjoined by the King, or the ordinary of the place," is a violation of the rubric; so that the rubric, in the particular question, is violated, without offence, in too many instances to render it probable that the Court would deem its violation, in the present instance, a fit subject for a criminal prosecution; detached from that other offence the offence of brawling, which the articles charge it to have involved.

[136] Lastly, it was submitted that some objections lay to the Court's entertaining a suit for brawling by "letters of request," on the following consideration:—

By the "bill of citations" (stat. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 9) none are to be cited out of their dioceses, except in certain excepted cases, the fifth being, "in case that any bishop or any inferior judge having under him jurisdiction in his own right and title or by commission, make request or instance to the archbishop, bishop, or other superior ordinary, to take, treat, examine, or determine the matter before him or his substitutes—and that to be done in cases only where the law, civil or canon, doth affirm execution of such request or instance of jurisdiction to be lawful and tolerable." Now it is to be collected from this correction [and that to be done in cases only, &c.] that execution of such request, or instance, of jurisdiction is lawful and tolerable but in certain cases: it were a vain correction (as laid down by the Court of King's Bench in the case of Jones v. Jones, reported by Ld. Ch. J. Hobart) (Hob. 186), if it were lawful and tolerable in all. "No doubt," said the Court of K. B., in the case in Hobart, "the statute in question was not made without advice and hearing of the canonists, and therefore cannot be supposed to be so ignorantly penned; and the case, concerning so much the ease of the subject, deserves much consideration." Now certainly neither the law, civil or canon, can affirm the execution of such instance or request of jurisdiction to be "lawful or tolerable" in the case in question. For [137] it is a proceeding in substance, under a statute (5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4), and consequently it cannot be supposed to be one of those cases ever in the contemplation of the law, civil or canon—it is a proceeding, too, under a statute, subsequent in date to the "bill of citations;" but that is not all; it is a proceeding under a statute which expressly limits the proceeding to be "before the ordinary of that place where the offence shall have been committed." Consequently this was denied to be one of those cases in which it was "lawful or tolerable" that the suit should be sent up, by letters of request, from the inferior to the superior ordinary. Nor is the position, it was said, so taken up upon principle, destitute of authority, for there is a "suggestion" in Winch [Entries, 570] for a prohibition to a proceeding before the archbishop in a cause for brawling, transmitted by letters of request (the identical case in point) on this very ground. The suggestion is express: "Quod cognitio offensæ (si qua offensa) per statutum prædictum (ibid.) ad ordinarium loci, et non ad alium quemcunque judicem spiritualem, pertinet ac spectat: ac prædicta offensa, in articulis, sive interrogatoriis prædictis, superius contentis (c) (si qua spiritualis offensa fuisset) ab ordinario loci ad aliquem alium judicem spiritualem per aliquas literas requisitionum punienda fore, mitti non debeat." It was admitted, however, at the same time, that suits for brawling, by letters of request, had been entertained by the Court of Arches in [138] some recent instances; (a) but then the objection does not seem to have been taken in either, or any, of those cases. Upon these considerations it was prayed that the Court would put an end to the suit by rejecting the articles.

The substance of the argument in support of the articles will be found expressed in the judgment.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a proceeding as well under the general ecclesiastical law as under the statute of Edward the Sixth, against the defendant, Henry Williams, a parishioner of Tring, for "creating a disturbance in the parish church of Tring, during the time of divine service," and for "quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, by words, in the said church, during such time."

The admission of the "articles" in this case, the third of which expresses the particulars of the charge, is opposed: but they appear to the Court sufficiently to contain the ecclesiastical offence charged. A private parishioner has no right during the time of divine service, and of his own authority, to publish such a notice as is here stated, or any other notice, in the church. The rubric expressly states that "nothing shall be proclaimed or published in the church during the time of divine service, but by the minister, nor by him any thing but what is prescribed by the rules of this book, or enjoined by the King or the ordinary of the place." And the rubric, as a part of the Book of Common Prayer, is confirmed by [139] act of parliament, and constitutes a part of the statute law of the land.

Vestries, for church matters, regularly are to be called "by the churchwardens with the consent of the minister." The late act of parliament (58 Geo. III. c. 69) neither altered the general authority under which, nor the persons by whom, vestries are to be called: it only added some further formalities in the mode of calling; such as directing the notice to be put up on the church-door, and that it shall be given a certain number of days before the vestry is to meet.

(c) The "articles" being set out at length, in the "suggestion."

(a) As in Newberry v. Goodwin, 1 Phill. 282, and probably in some other cases.

Suits have been entertained in this Court for offences of the description contained in the present articles; as in the case of Thompson v. Tapp, and other cases.

Here, then, being an offence sufficiently laid in the articles; and the articles sufficiently conforming to the citation, they must be admitted by the Court.

The proceeding is also under the statute of brawling. That statute was intended to repress all interruption and disturbance, even by words only, of the congregation met for public worship. It has been so construed. Here it is not necessary to express any opinion, whether simply reading a notice, wholly unconnected with any other circumstances of irregularity, would amount to such an offence as would form a fit subject for prosecution; since it is obvious that a private parishioner's proclaiming in the church a notice calling a vestry, in the middle of the year, for the purpose of choosing new churchwardens must be connected, primâ facie at least, with some contest and [140] dispute existing in the parish; and, consequently, must have tended to disturb the congregation, and to call off their attention from the solemn purpose for which they were assembled. The service was not over; for it is not ended till the grace or blessing is pronounced, dismissing the congregation.

The article pleads "that he did moreover irreverently there chide and brawl." If it be intended to prove any other words and expressions,(a)[1] they should be set forth in the article, so as to give the defendant an opportunity of cross-examining to, and contradicting them.

It has been suggested, upon the authority of some ancient dicta, that under the true construction of the statute of citations, a suit for brawling cannot be brought in the Court of Arches by letters of request: but it is not denied that suits so brought have constantly been entertained in this Court. Besides, the defendant did not appear under protest; but, after having appeared absolutely to the citation, he takes the objection to the jurisdiction at the admission of the articles. Upon the whole, the Court feels itself bound to allow the suit to proceed unless it should be stopt by a prohibition: should such a measure be held to lie against the jurisdiction of this Court, under the circumstances of the present case, the Court will readily, as it will be its duty, put an end to the proceeding.

[141] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY PALMER v. ROFFEY. Peculiars Court of Canterbury, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1824.—Articles against the defendant (a churchwarden) for brawling, &c. in church, pronounced to be proved; and the defendant suspended and condemned in full costs; the case being held to afford no ground for mitigated costs.—In all cases of brawling, &c. in church where two persons are implicated, which is most to blame is nearly immaterial; each is bound to abstain; and each, failing to abstain, incurs a like penalty.

[See England v. Hurcomb, p. 307, post.]

This was a cause or business of the office of the Judge, promoted by Samuel Palmer, a churchwarden of the parish of St. Mary, Newington, in the county of Surry and deanery of Croydon,(a)[2] against Richard Roffey, also a churchwarden of that parish, for "quarrelling, chiding, and brawling by words in the church of the said parish;" and also for "smiting and laying violent hands upon certain persons in the said church, and creating a riot and disturbance in the same."

The articles, twelve in number (after pleading as well the general ecclesiastical law with respect to the offence or offences charged, as the statute 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4; 1st, against quarrelling, chiding and brawling by words; and, 2dly, against smiting or laying violent hands, in any church or church-yard; further), in substance pleaded; that at a meeting of the parishioners of the said parish in vestry, on Easter Tuesday, 1823, to choose parish officers for the year ensuing, Roffey, the defendant, the rector's warden, in the first instance "quarrelled, chode and brawled" with Joseph Hurcomb, a parishioner and inhabitant [142] of the said parish then and there present, in manner as set forth in the articles, and shortly after created a riot and disturbance in the north aisle of the parish church (whither the said meeting had adjourned, on a poll being demanded by the friends of Mr. Jones, one of two candidates for the office of parish-warden for the ensuing year, against whom the rector had declared the choice of the parishioners to have fallen on a shew of hands), in the course of which he, Roffey, both further "chode and quarrelled with," and also "assaulted and laid violent hands upon the said Joseph Hurcomb and others," in manner also specified in the articles. Lastly, the articles pleaded that Mr. Palmer, the promovent, the other candidate being the person finally elected to serve as parish-warden with Roffey, the rector's warden for the ensuing year, had been authorized or enjoined by an order of vestry, made on the 18th of April, 1823, to institute the present proceeding against Mr. Roffey [as also another similar proceeding against Mr. Tijou, his sidesman (a)[1]] for his conduct, before pleaded, in the said parish church, on the 1st of April then preceding the occasion articulate.

(a)[1] This was disclaimed by the counsel for the promovent; and the word "moreover" was upon this struck out of the articles.

(a)[2] Newington is within the jurisdiction of the Court of "Peculiars," as one of the several parishes within the deanery of Croydon in Surry: which, together with the several parishes composing the deanery of Shoreham in Kent, and thirteen parishes within the city of London, are subject to the immediate jurisdiction of the Dean of the Arches, as Judge of the Peculiars.

To this the defendant, Mr. Roffey, gave a responsive allegation, consisting also of twelve articles; its general purport and effect being to palliate the nature and circumstances of his altercation with Mr. Hurcomb, whom it expressly charged to have been the "quarreller, chider and brawler," in the first instance; as also that, in effect, he, Roffey, was the person assaulted in the north aisle, namely, by [143] Mr. Hurcomb and his friends, and was not the assailant; and that the only force used on his part (or that of his sidesman Mr. Tijou) was for the necessary protection of his person, alleged to be in peril, from and by reason of the violence of that assault. The allegation also pleaded that, of three witnesses whom it specified, examined upon the articles, the first, Mr. Hurcomb, was himself a party proceeded against in this Court, both for "quarrelling, chiding and brawling," and also for "smiting and laying violent hands" upon a certain person or certain persons, on the occasion articulate; and that the two others, a Mr. Richardson and a Mr. Williams, were also themselves, respectively, parties so proceeded against for "quarrelling, chiding and brawling" (though not for "smiting or laying violent hands") on the said occasion.(a)[2]

Fifteen witnesses were examined upon these articles and nine upon the responsive allegation; most, or the whole, of whom were interrogated at considerable length, so that their depositions constituted together a great mass of evidence. This evidence had been argued upon by counsel on both sides on a preceding Court-day, and the cause now stood for sentence.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit for brawling brought by Samuel Palmer, one of the churchwardens of St. Mary, New-[144]-ington, against Richard Roffey, the other churchwarden; the very description of the parties shewing that in this parish there unfortunately exist differences among the inhabitants. The existence of such differences must be greatly lamented; and the Court would be happy to remove them and to restore harmony among these neighbours and fellow-parishioners: but if that cannot be effected, the Court will at least endeavour to avoid aggravating their animosities, and will therefore abstain from entering into a more minute detail of the subjects of dispute than the impartial administration of justice may render absolutely necessary.

The offence charged in these articles is punishable, as well by the general ecclesiastical law, as by the statute of Edw. the Sixth specially referred to in the articles, and it is an offence subject to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court (as expressed in the case of Wenmouth v. Collins (Lord Raymond, 850)) ratione loci. The object, as well of that general law as of the statute, is evidently to protect the sanctity of (a)[2] These suits were instituted severally against the parties named in Trinity Term, 1823, at the promotion of Mr. England, one of Mr. Roffey's sidesmen. Articles in all three are filed; and witnesses examined. Responsive allegations (brought in, in Easter Term [May] 1824) are also filed in all three; but no witness has, to this time [October, 1824], been produced upon any one of these.

those places and their appurtenances set apart for the worship of the Supreme Being and for the repose of the dead, in which nothing but religious awe and Christian good-will between men should prevail; and to prevent them from being converted with impunity into scenes of human passion and malice, of disturbance and violence.

The sacredness of the place being thus the object of this protecting law, it is no part of the inquiry, where more than one person is implicated in the transaction, which of the two persons so implicated is most to blame, or which of them began the quarrel. There [145] can hardly be a quarrel without two parties; and each who engages in it violates the law, whether he be the most or the least blameable: each is bound to abstain from quarrelling, chiding or brawling in that sacred place.

This, then, being the view and object of the law, the sole question at issue in this suit is, whether the defendant be or be not proved to have committed the offence charged; for if it be proved, the Court is bound to punish the offence, and to administer the law in order to repress the evil.

The history of the transaction out of which the matter arose is shortly as follows:—On Easter Tuesday, 1823, the parishioners of Newington met in vestry as usual, to choose parish officers. The rector nominated as his churchwarden the defendant Roffey, who had served in that capacity the preceding year. Two persons were put in nomination to serve on the part of the parishioners; Mr. Palmer (who had also served the former year) was proposed by one set of parishioners; and a Mr. Jones by another set. On a shew of hands the rector, who was in the chair, declared the choice to have fallen on Mr. Palmer. The friends of Mr. Jones demanded a poll. A poll was accordingly granted; and the meeting was removed into the church for the purpose of taking the poll. I will here, in passing, venture to express some doubt whether, of necessity and as a matter of absolute right, a poll, if demanded, must be granted and must be taken in the church, and must be kept open till midnight; all of which seems to have been assumed upon the occasion: but at all events, if such a proceeding must be had in the church, it must be con-[146]-ducted decently and in order, for the occasion will not justify the violation of that decorum and respect which belongs to the place. Yet the transaction has been treated in some part of the discussion as if it had happened in the street or on Kennington Common. Whereas its taking place in the church constitutes the very gît of the suit.

At this vestry at Newington the mode of proceeding by poll being demanded and allowed, much discussion took place, both before its commencement and during its progress. Mr. Hurcomb, one of the parishioners, addressed the chair upon some point. Mr. Roffey, the rector's churchwarden, standing at the rector's right hand, interrupted Mr. Hurcomb—an altercation took place between them; in the course of which one called the other a "coward," the other retorted by "common informer"—a quarrel arose; and those reproachful terms passed repeatedly between them.

If the view of the Court in respect of the law be correct, both these parties violated it: the offence of one is no justification of the other; both ought to have abstained, and both are offenders. Mr. Roffey, himself a churchwarden, was, by his very office, more especially bound, not only to observe order and decorum himself, but to enforce the due observance of it in others.

Upon Mr. Hurcomb's case the Court is not at present deciding—he is not a party in this suit, but is examined as a witness in it. Yet if there be a suit depending against him on account of the part he took in this transaction, he will act prudently in considering the shortest mode of putting an end to it, instead of persevering in a hopeless defence.

[147] But whichever of the two was most to blame—whichever was the aggressor—there can be no doubt upon the fact that Mr. Roffey has committed the offence, which is rendered penal by the statute, as well as under the general law. If it were material, it is stated by some of Mr. Roffey's own witnesses that he commenced the quarrel.

This part of the transaction alone might be sufficient to compel the Court to pronounce the sentence prayed. The matter however did not end here; nor was it the most offensive part of what took place; for, at a later hour in the evening, there was a disturbance in the north aisle of the church of a still more violent character. About nine o'clock Mr. Roffey quitted his station by the polling-table, and passed over into the north aisle, down which he was proceeding with his hat on—an act itself very indecorous, especially considering Mr. Roffey's official character. Offence was naturally taken at this; and several persons cried out, "Hats off, in this place—Shame! shame!" Though thus reminded, Mr. Roffey does not appear to have taken off his hat. Mr. Hurcomb was at this time standing in the north aisle, and talking to some persons in an adjoining pew. Roffey passed him; but before he got to the bottom of the church, apprehending, as it should seem, that Hurcomb had said something to him, he returned, and addressing Hurcomb, said, "What is that you say, Joe?" at the same time snapping his fingers in his face. In doing this, Mr. Roffey put his hand up in such a manner as to induce several of the by-standers to suppose that he had struck Mr. Hurcomb; but Mr. Hurcomb himself admits, in his evidence, that Roffey did not actually touch his face. [148] Mr. Hurcomb stept back and lifted up his arm to guard himself, and as if to ward off an expected blow; in so doing he pushed Mr. Roffey; but Mr. Roffey's witnesses admit that this was not done with an intention of striking him. A general disturbance immediately ensues: nearly all the persons in the church flock to the place: the constable is called for: and Roffey, being supposed to have struck Hurcomb, is taken into custody by the constable: he struggles: and, partly by his own exertions, partly by the interposition of his friends, and partly by the acquiescence of the constable, at length gets released from custody. Now this undoubtedly constituted a disgraceful tumult in the church, in which the officer appointed to preserve order was himself a party. Possibly Mr. Roffey might have acted under some misapprehension of what Mr. Hurcomb had said as he passed; but whether he apprehended rightly or wrongly, he acted improperly in returning at all, for the purpose of renewing the quarrel in that place. It seems unnecessary therefore to examine very minutely which set of witnesses may have represented the circumstances in detail with most accuracy. Nor is it necessary to state minutely the subsequent circumstances: for even after this disturbance had subsided the parties do not let the matter drop: the rector is afterwards obliged to quit his place at the polling table, in order to go and insist upon Mr. Roffey's forbearing from all further altercation and disturbance.

This is a general outline of the case sufficient to compel the Court to decide that the offence of brawling, charged in the articles, has been proved against the defendant.

[149] The act of parliament directs as a punishment that the offender, if a layman, shall be suspended ab ingressu ecclesiæ, at the discretion of the ordinary. In these days this mode of punishment may not, in all cases, be very appropriate: but, in obedience to the statute, I shall suspend the party ab ingressu ecclesiæ, for the space of one month.

In respect to costs, which in suits of this nature constitute a material part of the consideration, they must, under the circumstances of the present proceeding, follow almost as matter of course. Under possible circumstances, costs may be mitigated; but the present case does not afford grounds for such a mitigation. Mr. Roffey, from his office, was specially called upon to abstain and forbear. The proceeding, on the part of the promoter, cannot be considered as malicious or vindictive. Mr. Palmer was not engaged in the brawling, nor even present upon the occasion. In bringing the suit against Mr. Roffey, he is doing no more than the duty of his office requires of him; and the manner was directed and approved by a considerable number of parishioners who had met in vestry. Perhaps if Mr. Palmer and the other parishioners had directed proceedings to be instituted against those persons generally, who should appear to have been the principal offenders, to whichever party in the parish they might happen to belong, they would have shewn more impartiality, more real regard to public order, and less of party feeling, than by a particular selection. But without in this respect examining too minutely the perfect correctness of their judgment, so far as regards the present suit I do not feel that any sufficient ground is afforded to excuse [150] the defendant, who is pronounced to have committed the offence charged, from being likewise condemned in the costs of the suit.

SUTER v. CHRISTIE AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1824.

—The Court, on cause shewn, will permit a married woman, party in a cause, to appoint a proctor, &c. in the absence of her husband; on giving reasonable security to the other party as to his costs.

(On motion.)

This was a cause or business of proving in solemn form of law the last will and testament of John Rayner, deceased, bearing date the 31st day of May, 1811, promoted by Mary Suter, wife of Thomas Suter (formerly Rayner, widow), the relict of the said deceased, and sole executrix named in the said will, against James Christie, the administrator (with a former will annexed, dated the 23d day of September, 1809), of the effects of the said deceased; and also against the three children of the said deceased, the universal legatees named in the said former will.

The usual decree with intimation under seal of the Court had been duly executed and returned—and the Court was now moved, on behalf of the said Mary Suter, that it would permit the said Mary Suter to appoint a proctor in the absence of her husband, the said Thomas Suter, in order to her proceeding in the said cause or business.

This application was founded upon an affidavit of the said Mary Suter, in which it was stated and sworn "that her husband, the said Thomas Suter, [151] had left this country for the Cape of Good Hope eleven years before; since which time she, the said Mary Suter, had received no pecuniary assistance whatever from him—that the said Thomas Suter was believed to have taken up his permanent residence at the Cape of Good Hope, without there being any probability of his return to this country—and that he had refused to execute the necessary documents, which had been sent over to him in the year 1819, for enabling his said wife to proceed in the above cause."

Under these circumstances the Court was pleased to "give leave to the said Mary Suter to appoint a proctor in the absence of the said Thomas Suter, her husband; on giving such security as the other parties in the cause might deem satisfactory as to their costs." (a)

[152] WILKINSON (FORMERLY LAWES) v. GORDON. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1824.—Quære whether, if A. be convicted of bigamy, as by reason of his marriage with C., living B. his first wife, it is still not competent to A., on C.'s death, to propound his interest as the lawful husband of C. in a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, touching the administration of her effects: and to succeed in such suit on proof shewn; notwithstanding his said conviction for bigamy pleaded and proved.

[Referred to, In re Crippen's Estate, [1911] P. 113.]

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased in this cause, Frances Elizabeth Gordon, otherwise Lawes, died in the month of March, 1820. Soon after her death administration of her effects was committed and granted to Thomas Gordon (party in the cause), as the lawful husband of the deceased. The present suit is in consequence of a decree taken out, in the month of May, 1820, by Susanna Matilda Wilkinson (formerly Lawes), the other party, calling on Mr. Gordon to shew cause why such letters of administration should not be revoked; and why letters of administration of all and singular the goods and chattels of the deceased as dead intestate, without parent and a spinster, should not be committed and granted to her, Wilkinson, as the sister and only next of kin of the deceased.

It is necessary that the Court should state in substance the proceedings and pleadings in the cause, with their several dates.

Gordon's interest as the husband being formally denied, was propounded in an allegation brought in in Michaelmas Term, 1820. It pleaded merely his marriage as "Thomas Gordon, widower," with the deceased, in the parish church of St. Marylebone, on the 13th of September, 1818; and their subsequent cohabitation, as husband and wife, until the death of the deceased in March, 1820. These facts were ad-[153]-mitted in the "answers," and no witness has been examined upon this allegation.

An allegation was brought in on the part of the sister in the same Michaelmas Term. It pleaded the marriage of Thomas Gordon, then a bachelor, to Harriet Cole, (a) Accordingly a proctor, on the 4th session, brought in a bond, under the hands and seals of two persons, in the penal sum of 200l.; conditioned for the payment of costs to the extent of 100l., in case the said Mary Suter, or Thomas Suter, her husband, should thereafter be condemned in the costs of the suit. Then appeared, personally, the said Mary Suter and appointed her proctor; who subsequently propounded the last will of the deceased, bearing date the 31st of May, 1811, in a common condidit, upon which witnesses were examined; and on the 4th Session of Trinity Term the Court revoked the administration (with the will annexed, bearing date the 23d of September, 1809), then before granted to Mr. Christie; pronounced for the validity of the latter will; and decreed probate of the same to the executrix.

spinster, in the parish church of Woolwich, in the county of Kent, on the 11th of May, 1809; and their subsequent cohabitation at Woolwich and "various other places." It then pleaded, in opposition to Gordon's allegation, that he, Gordon, was not a widower at the time of his marriage, de facto, with the party deceased in the cause; for that Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, was then living, and was seen by "divers persons," subsequent to the said pretended marriage; particularly in the month of March, 1819, at Sheerness; and in the month of July, 1820, at Chatham. [This, I must observe, is the only mode in which the history of the first wife is traced out by the sister in her plea: she only pleads that she cohabited with Gordon at Woolwich and other places, not saying where; that she afterwards separated from him, not saying when; that she was seen, subsequent to his second marriage, by divers persons, not saying by whom—nor saying when and where more particularly than that she was so seen "at Sheerness in March, 1819, and at Chatham in July, 1820." It must be obvious that it was quite impossible for Gordon to negative these allegations; unless, by tracing out the history of his first wife, and by proving her death prior to his second marriage.] The allegation then pleaded that Gordon had, on several occasions subsequent to his pretended marriage with Lawes, admitted to "divers persons" that his first wife, to his [154] knowledge, was living at the time: and that he had offered considerable bribes to persons aware of that fact not to give evidence against him in the event of his trial for bigamy. Lastly, it pleaded that Gordon was actually indicted for bigamy at the Old Bailey Sessions in the month of October, 1820, by reason of his marriage with Lawes, living his first wife; and that he was convicted of that offence: it exhibited, in supply of proof, a copy of the record of that conviction; and it concluded by alleging the deceased to have died intestate and a spinster.

Of this allegation, upon which six witnesses have been examined, I will only at present say that it puts the facts of the first and second marriage directly in plea and at issue. It does not intimate, by any means, that the sister rested for proof of her case upon pleading and producing a copy of the record of Gordon's conviction (a) for bigamy; although it made a part of her case.

In reply to this allegation of the sister, it was pleaded by Gordon (in Michaelmas Term, 1821) that his first wife deserted him soon after the marriage, and became a common prostitute; that, some time in 1815, she was admitted into St. Thomas's Hospital as "Mary White;" under which assumed name she had passed for some years preceding, during Gordon's absence from England; and that she died, on the 8th of July, 1815, in that hospital, and was buried as "Mary White" in the burial ground belonging to it. It further pleaded that the indictment for bigamy, articulate, was preferred by Wilkinson; and that, [155] previous to the trial of that indictment (though subsequent, it is to be observed, to the commencement of this cause), she, Wilkinson, had caused hand-bills to be printed and circulated (one of which printed hand-bills it exhibited, in supply of proof) offering a reward of thirty guineas to any person who could prove that Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, was living on the 14th of September, 1818, when Gordon was married to his late wife, the deceased in the cause. It further pleaded that Gordon, subsequent to his conviction for bigamy articulate, had received his majesty's free pardon, and it also exhibited a copy of the original warrant of pardon, in supply of proof of that fact. Lastly, it pleaded that the property of the deceased, in virtue of a settlement made before her marriage, was secured to Gordon in case of his surviving her; but that the deceased, having been taunted by her sister, then Lawes, but now Wilkinson (party in the cause), as not the lawful wife of Gordon; and being anxious to secure her property to him at all events and under any circumstances; had made and executed a will in duplicate, or rather two wills of precisely the same tenor and effect, in the months of June and July, 1820; the one part, or one of the two wills being signed Frances Elizabeth Gordon, and the other Frances Elizabeth Lawes, spinster, her maiden name; whereby she appointed Gordon her sole executor and universal legatee: and the allegation concluded by pleading and propounding this will, or these wills, in the usual form. Upon this allegation, and certain additional articles, pleading merely the death, character, and hand-writing of one of the two sub-[156]-scribed witnesses to the will, thirteen witnesses have been examined.

(a) Differing in this respect, it is to be observed, from the libel in the cause of Bromley v. Bromley, vide note (c), page 158, post.

To this, again, it was replied on the part of the sister, Mrs. Wilkinson, that the deceased, even prior to her marriage with Gordon in 1818, had been attacked by paralysis, in consequence of which she laboured under considerable mental debility; that, subsequent to her marriage, she became more and more deranged (of which fact the allegation purports to furnish many specific instances); that, from the latter part of 1818 till her death, she was in the custody of, and extremely ill used by, Gordon; and that, at the time of the pretended execution of the will propounded by Gordon, she was of unsound mind, memory, and understanding.

Ten witnesses have been examined on this allegation, which was brought in in Easter Term, 1822: and to this again it has been finally replied, on Gordon's part, to the effect that the deceased was a person, at all times, of unimpaired capacity; and that she was uniformly treated by Gordon with conjugal affection.

Such is the substance of the proceedings and pleadings; from which it appears that the case before the Court has a double aspect. So far as respects the question whether Gordon is entitled to the property of the deceased, as dead intestate in law, it is an interest cause; and Gordon, in the event of the deceased's intestacy, must prove himself to have been the lawful husband of the deceased, in order to sustain his claim. In the other event that fact is immaterial—for Gordon under the will is equally en-[157]-titled to her whole property, whether he has succeeded in proving himself to have been the lawful husband of the deceased or whether he has failed.

I must here observe, however, that the first of these questions being determined in favor of Gordon, he has clearly no need to resort to the will: for, as a feme covert, the deceased could only die intestate in law. And this, I think, sufficiently accounts for the late period at which the will is said to have been produced in the cause; and which has been much observed upon in the argument. It was not incumbent on Gordon to produce this will until after his conviction for bigamy had been pleaded, and the sister had alleged the deceased to have died intestate and a spinster—a circumstance which, I think, sufficiently removes any objection to its validity, as to be deduced from its alleged late production. Besides, the genuineness of this will is not questioned; it is admitted to have been actually executed by the deceased at the time when it bears date: it is only objected to on the ground of the deceased's incapacity at that time. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the time at which this will was produced has no tendency to impeach the fairness of this part of the transaction.

The first, then, if not the principal question is, did the deceased Gordon or Lawes die a wife or a spinster?

A fact of marriage between the deceased and Gordon is admitted. Consequently, the legal presumption, according to a well known maxim, is in favor of its validity, which it rests with the sister, who calls it in question, to impeach. And this she is said to have done, not merely primâ facie, but conclusively, by [158] producing a copy of the record of Gordon's conviction for bigamy: this is said to have impeached the validity of the second marriage conclusively, so that the Court is estopped from further inquiry into this part of the case.

To sustain this position it has been argued, in the first place, that, according to the rule laid down in Searle's case, "felonies, whereof parties have been convicted, are not re-examinable in other Courts." Now that this is true, sub modo, not only of felonies, but also (at least of one species) of misdemeanors, may be admitted on the authority of Searle's case (Hob. 121, ib. 288); on that of Boyle (3 Mod. 164. Comb. 72); on the case of Sir George Bromley: (c) [159] and on the authority, probably, of some other cases. But the suit in which the verdict of conviction was deemed conclusive in each of those cases was this: it was a personal suit, founded immediately upon that offence of which the defendant (the party proceeded against) had so been convicted. Consequently, none of those cases are in point to the verdict being even admissible evidence, much more to its being conclusive evidence, in a civil cause upon a mere question of property between plaintiff and defendant: which is the character of the present suit.

[160] The maxim principally, however, relied upon in support of the position contended for on the part of the sister is that laid down by Mr. Justice Buller, in his Law of Nisi Prius, viz. "That a conviction in a Court of criminal jurisdiction (generally) is conclusive evidence of the fact if it afterwards come, collaterally, in controversy in a Court of civil jurisdiction" (Buller's Nisi Prius, 7th edit. 245). But, if this be the rule at all, it is subject to many limitations; nor does the case of Boyle v. Boyle, to which the Court has just referred, cited by Mr. Justice Buller in support of his maxim, by any means bear it out as a general position. On the contrary, the doubt seems rather to have been—it has often been gravely questioned (b)—whether verdicts which have been given in criminal proceedings can be admitted in evidence in civil causes of this description at all: because the parties are not the same in the civil suit as in the criminal cause, where the King is always, at least technically and nominally, the prosecutor; and because the party in the civil suit, on whose behalf the evidence is supposed to be offered, might have been a witness on the criminal prosecution. If, indeed, the conviction were really upon the evidence of a party interested in the civil action to admit the record of conviction to be given in evidence at all, would be in the teeth of that salutary maxim, which prohibits parties to suits from giving evidence for themselves. Non constat, but that the sister was a witness upon the trial of this indictment: she [161] is not proved not to have been. So again it might very reasonably be questioned whether the verdict should be admitted in evidence at all, where, as in this instance, the criminal proceeding had been pretty clearly instituted only to make use of that verdict, in case of the conviction of the party proceeded against in the civil suit.

Generally speaking, however, I apprehend the true rule to be that a record of conviction is evidence of the same fact in a civil cause, only that it is not conclusive evidence. This is the rule to be collected from the following case, as cited by Chief Baron Gilbert (Law of Evidence, 33, 34), and which appears to me in principle hardly by the Court at York to the High Court of Delegates, which reversed the sentence appealed from, and admitted the libel to proof—and subsequently pronounced for the divorce as prayed by her ladyship—who afterwards procured an act of parliament dissolving the marriage.

It is to be observed, however, that the rejection of this libel by the Court at York did not proceed upon any supposed impropriety in the structure of the libel; or upon any supposed necessity that the practices in question should be specifically pleaded in the libel, in order to their being proved in that Court, in addition to its pleading the conviction and exhibiting a copy of the record. It proceeded upon a misconception (as it now seems) with respect to the sufficiency of a mere attempt to commit, &c. to found a sentence to the effect of that prayed by Lady Bromley.

So in the case of Ellenthorp v. Myers and Moss (in the High Court of Delegates, 1773), cited in argument by the counsel for the sister in support of their position as to the verdict being conclusive evidence (but with little effect, this last being a criminal proceeding), the articles merely pleaded the defendant's conviction of an assault, with intent to commit, &c., and exhibited a copy of the record; as the libel pleaded and exhibited in the subsequent case of Bromley v. Bromley. This latter proceeding, that of Ellenthorp v. Myers and Moss, was also a cause depending, in the first instance, in the Consistory Court of York, and was described as—"The office of the Judge, promoted by Myers and Moss, churchwardens of Weston, in the county and diocese of York, against Ellenthorp the vicar, for correction of his manners, &c. especially in respect of his having been convicted of an assault upon, &c. with intent to commit, &c." in order to his, the said Ellenthorp's, "deprivation."

(b) As in Hillyard v. Grantham, cited by Lord Hardwicke in Brownsword v. Edwards, 2 Ves. 246; and in Gibson v. M'Carty, Rep. temp. Hardw. 311; and in Hathaway v. Barrow, 1 Campb. 151. See Phillips on Evidence, 256, 260.

distinguishable from the present. "If a man has two wives, and be thereof convicted, and dies, and the second wife claims dower, the verdict and conviction cannot be given (i.e. conclusively given) in evidence, but, in this case, the writ must go to the bishop: for whether the marriage be lawful or not is the point in controversy, and that is of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and is not to be decided at common law. But the verdict may be made an exhibit in the cause before the bishop, to induce him to believe there was a former marriage."

Such, then, I apprehend to be the true rule, generally speaking. And if there ever was a case of this description, in which the record of conviction ought not to be deemed conclusive evidence to the commission of the fact by the party against whom it is pleaded, it seems to me to be the present for several reasons.

In the first place, it clearly appears that the case on the trial was sustained by the single testimony of Nelly [162] Baker (a witness who came forward in consequence of an advertisement offering thirty guineas for evidence to convict the party) as to identity, viz. as to whether a woman who had cohabited for several years with a person named Owens, a seaman, at one time on board his majesty's ship the "Cadmus," was, as she, Baker, deposed, the identical Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, Gordon's first wife, on which the conviction proceeded. All that Johnson (another witness) deposed in corroboration of Baker was that the woman who had so cohabited with Owens was living in 1819 and 1820—he only knew her to be Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, from Baker's information. And how was Gordon to defend himself against Baker's evidence? It could only be by proving his first wife, of whom it is clear that he knew nothing, as of his own knowledge, subsequent to the year 1812, to have been dead at the time of his second marriage in 1818. This he seems indeed to have attempted—he seems, at the time of his trial, to have had some clue to the fact (if it be) of her having assumed the names of Mary White, and having died in St. Thomas's Hospital in 1815: for a woman named Cowen deposed to that effect on the trial; it being also proved on the trial that Mary White, or a female passing by these names, actually died in St. Thomas's Hospital in July, 1815. But Cowen's evidence (which went to a single interview with Gordon, formerly Cole, then passing, as she deposed, by the names of Mary White in 1815, just prior to her alleged admission into St. Thomas's Hospital) obtained less credence with the jury than the more circumstantial evidence of Baker: the rather, it should seem, as a woman named [163] Millington, produced to the same fact with Cowen, was discredited from her bad character, and very probably was deposing falsely on the trial. Her very production indeed to that fact seems not only to have neutralized Cowen's evidence; but to have given an unfavorable colour, in the eyes of the jury, to Gordon's whole case. Still, however, Gordon in effect was convicted upon the testimony of a single witness brought forward in consequence of the advertisement to which I have alluded, put in circulation by the real prosecutrix, the party in this suit: who plainly indicted and procured the conviction of Gordon, in order to avail herself of the effect, be it what it might, of that conviction in this Court; where a cause solely dependent (or then supposed to be) on the same fact was actually in progress. This conduct on the sister's part the Court will observe upon presently—whether these circumstances, namely, Baker's coming forward in consequence of this hand-bill, &c. appeared on the trial at the Old Bailey, I am not aware.

In the next place, I am to remember that the party convict, in this instance, is pleaded and proved to have actually received his majesty's free pardon, a circumstance which materially lessens the effect of that conviction, whatever it might otherwise have been in the cause. For it is notorious that the prerogative of pardon reserved to the chief magistrate is never exercised indiscriminately or capriciously—that the Crown never interposes but upon just grounds after all due attention to the merits and circumstances of the case. It has been argued that the "frofeiture" enures notwithstanding the pardon. So it does; but the Crown [164] is obviously disposed to take no benefit of the forfeiture.

Nor does a circumstance, on the other hand, which has been strongly insisted upon, tend much to fortify the effect of the verdict, so weakened and derogated from, as I have just said, by the pardon. It is pleaded and, I think, proved that Gordon, prior to the trial, did attempt to bribe some of the proposed witnesses, or, as it is termed, to buy off evidence. This, however, though a highly improper act, does not, as contended, necessarily infer any consciousness of guilt on his part. The offence charged was one of which, however intentionally innocent, he might, in fact, have been guilty. The first wife might have been living in 1818, though he had supposed her to be dead. Under these circumstances, that Gordon, a sea-faring man, naturally under great alarm at the charge, should act as imputed to him, is a circumstance which, blameable as it is, is quite consistent with the death of the first wife prior to the second marriage. As for his "admissions" (pleaded) "to divers persons" that he "knew of his first wife being alive at the time of his second marriage," not one of these "divers persons" has been produced who speaks to them; so that these allegations themselves at best are good for nothing.

In proof of one thing the verdict is clearly good, viz. that Baker was believed, and that Cowen was disbelieved, by the jury. But the case now stands upon other evidence; so that the Court's arriving at a different conclusion is no impeachment of the finding of the jury. Baker, indeed, as I shall presently shew, [165] is still in effect the single witness as to this part of the case, on the one side. But Cowen's testimony, which stood alone at the Old Bailey, is here fortified and confirmed by the testimony of two other witnesses: and which puts the case that she failed to sustain at the Old Bailey nearly, I think, above all suspicion as stands upon the evidence in this Court. And the Court, I am of opinion, is at full liberty to look into that evidence, notwithstanding the verdict.

The sister, of course, undertook to prove the case which she has set up in plea; nor will it be denied that she has had ample opportunities of redeeming her pledge, if it was capable of being redeemed. Up to this time, however, the sister's case in this part of it, as already hinted, still rests in effect upon the single testimony of this woman, Baker.

Now was the evidence of Baker difficult of corroboration, had the fact upon which this part of the case turns really been, that a female who cohabited for several years with this Owens, and who confessedly was living years subsequent to Gordon's second marriage, was the identical Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, his first wife? It was the very contrary of this. What is the history of Cole, the first wife, as given by Baker herself? It is this—"That she became acquainted with Gordon and his wife in or about the years 1808 and 1809, at Sheerness; where she, Baker, was then lodging at the house of a person named Doding, who was cook on board his majesty's ship the 'Heroine' (thentofore called the 'Venus'), of which ship Gordon was the gunner; that Gordon was a married man and lived on board the said ship, but used to come on shore there very often, almost daily, with his wife; [166] and that deponent, by frequently seeing them at that time (the said ship at that time lying) at Sheerness, became well acquainted with the said Thomas and Harriet Gordon." Gordon, then, formerly Cole, the first wife, according to this evidence, must have been a person well known at Sheerness; as, indeed, also appears from other evidence in the cause. But so, it likewise appears, from the evidence of this same Baker, from that of Johnson, from the evidence of Davis, and that of other witnesses, must have been the female who long cohabited with Owens. And yet the identity of this female with Cole, and consequently the sister's whole case, is left to depend on the single evidence of Baker. Johnson here, as at the Old Bailey, only proves that this female was living in 1819 and 1820; of her identity with Cole he still, as before, knows nothing but from Baker's information. Had such been the fact, there could, I think, have been no dearth of witnesses to prove it. One of the sister's witnesses (a witness on her first allegation) is a woman named Shott. Shott and her husband were keeping a public-house at Woolwich in 1809, and there became acquainted with Gordon, who introduced Cole to this deponent, prior to his marriage with her; they were actually married from the house of this deponent, to which they returned after the ceremony, and at which they cohabited on the wedding night. The witness, Shott, then, could have clearly identified this female as Cole, had she really been Cole. Now it appears by her answers to an interrogatory that Shott actually accompanied the sister to Sheerness and Chatham at the time the hand-bills were distributed, at and about which very time, as deposed by Johnson, the female whom Baker as-[167]-serted to be Cole was seen by that witness at Chatham. Now Shott could have deposed to her identity with Cole upon her own knowledge; and so have fortified Baker's evidence, not as Johnson does, which is really no corroboration, but in truth and substance. And yet of any attempt to confront Shott with this female there is no vestige in the case.

But how again does this single witness, Baker stand before the Court in point of credit? In the first place, she is a witness brought in by an advertisement intimating that whoever will depose to a certain fact shall entitle himself to a reward of thirty guineas. Had the sister attempted by these means to prove evidence in this cause immediately, and in the first instance; I am warranted by the case of Pool v. Sacheverel,(a) to which I have referred by counsel, [168] in saying that it would have been a proceeding on her part highly criminal, amounting, itself, to a contempt of the Court: and it may be safely left with every one for himself to determine whether the transaction in question is much alleviated, at least in point of moral guilt, by the circuitous course which has been adopted of producing her evidence to this Court upon the present occasion. But I am principally considering the circumstance as it affects the credit of Baker—and it is clearly a circumstance which in my judgment renders Baker, at least, no entire witness in [169] the cause, whatever might be its effect upon her testimony at the Old Bailey, on the trial for bigamy, which this Court does not presume to determine. Here, however, at least in my judgment, it renders her no entire witness; she is, at least, a witness open to suspicion; and requiring to be corroborated as upon this ground only.

But, further, an exceptive allegation has been given to Baker's evidence after publication, pleading that the female who cohabited with Owens, as deposed by Baker, was not the identical Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, as she, Baker, had sworn, but divers, namely, a person occasionally passing by other names, but whose real denomination was Caroline Lindsel; and further, pleading that she, Baker, in May, 1821, subsequent to her examination, had been confronted with Lindsel, when she admitted Lindsel to be the party of whom she had deposed as cohabiting with Owens; at the same time admitting her not to be Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, Gordon's first wife.

(a) The case of Pool v. Sacheverel, in substance, was this. It was the case of a motion for the commitment of a party who had put forth an advertisement in the public prints that whoever would discover and make legal proof against a marriage in question in a suit then depending in the Court (the Court of Chancery) should have 100l. reward. The motion being made before the Lord Chancellor (Parker), it was adjourned by him to the next seal, when he pronounced his opinion (in substance, as follows) with great solemnity.

This tends to the suborning of witnesses; is very dangerous; and not only greatly criminal, but is a contempt of the Court, being a means of preventing justice in a cause now depending—and as the Court may, so in justice it ought, to punish this proceeding.

It has been objected that nothing has been done in consequence of this advertisement: that no witness has come in.

Resp. It does not appear but that some person would come in were this not discouraged: however, the person moved against has done his part, and if not successful, is still not the less criminal.

Obj. This is not an offer to any particular person.

Resp. It is the more criminal, as it may corrupt more. This advertisement will come to all persons, to rogues as well as to honest men—and it is a strange way of arguing to say that offering a reward to one witness is criminal, but that offering it to more than one is not so.

Obj. A person coming in for such a reward is no witness, for his testimony must be rejected.

Resp. It is so of every witness suborned or bribed—he is no witness if you prove him bribed.

It is a reproach to the justice of the nation, and an insufferable thing, to make a public offer in print to procure evidence; and is tantamount to saying that such persons as will come in and swear, or procure others to swear, such a thing, shall have 100l. reward; and this in a cause now depending here. If 100l. is to be allowed, the same reason will hold as to allowing 500l. or 1000l. And though the intention of the person so advertising may be innocent (and I, knowing the man, Mr. Pool, believe it was so in this instance), yet the justice of the Court, nay, the justice of the nation, being concerned in so public a case, I cannot dismiss the party, though his counsel offer to pay costs to the other party; but in justice and for example's sake he must stand committed. 1 P. Wms. 675-8.

This allegation, it will be seen, is express to the diversity of the female who so cohabited with Owens, as well as exceptive to the testimony of Baker. The evidence to diversity taken upon this allegation is defective, as I shall presently shew; yet still it is not without great effect on the testimony of Baker. For Rawlins, a witness examined upon this exceptive allegation, deposes that Baker, on being confronted with Lindsel, admitted her to be the female of whom she had deposed as cohabiting with Owens; only insisting that Lindsel had passed herself to her as Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, Gordon's first wife, whom Baker then admitted that otherwise "she had [170] never seen." If, then, Rawlins is to be relied on, there is an end of Baker's evidence. He goes on to depose that he prepared an affidavit to that effect to be sworn to by Baker, which afterwards she declined making, "for fear," as she expressed it, "of getting into trouble in consequence of what she had sworn at the trial."

The evidence to diversity upon this allegation is incomplete, as already hinted, for this reason. There is no direct evidence to this Lindsel, after all, not being Harriet Cole, Gordon's first wife. Of the three witnesses examined upon this allegation, Davis and Rawlins had never seen the first wife; and Brooks, the third witness, Cole's aunt (a witness expressly produced to the diversity) only deposes to being introduced to a woman "whom she is told is Caroline Lindsel," and whom she readily declares not to be Harriet Gordon, formerly Cole, her niece. But owing, I rather presume, to some oversight, there has no witness been examined to prove that the woman so introduced to Brooks was the identical Caroline Lindsel, Owen's paramour, deposed of as such by the other witnesses. Had this been done, the evidence to diversity, upon this allegation, had been complete. It is said in explanation that Lindsel herself was meant to be examined, but died in the interval; this, indeed, is explanatory of, but it does not directly supply, the defect; and the evidence to diversity upon this allegation is still, strictly speaking, incomplete. But as exceptive to the testimony of Baker it is nearly conclusive; and in further apology for its defectiveness in the other particular I am to recollect that, the identity not being pleaded, Gordon had no [171] opportunity of pleading the diversity of the parties in question before publication, and that any fact must not only be pleaded more restrictively in an exceptive allegation than prior to publication, but that it must also be more strictly examined to.

But I am, lastly, also to recollect that a fact was pleaded by Gordon, decisive in effect, as to the diversity of this female with Cole, and indeed of the whole case, prior to publication. For it was pleaded by Gordon, in the first instance, that Cole was admitted into St. Thomas's Hospital under the assumed names of Mary White on the 6th of July, 1815—and that she died there, and was interred in the burial ground belonging to that hospital in the course of that month. That a female so calling herself died and was buried at the time and place articulate is indisputably proved and is undisputed. Is the identity of that female with Cole established in evidence? If so, that fact is decisive.

An attempt was made to prove this identity on the trial at the Old Bailey, which failed, as I have already said. But two additional witnesses have been examined to that identity in this Court who positively depose to the fact—and who tell, I think, no improbable story. I allude to the witnesses Lister and Harrison. Lister deposes that she had known Cole both before and after her marriage with Gordon—that she knew her to have been passing by the names of Mary White in the years 1813 and 1814—that she knew of her intention to apply for admission into St. Thomas's Hospital prior to her being actually admitted—that she afterwards went to St. Thomas's Hospital, and inquired for her as Mary White, and there saw her—[172] this she says was in July, 1815, but she forgets the day—that she found her very ill and promised to take her some tea and sugar on the following day—but that on the following day, when she went with the tea and sugar, she was told that "Mary White," as they called her, had died on that morning—and she, Lister, then deposes that she was actually shewn the body, which she positively identifies as that of Cole, Gordon's first wife. Harrison's (her mother's) account is in precise unison with this—the discrepancies between these witnesses are such as rather confirm than impeach the truth of their story; with which the evidence of Cowen in substance concurs. Here then are three witnesses distinctly proving the death of the first wife in 1815; and what is there to discredit Lister and Harrison? A jury has not disbelieved them, though it refused its credence to Cowen—and neither the general character nor the particular testimony of either of these witnesses has been excepted to; though the sister has given an exceptive allegation to the testimony of Phœbe Wood, a witness examined upon Gordon's third allegation, whose evidence comparatively was of no moment in the cause. Had Lister and Harrison been produced at the Old Bailey, the verdict might, not to say must, have been different—and this Court would be justified to itself in arriving at a different conclusion from that of the jury, upon the new proofs now adduced, were this at all necessary.

But the Court is not placed in the predicament of being forced to arrive at any such conclusion, in order to sustain (if not his interest, technically speaking, as the husband, still) Gordon's right to the deceased's whole property. For a will is set up, giving the [173] whole property to Gordon—and the factum of that will is, I think, sufficiently proved. It is pleaded, on the other hand, that the deceased was incapable at the time and was in Gordon's custody. It might be sufficient for the Court to state on this part of the case that the allegation of incapacity is one which even the sister's own witnesses wholly fail to sustain. They are so various, so inconsistent, so overthrown by admitted facts in the cause, that the deceased's capacity is in no degree materially affected, even by their evidence. But, as opposed to the adverse case, the Court has no doubt of the deceased's full capacity. Far again from thinking the disposition improbable, as argued, or as itself indicative of duress, I think it much the contrary. The deceased had, prior to her marriage with Gordon, been in a weak and nervous state—resulting principally, it should seem, from the suicide of a person who was paying his addresses to her at that time in 1815. But that she had sustained any attack of paralysis, prior to her marriage with Gordon, as pleaded, there is no proof. She resided with her mother in Foley Place till the death of the latter in 1818—leaving the greater part of her property to this daughter, away from her other daughter (party in this cause), who was living separate from her mother and sister (the deceased) in lodgings of her own. On the death of her mother the deceased became a boarder in the family of Mr. William Gordon, brother of Thomas Gordon, in Grafton Street, with whose wife she had been previously intimate—and here it was that she became acquainted with Thomas Gordon, to whom she was married in the following September. That this marriage was brought about by [174] any fraud practised upon an incapable person is fully disproved by the history of the marriage, and particularly by the marriage settlement—drawn up by a solicitor, as he deposes, from the deceased's own verbal instructions, and securing her property to herself in as ample a manner as the most cautious and wary person could require it to be secured. In short, it is quite preposterous to suggest upon the evidence before the Court that this was a marriage unduly obtained. Subsequent to her marriage the deceased is repeatedly taunted by this sister, with whom she had been previously on bad terms relative to pecuniary affairs, with not being the true wife of Gordon—for that he, Gordon, had a former wife living to her knowledge, and whom she "could produce in a fortnight," and more to the same effect, which is not worth repeating. That the deceased, a weak nervous woman, so taunted and reproached, was often in tears and distress after her marriage—is not to be wondered at—any more than it is that she withdrew on one occasion for a short period from cohabiting with Gordon. The first of these circumstances infers no incapacity; nor does the latter any ill-treatment of the deceased by Gordon, it being well to be accounted for by other considerations. In the spring of 1819 the parties went to reside at a house in Little Gower Place, where they continued to live for eight or nine months, during which it is I think proved that they lived on affectionate terms, and that the husband was kind and attentive to the wife: in particular, it is proved that the wife kept the purse, and that she was jealous in maintaining what she considered her rights in that respect. It is [175] here that the will propounded is made—and that the deceased, so situated, should take the precaution of making this will, in order to secure her property to Gordon at all events, is a circumstance that appears to me any thing but unlikely.

It is objected, however, that this will was not drawn up by her solicitor. Now the deceased, who is spoken of as an extremely penurious woman, might object to employ a solicitor on the score of expence. Her marriage settlement was drawn up by a solicitor, at probably no inconsiderable cost—and the deceased might object to encounter a similar expence by the employment of a regular solicitor to make her will. Of one of the two subscribed witnesses, a person named Stromach, an intimate friend of the Gordons, being also the person who prepared or drew up the will, the Court has only evidence, but satisfactory evidence, to the death, character, and handwriting; but the other subscribed witness, a young man, the husband's nephew, then about sixteen years old, an articled clerk to a solicitor, has been examined, and speaks to the factum of this will in a manner which leaves no doubt upon the mind of the Court of this being a bonâ fide transaction, and having passed in substance as he represents it. The will so executed is delivered to Mr. William Gordon, brother of Thomas Gordon, and a trustee under the deceased's marriage settlement, for safe custody; and it is produced under the circumstances to which I have already adverted —as soon, in my judgment, as it was at all incumbent on the executor to produce it. Under these circumstances I have no difficulty in pronouncing for, and decreeing probate of, this will to Mr. Gordon, as executor, with-[176]-out positively deciding, it not being necessary to decide, that he has sustained his interest as the husband of deceased. And thinking the sister's charge of incapacity disproved; and at the same time quite concurring with Mr. Gordon's counsel in their observations on the gross impropriety of one of the means used by the sister to procure evidence in this cause, I condemn her in costs from the time of her allegation (pleading the incapacity of the deceased) given in in Easter Term, 1822.

[177] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE, PROMOTED BY GATES v. CHAMBERS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1824.—An allegation—responsive to articles filed against the defendant, a clergyman, for a violation of the 48th canon by officiating out of his diocese; as also for obstructing a licenced curate in the performance of divine service—admitted to proof—from the probable tendency of the facts pleaded to render it at least a case for mitigated costs if not to amount to a complete legal defence as to both parts of the charge.

[Referred to, Martin v. Mackonochie, 1879, 4 Q. B. D. 769.]

(By letters of request from the Consistorial Court of Peterborough.)

This was a cause of office brought by letters of request from the Consistorial and Episcopal Court of Peterborough, and promoted by John Gates, Esq.,(a) against the Rev. James Chambers, clerk, curate of the parish of Willoughby, in the county of Warwick, and diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, touching and concerning his soul's health, &c., especially for having "read prayers, and preached in the parish church of Byfield, in the county of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, as the minister or curate of the said parish, on Sunday, the 14th of September, in the year 1823, without any licence or permission first had from the Right Rev. Father in God, Herbert, Lord Bishop of Peterborough, or any other competent authority"—and also —for having thereby "obstructed the Rev. Samuel Stanley Paris, clerk, the curate of the said parish of Byfield, duly licenced, in the performance of his clerical duties"—in violation of the 48th canon, and against the laws and constitutions ecclesiastical of this realm.

[178] The "articles," which were admitted without opposition (after pleading that "by the laws, canons, and constitutions ecclesiastical of this realm, no person in holy orders of the Church of England can lawfully perform the duties of a curate, or officiate as such, without the permission of the bishop of the diocese or the ordinary of the place, having episcopal jurisdiction, first had and obtained, and reciting the 48th of the Canons of 1603), went on to plead that, on or about the 15th of July, 1817, Mr. Chambers, the defendant, was duly licenced to the curacy of Willoughby, in the county of Warwick, and diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, by the lord bishop of that diocese, on the nomination of the Rev. Nathaniel Bridges, D.D., vicar of the said parish (of which parish it was afterwards pleaded that the said Rev. James Chambers continued to be, on the 14th of September, 1823, and still at the issue of the citation was, licenced curate)—and that on or about the 30th of November, 1822, the Rev. Samuel Stanley Paris, clerk, was licenced by the Lord Bishop of Peterborough to the curacy of Byfield, in the county of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, to which he was nominated by the Rev. Charles Wetherell, clerk, the rector of Byfield; and that on Sunday, the 14th of September, 1823, the said Rev. S. S. Paris, clerk, was, and continued to be, curate of Byfield, aforesaid, in virtue of the said licence. The articles then proceeded to object that on the said Sunday, the 14th of September, 1823, the said Rev. James Chambers, still being curate of Willoughby, as aforesaid, did, without any licence or permission from the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Peterborough, or any other lawful [179] authority whatever, contrary to the ecclesiastical law and canon aforesaid, take possession of the reading desk attached to the pulpit, in the parish church of Byfield aforesaid, and declare his determination to perform divine service in the said church—that Richard Sheppard, one of the churchwardens of the parish, thereon requested him to leave the said reading desk, and to permit the aforesaid Rev. S. S. Paris, clerk, the licenced curate of Byfield, to perform the duty—that the said curate, the said Rev. S. S. Paris, himself also remonstrated with the said Rev. James Chambers, and requested him to leave the said reading desk, and not to obstruct him, the said Rev. S. S. Paris, in the performance of his duty—warning the said Rev. James Chambers that if he persevered in his attempt, his conduct would be brought to the notice of the bishop of the diocese—but that the said Rev. James Chambers, notwithstanding such remonstrance and warning, refused to quit the reading desk, and did officiate as the minister or curate of the said parish, by reading the service of the day, and preaching a sermon; and did thereby obstruct the said Rev. S. S. Paris in the performance of his duty as the licenced curate of the said parish. And the articles concluded by praying that the said Rev. James Chambers, the defendant, might be duly and canonically punished and corrected according to the exigency of the law, and might be condemned in the costs of the suit made and to be made on the part of the promovent.

To these articles it was pleaded, responsively, on the part of Mr. Chambers, the defendant, in substance,

That the Rev. Charles Wetherell, clerk, the rector [180] of the parish of Byfield articulate, was, in the years 1822 or 1823, and still is, resident in the rectory house, and performing his duties as rector of the said parish; that in or about September, 1822, the said Rev. Charles Wetherell engaged the Rev. Samuel Stanley Paris, clerk, to become his assistant curate in the said parish at an annual stipend of 100l.; such engagement to determine at the expiration of three months' notice to that effect given by either party; that the said Rev. S. S. Paris, accordingly, was nominated to the Lord Bishop of Peterborough to be licenced to the said curacy; and was actually so licenced on or about the 13th of November, 1822; that in such licence the said Lord Bishop of Peterborough, without any nomination to that effect from the said Rev. Charles Wetherell, appointed the stipend of the said Rev. S. S. Paris at 120l. instead of 100l.(a) per annum; but that the said Rev. S. S. Paris declared, previous to entering upon his duty, that it was not his intention to insist on such increased stipend, but to abide by his engagement to serve the said cure for 100l. per annum only; that the said Rev. Charles Wetherell, being dissatisfied with the conduct of the said Rev. S. S. Paris as such (assistant) curate, did on or about the 6th of January, 1823, express the same to the said Rev. S. S. Paris, upon which they mutually [181] agreed to part at the end of three months from that time or sooner, if agreeable to both parties; that subsequent to the said agreement the said Rev. S. S. Paris giving fresh offence, was on or about the 24th of January, 1823, required by the said Rev. Charles Wetherell to quit his said curacy immediately, in consequence of which notice he, the said Rev. S. S. Paris, absented himself on the following Sunday, the 26th of January aforesaid, from the said church of Byfield; that on the Monday following, the 27th of January, the said Rev. S. S. Paris admitted to the said Rev. Charles Wetherell that he had neglected his duty as well to the said parish as to a school for the education of the poor, established in the same, his services at which had been stipulated for on his taking his said curacy; and expressed his sorrow for having given cause of offence to the said Rev. Charles Wetherell, who assured him of his forgiveness, but still required him to quit the said curacy at the expiration of three months from the said 6th of January; that in the course of the same week the father of the said Rev. S. S. Paris interceded with the said Rev. Charles Wetherell for the continuance of his son in the said curacy; and that the said Rev. Charles Wetherell then consented to permit the said Rev. S. S. Paris to take part in the duties of the said church and parish till the expiration of the three months aforesaid, though at the same time he positively refused to continue him as his assistant curate beyond that period, upon which understanding the said Rev. S. S. Paris was permitted to take his share of the duty on the following Sunday, the 2d of February; that the said Rev. S. S. Paris did not continue to be, [182] and was not, as articulate, the curate of the said parish of Byfield, in virtue of the licence articulate, on the Sunday, the 14th of September, 1823; for that from and after the expiration of three months from the said 6th day of the said month of January he, the said Rev. S. S. Paris, was not the curate of the said parish, but had been dismissed from the said curacy as aforesaid; that on or about the 25th day of February, 1823, the said Rev. Charles Wetherell gave information to the Lord Bishop of Peterborough that he had dismissed the said Rev. S. S. Paris from his said curacy, and requested that his licence might be withdrawn; and that he had several times tendered the said Rev. S. S. Paris his stipend, at the rate of 100l. per annum up to the expiration of three months from the said 6th of January; that the said S. S. Paris had not officiated in the said church or parish between the 2d of February and the 14th of September, 1823, and that the said Rev. Charles Wetherell had himself performed all the duty of the said parish during that period. [The above is the substance of the three first articles.] The allegation then pleaded in substance that the Rev. James Chambers, clerk (the defendant), did not commit the offence or offences articulate on Sunday the 14th of September, 1823, at the parish church of Byfield, as articulate; that on the said Sunday he, the said Rev. James Chambers, attended at the said parish church to perform the morning service, pursuant to the request of the said Rev. Charles Wetherell, then absent from Byfield in attendance upon a sick wife at Malvern; that previous to proceeding to the said church the said Rev. James Chambers pro-[183]-duced his licence from the Lord Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry to William Farebrother, one of the churchwardens of the said parish, who accompanied the said Rev. James Chambers to the said church and gave him possession of the reading desk; that before he had commenced the service the said Rev. S. S. Paris came up to the said reading desk, accompanied by Richard Sheppard, the other churchwarden articulate, and desired to officiate as curate of the said parish; declaring moreover that the said Rev. James Chambers, by persisting in doing the duty, would incur the displeasure of the bishop of the diocese; that the said Rev. James Chambers then declared that he came there to do the said duty at the express desire of the rector, who had informed him that the said Rev. S. S. Paris was no longer his curate; and further declared that, not being aware that he was offending against any law by merely assisting a friend in his absence, he should persist in doing the duty, though he disclaimed all idea of acting perversely, or in the spirit of defiance; that the said Rev. James Chambers then promised at the instance of the said Rev. S. S. Paris to admit at any time that the said Rev. S. S. Paris was then ready, and had claimed, to perform the service; on which they parted; and the said Rev. James Chambers proceeded to, and did, perform the said service, as requested by the said Rev. Charles Wetherell, the rector.

The admission of this allegation was opposed, on behalf of the promovent, as neither justifying nor even much extenuating the charge made in the articles. That charge was said to be two-fold—a violation of the [184] 48th canon, involving the obstruction of a licenced curate in his undoubted right to officiate in the absence of his rector. Upon the offence first charged, the violation of the canon, the allegation was argued to have no bearing; the provisions of the canon being peremptory that no minister shall "serve" in any place, but by allowance of the ordinary of the place; and such "serving" by the defendant, as charged in the articles, not being denied in the allegation. Consequently, the allegation was said to contain no justification of the alleged breach of the canon. As for that other offence charged, the obstruction of the curate, it was said—the allegation must be taken to admit that the bishop's licence was not actually withdrawn; until when, a curate once licenced continues to be curate by the general ecclesiastical law. Hence, so far from setting up any legal defence to this part of the charge, the allegation admits the actual, nay, even the wilful, obstruction of the curate—to be inferred, this last, from its being after notice so admitted. Herein was said to consist (as laid down by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Hyde v. Martyn (Cowper, 440)) the distinction between a licenced, and an unlicenced, curate: the one is removable at pleasure: the other is not removable at the mere pleasure of the rector or vicar, but continues to be curate till the ordinary's licence is revoked. And this was argued to hold, as well of an assistant curate to a resident rector or vicar, as of a curate, properly so called; namely, one who has "curam animarum" committed to him, pro tempore, by the bishop, in the absence of an incum-[185]-bent. The ordinary, indeed, is bound to revoke his licence on reasonable cause shewn; one of such reasonable causes clearly being the rector or vicar's undertaking his own duty: and, failing to revoke his licence on reasonable cause shewn, this is matter of appeal and complaint to his ecclesiastical superior. True it is that Lord Mansfield has intimated (a) that curates, though licenced, are removable "by rectors or vicars undertaking their own duties." But by this it is not to be understood as if an incumbent, by undertaking his own duty, annuls his curate's licence, ipso facto. The incumbent is bound to certify this to the ordinary; who, being satisfied as to the duty being so undertaken by the rector or vicar, bonâ fide, is bound to withdraw his licence, as in the instance of any other reasonable cause shewn, on pain of appeal and complaint as above. This view of the subject was said to be the just result of the whole course of the ecclesiastical canons and constitutions, though it was admitted not to be fortified by the authority of any known decided case: and the opinion (said to be that of Mr. Serjeant Hill) expressed to the contrary; namely, "as though all but perpetual curates are removable at pleasure," in the notes on a late edition of Burn,(b) was denied to be law. Upon these grounds the Court was prayed to reject the allegation.

In support of the allegation, it was argued, on the contrary, that the facts alleged were material in answer to both parts of the charge. The canon was [186] said, on the face of it, especially as viewed in connection with other canons, to have no reference whatever to ministers performing casual acts of duty in any place, without allowance of the ordinary of the place: but to be only applicable to ministers "serving" [that is, (so contended) taking permanent cures] without such allowance. Now, the "serving" charged in the articles was here pleaded to have consisted in the performance of a (single) casual act of duty. Hence, it was said that the allegation was, at least, a good defence to that part of the charge which respected the supposed violation of the canon; to the penalties of which it was admitted that ministers taking permanent cures, without "allowance of the bishop of the diocese," might be liable. Nor had the allegation, it was maintained, a bearing less stringent upon that other part of the charge—the obstruction of a "licenced curate," so termed in the articles. The allegation upon that head went to shew that the curate's dismission was held (rightly or wrongly) to have been legally effected by the rector at that time—above all, that the rector had, himself, done the whole parochial duty, without the curate's having officiated in a single instance for the preceding seven or eight months. These facts constitute, it was said, a full defence, even as to this part of the case—being amply sufficient to justify the defendant from a criminal charge of having "obstructed the curate," for merely not consenting to compromise the (real or supposed) rights of the rector by surrendering the reading desk in this instance—although the curate (so styled) did, not improperly perhaps, put in his claim to officiate—evidently to keep open the question of right as between [187] him and the rector; a question with which the defendant properly declined to interfere. Even should the facts pleaded be held not to amount to a full justification of the defendant as to this part of the charge, still they are clearly relevant, it was said, to the extent of making this a case for mitigated costs, which was sufficient, of itself, to entitle the allegation to go to proof.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The only question which the Court is at present called upon to decide is the admissibility of a defensive allegation, offered on behalf of Mr. Chambers, against whom a criminal proceeding has been instituted in this Court. The question for its ultimate decision will be, whether the defendant has committed an ecclesiastical offence for which he ought to be canonically punished, and also to be condemned in the costs of the prosecution.

[Here the Judge described the offence from the presertim of the citation, and recited the substance of the articles, and of the defensive plea.]

Such is the substance of the charge, and such are the facts, stated in this allegation

(a) In the case of Hyde v. Martyn, Cowp. 440.
(b) Burn's Eccl. Law, by Fraser, vol. ii. pp. 55, in notis.

(and which Mr. Chambers offers to prove in his defence), the admission of which is now opposed. Nothing can be more widely different in their character and effect than the representations made of this transaction; on the one hand in the articles; and on the other in this defensive allegation.

Is the allegation then admissible? for that, I repeat, is the only present question: in considering which I am bound, upon general principles, to assume the [188] whole contents of the allegation to be true. And I am also bound to remember that in this, as being a criminal proceeding, the defendant is entitled to a full latitude of defence; and to state all circumstances (in order to examine witnesses to prove them) which can in any degree bear upon the ultimate decision of the matter charged, and its consequences.

The three first articles of the allegation state, and enter into a detail of circumstances in order to shew, that there were differences at this time between the rector and his curate, upon a question whether the curate had been legally dismissed, or whether he continued to be legally the curate, and to be entitled to his salary as such. In the present suit the Court will not be drawn aside, even to express an opinion incidentally, or indirectly (for it cannot decide), upon the matter so in dispute between the rector and the curate; as to which of those parties is legally right in respect to the dismission from the curacy without the bishop's having withdrawn his licence; though that point has occupied much of the argument that has just been offered at the bar. Meantime the fact that there was such a dispute existing does not appear to be, by any means, irrelevant, so far as it is pleaded; since it is explanatory of the whole transaction, and at least may bear upon the question of costs, which is not an immaterial part of the proceeding. In that view, if in no other, the three first articles of this allegation, applicable, in particular, by way of defence to that part of the charge which respects the "obstruction of the curate," are admissible.

The remainder of the allegation is also admissible, [189] partly on the same ground; though possibly, again, the case laid in the allegation, taken as a whole, may furnish a complete defence, if not to both parts of the charge, still to that part of it which respects the supposed violation of the canon.

The 48th canon, the violation of which is principally objected so far as applies to the present question, is in these words—"No curate or minister shall be permitted to serve in any place without examination and admission of the bishop of the diocese, or ordinary of the place having episcopal jurisdiction, in writing under his hand and seal, having respect to the greatness of the cure and the meetness of the party." And the canon is headed, "None to be curates but allowed by the bishop." (a)

Now the object of this canon seems at least to be that curates who are engaged to take charge of parishes, either altogether or in part for a continued time, shall be "examined and admitted" by the diocesan. What then is the history of the case charged in the articles as a violation of the canon which this allegation fur-[190]-nishes? The rector of Byfield, himself a resident rector, engages a curate, not to take the entire charge of his parish, but merely to assist him (the rector) in fulfilling his parochial duties—he becomes dissatisfied with that curate and dismisses him, legally as he conceives, after notice, pursuant to the terms of their original agreement. A question, however, arises between the rector and curate as to whether the latter has been legally dismissed—and is still subsisting at the period of this transaction. Meantime the rector, who as incumbent has the paramount right, does himself the whole duty for many successive months—he has then occasion to be absent one Sunday on account of his wife's ill health; and requests the defendant, a neighbouring clergyman, the licenced curate of another parish, but which parish happens also to be in another diocese, to officiate for him at Byfield on that day. The defendant so requested attends and does officiate for the rector, notwithstanding the claim of a third person (Mr. Paris) to officiate as curate—he (Mr. Paris) being the curate who had been licenced to Byfield, and whose dismission, whether legal or not, was the point at issue between him and his rector. Mr. Paris's claim to officiate is admitted in the plea: the defendant, however, it is also pleaded, though he declines surrendering the desk to Mr. Paris, promises to admit his demand; and disclaims all notion of violating the law, or acting in contempt of lawful authority—circumstances from which, in my judgment, it is fairly to be inferred that his sole motives in persisting to officiate were a natural reluctance to prejudice any (real or supposed) right of the rector; and a wish to leave the [191] dispute between him and his curate unprejudiced by any thing that might take place at that time. Now, in this view of the case, I am by no means prepared to hold that the defendant has committed any violation of the canon by which he becomes liable to a criminal prosecution.

(a) This, in the Latin, is "Ministri, nisi ex episcopi vel ordinarii approbatione, pro curatis non admittendi." And the canon itself is "Nulli curato, aut ministro, permittetur, ullibi curæ animarum inservire, nisi prius per episcopum, &c. examinatus ac admissus fuerit."

The Canons of 1603, it should seem, were originally framed in Latin—and the English translation is in some parts not by any means accurate. The original text should be always consulted in any case of apparent ambiguity. See, for instance, an apparent ambiguity at the close of the 106th canon, in the English translation, which the editor remembers to have been the subject of much discussion in the Donegal cause. There is no such ambiguity in the Latin canon.

It may be very proper that curates within the meaning of the canon, as already explained—and in which light the Court, as at present advised, is disposed to regard it—should be "examined and admitted" by the diocesan, in order to prevent persons not duly qualified from being introduced into parishes in that character. But the defendant in the instance in question, it should now seem, did not attend at Byfield in that character; nor was he acting as curate within the meaning of the canon so understood—he only came to officiate for the rector on a particular occasion. That occasional assistance so given is punishable as an ecclesiastical offence merely because the minister, so assistant, has not been licenced as curate by the bishop of the diocese is more than, without further consideration and other authorities being adduced, I am prepared to lay down as the rule of law: such a rule would be highly inconvenient to the clergy; and might not unfrequently occasion parishioners to be deprived altogether of the church service.

This interpretation of the 48th canon is confirmed in my judgment by the 50th and 52nd canons, which are in pari materia. By the first of these, the 50th canon, "neither the minister, churchwardens, nor any other officer of the church shall suffer any man [192] to preach within their churches and chapels but such as, by shewing their 'licence to preach,' shall appear unto them to be sufficiently authorized thereunto." Now the 52d canon plainly implies that this "licence to preach," at least, was not required to be had of the local ordinary: for the entry directed to be made by that canon, for the purpose of conveying information to the local ordinary in the case of a stranger preaching in his diocese, is, among other things, to set forth the name of the bishop by whom his "licence to preach" was granted. It appears indeed from the 49th canon that the "licence to preach" referred to in these, the 50th and 52d, canons was quite a distinct thing from the "licence to a cure," which is the subject of the 48th canon—being (the first) a licence to "preach" specially; without which ministers were forbidden by the 49th canon "to expound," as it is termed (i.e. to preach), "in their own cures or elsewhere," or to do any more than "read plainly and aptly, without glossing or adding, the homilies (then) already set forth, or in future to be published by lawful authority, for the confirmation of the true faith and for the edification and instruction of the people." It is well known that such (separate) licences to preach were in use both before and for some time after the Reformation; but for the last century or two, in consequence of the clergy being better educated, or for some other reason, they have fallen into desuetude; and are now included either in "letters of orders" or in the "licences of ministers to particular cures." The defendant, it may be further observed by the way, is pleaded to have actually complied in effect [193] with the 52d canon in this instance, by shewing his "licence" to the churchwarden; by whose authority, as well as by that of the rector, it now seems that he took possession of the reading desk, though he is charged by the articles to have done this "without any competent authority whatever."

Upon the whole, this allegation appears to the Court to be strictly admissible. It gives the transaction a character quite different to that to be collected from the articles of charge. It may at any rate protect the defendant from costs. It may also amount to a complete defence in point of law; not only excusing the defendant from costs; but subjecting the promoter to payment of the whole costs. The point in dispute between the rector and his curate will remain untouched. Under this possible result of the proceeding, whether the promoter may think this a fit prosecution to be persevered in, as a criminal suit, against this third party, Mr. Chambers, is a matter which he (the promoter) must decide for himself.

Allegation admitted.

 On a subsequent Court day the proctor for Mr. Gates declared that "he proceeded no further:" upon which the cause was dismissed with costs, as a matter of course.

The following proceedings in another Court may be stated as, in part, connected with the subject of this report.

In consequence of the existing disputes between Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Paris as to his dismission from the curacy of Byfield (stated and referred to in the allegation admitted, as above, in the Arches Court), Mr. Wetherell was served, in the month of May, [194] 1823, with a monition for payment of Mr. Paris's salary, as curate, to the following effect:—

Monition.

(Seal) HERBERT PETERBOROUGH.

Herbert, by divine permission, Bishop of Peterborough, to the Rev. Charles Wetherell, rector of Byfield, in the county of Northampton and diocese of Peterborough, greeting:—Whereas the act of the 57th of Geo. III. c. 99, s. 53, has provided that in case any difference shall arise between a rector or vicar and his curate, touching the curate's stipend, or the arrears thereof, the bishop of the diocese shall summarily determine the same; and is empowered to proceed therein by monition and sequestration. And whereas the Rev. S. S. Paris, whom we have licensed, on your nomination to the curacy of Byfield, has represented to us that no stipend has been paid him since the 24th day of January last and that you refuse to pay what has become due to him since that time, or any part thereof; we hereby monish you, the Rev. Charles Wetherell, to pay within two-and-thirty days from the date of the service of this monition, to the said Rev. S. S. Paris, the whole amount of the arrears which shall be then due to him, or shew cause within the same period why payment should not be compelled by a sequestration of your said benefice. Such cause you will shew in writing, addressed to us and to be filed in our registry at Northampton within the time specified, agreeable to the provisions of the 26th and 76th sections of the said recited act. And agreeably to the 75th section [195] such cause may be shewn either in the form of an affidavit, or in any other form of writing as the case may require. We shall then summarily determine the matter at issue.

Given under our hand and seal this 8th day of May in the year of our Lord 1823; and of our translation the fifth.

Mr. Wetherell, upon this, applied to the Court of King's Bench for a writ of prohibition to the bishop from proceeding to a sequestration of his benefice under that monition; and a writ nisi was granted upon a suggestion, supported in the usual manner by affidavits, that the case, as between rector and curate, in which the monition issued, was not a case within the operation of the stat. 57 Geo. III. c. 99, s. 53.

That rule was made absolute by the Court of K. B. upon argument, in Trinity Term (3d July), 1824, the Court holding that this process by monition, &c. against a rector for payment of arrears of stipend to his curate was, as suggested, not well founded on 57 Geo. III. c. 99, s. 53, in the case in point of an assistant curate to a resident rector; being only to be had in cases where the curate's licence had been granted and his salary assigned under that act; which was held by the Court to apply solely, in these particulars, to the curates of non-resident incumbents.

It is to be noted, however, that this decision of the Court of King's Bench leaves the general question, as to licenced curates being removable at pleasure, or the contrary, precisely on the footing where it stood before; be that footing what it may. All which the Court of King's Bench has determined seems to be that the assistant curate of a resident incumbent is not entitled to the benefit of a summary process by monition, &c., for the recovery of his stipend in arrear. This process by monition, &c., it should [196] be observed, is clearly not according to the general course of the ecclesiastical law: consequently it is either well founded upon the statute, or it has no foundation at all.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE, PROMOTED BY PALMER v. TIJOU. Peculiars Court of Canterbury, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1824.—Articles against the defendant (a sidesman) for brawling, &c., in church, pronounced to be proved; and the defendant suspended and condemned in the sum of 50l. nomine expensarum—this being held (in contradistinction to a former case arising out of the same general transaction) to be a case in which the prosecutor was not entitled to his full costs.

This was a cause or business of the office of the Judge, promoted by Samuel Palmer, a churchwarden of the parish of St. Mary, Newington, in the county of Surry and deanery of Croydon,(a)[1] against Henry Michael Tijou, a sidesman of the same parish, for "quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, by words," in the church of that parish; and also for "laying violent hands upon certain persons, and creating a riot and disturbance" in the said church.

The articles, nine in number, after pleading the general law (as in the case of Palmer v. Roffey, vide p. 141, ante), pleaded that, in the evening of Easter Tuesday, 1823, at the time of a poll taken in the church of St. Mary, Newington, for the election of a churchwarden for the year then next ensuing, Tijou, the defendant, perceiving that Richard Roffey, a churchwarden of the parish, was taken into custody by a constable, violently forced his way through the persons assembled, in order to release him, and in so [197] doing, smote, and laid violent hands on, divers persons; that on William Turner, a parishioner, gently laying his hand on his shoulder, and begging him, for God's sake to be quiet, he, Tijou, swore at, and then putting himself in a fighting attitude, aimed a violent blow at the head of the said William Turner, who only avoided the same by stepping back; that after, in conjunction with others, effecting, in a violent and outrageous manner, Mr. Roffey's rescue from the constable, he, Tijou, on being remonstrated with by a Mr. Elisha Turner, aimed another blow at the head of the said Elisha Turner, accompanied with oaths and divers quarrelsome, chiding, and brawling expressions; that he, the said defendant, then went into a pew adjoining that in which Mr. Hurcomb, a parishioner, was seated, whom he also violently abused and swore at; and at whom he clinched his fist in a menacing and insulting manner; lastly, that he laid violent hands on a Mr. Samuel Bishop, also a parishioner, who only interfered by requesting him to be calm, and pushed him down, whereby he was seriously hurt; when, in consequence of such violent and outrageous conduct, he was taken into custody by a constable. The articles likewise pleaded (as in the case of Palmer v. Roffey) that this prosecution was also instituted by vote or direction of the vestry.

A responsive allegation, consisting of eight articles, in substance pleaded, that Roffey the churchwarden was assaulted in the north aisle of the said church on the occasion articulate, and forced to the ground, and otherwise ill treated, by Mr. Hurcomb and his friends, to the actual peril of his life; that Tijou, the defendant, who was then in the church-yard, hearing [198] the tumult, and being apprized of the perilous situation of Mr. Roffey, proceeded into the church; and, with the assistance of other persons, succeeded in releasing him from the same; that, in so doing, he was obliged to press through the crowd assembled, but that he neither smote, nor laid violent hands upon, any person or persons whatever; nor conducted himself towards William and Elisha Turner and Joseph Hurcomb, articulate, in manner as objected to him in the articles; that soon after Roffey's release, and whilst he, Tijou, was standing on the seat of a pew in the said church, Samuel Bishop, articulate, pulled him down from such seat, and placed himself thereon in his stead; upon which he, Tijou, in like manner displaced Bishop, and regained possession of the said seat: shortly after which, he, Tijou, and Bishop, mutually apologized, and shook hands. And this allegation also pleaded (as Roffey's had, in the former case) that Hurcomb and Richardson, two witnesses examined upon the articles, were themselves under prosecution—the one for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, and the other, Hurcomb, both for this offence, and for that of smiting and laying violent hands, in the parish church of St. Mary, Newington, upon the day, and on the occasion, articulate.(a)[2]

Thirteen witnesses were examined upon these articles, and six upon the responsive allegation. Of their evidence, which, though sufficiently bulky, was less so than that taken in the former case, the result on the mind of the Court, after hearing counsel on both sides, is stated in the judgment.

(a)[2] Vide note (a), page 143, ante.

[199] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case of Palmer v. Tijou, and the former case of Palmer v. Roffey, arising out of parts of the same transaction, in which former case the Court noticed the general state of facts and the law applying to it, the present occasion does not require a repetition of those preliminary considerations. It will be sufficient to state that in electing churchwardens for the parish of Newington in the year 1823, and while a poll was going on in the church, a quarrel arose between Mr. Roffey, one of the churchwardens, and Mr. Hurcomb, a parishioner; which quarrel continued at the polling-table a very considerable time; the terms "coward" and "informer" being repeatedly interchanged between them. Which of those two persons began the quarrel, or which was most to blame, appeared to be immaterial: both had grossly violated the laws existing for the protection of the sanctity of the place. This quarrel was followed by a still more violent disturbance between the same parties in the north aisle of the church; most of the persons present flocking there, being attracted by the noise and tumult. It is after the commencement of the disturbance in the north aisle that the offence of Mr. Tijou is charged to have been committed: he was not all engaged in the original quarrel which led to the disturbance in the north aisle, nor was he present at the commencement of the latter. During the confusion, some of the by-standers called out for constables; and a constable had actually taken Mr. Roffey into custody.

It would hardly be proper for the Court wholly to [200] pass over without notice a misapprehension which seems to have prevailed respecting the duties and authorities of the different parish officers. Most of the persons present seem to have considered that nothing special attached to the place in which they were assembled; that whether it was a church, or a tavern, or a polling-booth, made no difference. There was a disturbance; the constables are called for, the cry is raised of "turn him out," and the constable, Wright, seizes the churchwarden Roffey, and soon after, the constable Passey seizes the sidesman Tijou, pulling out his pocket staff in proof of his authority to do so.

Now the church itself, and the preservation of order in the church, is, in the first instance, under the protection of the ecclesiastical law and the ecclesiastical officers. The Court does not mean to say that, if an actual breach of the peace takes place in the church, and the ecclesiastical officers either neglect, or are unable to do their duty, or still more, if they call for assistance, the civil officer may not be warranted in interfering: but, in the first instance, it is the duty of the ecclesiastical officers to preserve order in the church: theirs is the primary authority. Who then are those officers? The churchwardens, and their assistants the sidesmen. It is their duty to attend the church for the very purpose of preserving order. It is implied in their oaths of office "faithfully to discharge their duties as churchwardens;" if they are dissenters from the Established Church, and from motives of conscience cannot attend its worship, they are allowed by law to serve the office by sufficient deputy. In the execution of this duty they are protected by law: for example, if they take off a man's hat in church, or if they turn an [201] obstinate disturber out of the church without unnecessary violence, they are not guilty of an assault. They therefore are primarily the officers whose duty it is to keep order in the church. How far these considerations may aggravate the offence of Mr. Tijou I am not at present inquiring: I notice them principally in order to say, that constables are called for upon this occasion, earlier than was necessary, in my judgment, or consequently than was justifiable. Nor is the alacrity with which these constables seem to have acted quite uncensurable. Passey, for instance, takes Mr. Tijou into custody, and without any requisition to that effect. But the authority of Mr. Tijou in that place was paramount to the authority of any constable: and it must be a very strong case indeed which will justify a constable in inverting this order of authority by taking a churchwarden or a sidesman into custody; although possible circumstances may justify and require such a proceeding. The Court has stated thus much, not as of any great importance in the present case, but that the rights and duties of these officers respectively may be properly understood and more generally known.

The first question in the case is, whether the articles charging the offence are proved: the matter of costs will be for after consideration. Upon carefully perusing the evidence I am of opinion that although the articles state some of the facts in rather an inflamed manner, and there are some discrepancies between the witnesses, yet, upon the whole, it is established that the law has, to a certain extent, been violated.

When the disturbance in the north aisle commenced [202] Tijou was not in the church: nor is it suggested that he had taken any part in the previous quarrel. The facts are these—Tijou while in the churchyard, hearing the noise, comes into the church: and perceiving the disturbance and the crowd, he forces his way through the crowd up to the churchwarden; and if he had done this merely as a sidesman, intending to preserve order, it would have been justifiable: for his oath of office is "to be assistant to the churchwardens of his parish," and the churchwarden at that time was actually engaged in a personal struggle, namely, with the constable. But it would be an excess of candour to suppose that Mr. Tijou was influenced, if by that motive at all, by that sole motive. Roffey himself at the time, far from being occupied in preserving order, was acting in gross violation of it: and the (principal, at least) object of Tijou's interference seems to have been, to take part with a friend (Roffey), and to maintain his quarrel; and not merely to discharge his own official duty. At all events, there is no sufficient justification of his language and conduct upon this occasion, whatever were his motives. The Court is therefore of opinion that the law has been so far violated, though the case is by no means of an aggravated character. The disturbance which was going on tends to extenuate the conduct of Tijou; he was excited to that conduct by the existing tumult and the situation of his friend. The original brawlers, Roffey and Hurcomb, had kept up their quarrel for hours: they were the great offenders, and the cause of the whole disturbance. Many of the by-standers, probably, took a warmer part in the business than was strictly justifiable in point of law; considering the respect that was due to the place [203] in which they then were assembled; but to have instituted suits against all who might have so offended upon the occasion would have been acting much too rigorously.

What afterwards passed with a person of the name of Bishop took place also in the heat of the moment. Even according to Bishop's own account, he first put his hand on Tijou's shoulder, and though he did this in order to appease matters, yet Tijou, being so heated, might easily have mistaken it as an act of aggression and an assault; but, according to Tijou's witness, Bishop first pulled him down by the coat from the seat of the pew; and Tijou, in the same manner, pulled Bishop down, in order to recover his place; though, unfortunately, on descending, Bishop's foot turned under him, by which he received some injury. The parties made up their private misunderstanding upon the spot, by shaking hands in token of forgiveness; and although that immediate reconciliation might not conclude any person against proceeding for the purpose of maintaining public order, yet it is not wholly immaterial to the present consideration; more especially in respect to costs.

Now, upon the point of costs, it is to be observed that generally, where an offence has been committed, the expence of correcting it is to be borne by the offender; but it does not necessarily follow that full costs are to be given: they may be mitigated according to the discretion of the Court. That discretion, however, is not to be arbitrarily exercised; but upon a just and impartial consideration of all circumstances. The conduct of both parties must be taken into consideration, in order to see how far the defendant [204] ought to pay, and how the promoter has a claim to receive full costs.

Two prosecutions have been instituted by Mr. Palmer. The prosecution against Mr. Roffey, the churchwarden, who had been guilty of brawling in the church for hours together, previous to this renewed quarrel in the north aisle, the Court held to be a case which called for full costs. But by that prosecution the sanctity of the place would be asserted; the law upon the subject would be ascertained and become known, and the example, to prevent the recurrence of the offence in the parish, would be made. If another person equally offended, or with scarcely a shade of difference, it might have been invidious to select only one of them: both might have been properly prosecuted; but upon a view of the whole transaction I cannot think that Tijou was the other person who ought to have been so selected.

As the public officer discharging his duty for the purpose of repressing such offences, Mr. Palmer was fully justified in the former proceeding; it was also advised and directed at a meeting of the parishioners. The churchwarden was not, however, bound to obey that direction—he was to judge of its propriety, for he becomes the party responsible to the Court and to the defendant: and although the Court is always disposed to protect public officers in the fair discharge of their duty, even if some error of judgment should occur, yet it is also the duty of the Court to protect individuals against the abuse of official station, and against being harassed with expence by an officer who may be supported by the parish purse.

From the evidence laid before the Court in these [205] two causes, the two principal offenders were Mr. Roffey and Mr. Hurcomb. Even if the former were the greater of the two, yet the latter, if a second prosecution were deemed necessary, was the other proper person to have been selected as the object of such prosecution. It is with regret the Court differs in opinion from so respectable a body as the vestry of this parish; but I cannot help, most conscientiously, differing from them on the present occasion. They direct a prosecution against Mr. Tijou, who was only a subordinate offender; while they do not direct any prosecution against Mr. Hurcomb; but, on the contrary, he is brought forward, not only as a witness in these suits, but as an active partisan, applying to some of the other witnesses to attend in support of it. Looking at this course of conduct, it seems to me impossible to consider the present prosecution against Tijou as having been instituted solely for its proper and legitimate object, namely, to protect the sanctity of the place consecrated and set apart for the worship of the Supreme Being; nor impartially, to correct those who have offended against public order and decorum, without any regard to which party in parish politics the offender might belong. It therefore does not appear to be the case of a public officer acting without private motives in the discharge of his duty; which possesses a decided claim upon the justice and discretion of the Court, to indemnify him in his full costs, at the expence of the party proceeded against; but upon careful consideration, I cannot help thinking this to be a case for mitigated costs: and as Mr. Tijou will have his own expences to pay, which have been rendered pretty heavy, by the promoter's ex-[206]-amining a great number of witnesses; and as Mr. Palmer may possibly be indemnified by others of the parish, I shall content myself, in the first place, with suspending Mr. Tijou ab ingressu ecclesiæ for one week; and, secondly, by condemning him in 50l. nomine expensarum.

AYREY AND OTHERS v. HILL. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1824. —A case of insanity alleged to defeat a will—testator proved to have been not properly a madman; but an habitual drunkard who, under the excitement of liquor, acted in all respects very like a madman—different considerations applicable to the two cases as with relation to the matter in question stated—testator held to have been not under the excitement of liquor, and, consequently, not insane at the time of making his will; and the will itself, consequently, established.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The case before the Court is pretty voluminous, in point of evidence; but there is much of it to which the Court has little occasion to advert in stating the grounds of its judgment.

The deceased, Peter Hurman, otherwise Efford,(a)[1] died on the 5th of August, 1821, leaving a will bearing date 25th of June in that year, the validity of which is the point at issue. The following is a summary of the contents of that instrument. It benefits, considerably, the family of Mr. Pike, one of the executors; it devises and bequeathes a freehold estate for life, together with the residue of the testator's personalty for life, to Lucy Hill, his niece and sole next of kin; and a legacy of 500l. to William Hill, her husband, in the event of his surviving her; it also be-[207]-queathes 700l. (100l. each) to seven different charities; and 100l. each to the three executors, Mr. Ayrey, Mr. Pike, and Mr. Megginson; whom, lastly, it purports to appoint joint (substituted) residuary legatees. Such, in substance, are the contents of this will; (a)[2] it is written on five sheets of paper, each of which is signed (the fifth

(a)[1] The mother of the deceased had had two husbands—Hurman and Efford. The deceased was the son of the first husband; but chose to pass, and was usually known, by the name of the second.

(a)[2] The following is a correct abstract of the will, which it seems proper to state, for a reason that will appear in the sequel. Samuel Pike, 100l.—his four children—400l. 4 per cents.—Sidwell Pike, his daughter, two freeholds, Aldersgate Street; a leasehold, No. 8 Anderson's Buildings; ground rents of twenty houses, ditto; two copyholds at Plaistow—Orphan School; Boy's School, Bethnal Green; Brown's Charity School; Deaf and Dumb School; Hospital, Hyde Park Corner; ten, widows being also sealed) by the testator; and it is likewise subscribed by three persons, as witnesses, the solicitor who drew it up, and two neighbouring tradesmen, merely called in to attest the formal act of execution. The personalty bequeathed by this will is stated to amount in value to about 500l. and the realty devised to between 5 and 10,000l.

This instrument, such as I have described it, is propounded by the executors, and is opposed by Lucy Hill, the testator's niece and only known relation; her alleged ground of opposition being, in a word, the asserted testator's incapacity. Her allegation, respon-[208]-sive to a condidit, pleads, generally, in the third article, that the deceased had long been subject to mental derangement, more particularly from about the middle of the year 1817; of which it furnishes a variety of (supposed) instances in the fifteen succeeding articles; summing up the whole by pleading in the nineteenth article that the deceased was not of testamentary capacity on the 25th of June, 1821, but that he was in the custody, and under the controul, of the executors (one or all) at that time, upon whose sole suggestion the will in question was, de facto, made and signed by the deceased. To this it is answered, on the part of the executors, that the deceased was never insane; for that he conducted himself rationally at all times, when not under the excitement produced by spirituous liquors, to the immoderate use of which, it may be stated, once for all, as an admitted fact in the cause, that the deceased had been addicted for a number of years.

Now this being, in substance, the case on both sides, it appears to me that the testimony of Mrs. Hill's own witnesses fails to make out a case of (proper) insanity or mental derangement. They speak to the deceased's extravagant conduct indeed, in a variety of instances; but they admit him, in at least by far the greater part of these, to have been intoxicated at the time; when it does seem that he not only talked wildly and incoherently, but that he acted, and conducted himself, in all respects, very like a madman. Even Fagg, the witness who deposes most strongly in this particular, concludes by stating the deceased, in her apprehension, "a mad drunken fool;" obviously connecting, as appears by this phrase, in her [209] view of the case, his supposed insanity with his admitted habits of gross intoxication. On the contrary, however, it is pleaded and proved that the deceased at no time was under any control as to the management of his person or property; that he received rents; made payments; transferred stock; drew drafts; settled accounts; bought and sold property; in a word, that he was perfectly sui juris to the last, with respect to the conduct both of himself and his affairs, in all particulars.

The testator's case then appears to the Court to be that of a person not (properly) insane or deranged; but to be that of a person addicted to a species of ebriety, which, during its subsistence, frequently produces, and is proved, in the present instance, to have actually produced, upon the subject of it, effects very similar to those which insanity, or mental derangement (properly so called) would or might have occasioned. In other words, the deceased appears to the Court, not in the light of a madman, but in that of a person habitually addicted to the use of spirituous liquors, under the actual excitement of which he talked and acted, in most respects, very like a madman.

Now, viewed as with reference to the point at issue, the cases in question, notwithstanding their apparent similarity, are subject, in my judgment, to very different considerations. Where actual (proper) insanity is proved to have once shewn itself, either perfect recovery, or, at least, a lucid interval at the time of the making, must be clearly proved to entitle any alleged testamentary instrument to be pronounced for as a valid will. Either of these, however, the last especially, is highly difficult of proof, for the following [210] reason. Insanity will often be, though latent: so that a person may, in effect, be completely mad or insane, however, on some subjects, and in some parts of his conduct apparently rational. But the effects of drunkenness or ebriety only subsist, whilst the cause, the excitement, visibly lasts: there can scarcely at Orsett; ditto at Plaistow, 100l. each—Lucy Hill (the deceased's niece) a real estate called "Squirrel's Heath Farm," and other real estates for life; at her death to be sold, and out of the proceeds, 500l. to William Hill, her husband—Lucy Hill residue, for life—Samuel Pike, John Ayrey, and J. M. Megginson, substituted residuary legatees and executors, with legacies (the two latter) of 100l. each. The residue (real and personal) was estimated, in the argument, at 7 or 8000l.

be such a thing as latent ebriety: so that the case of a person in a state of incapacity from mere drunkenness or ebriety, and yet capable, to all outward appearance, can hardly be supposed. Consequently, in the last, which, in my judgment, is this description of case, all which requires to be shewn is the absence of the excitement at the time of the act done; at least, the absence of the excitement in any such degree as would vitiate the act done; for I suppose it will readily be conceded that, under a mere slight degree of that excitement the memory and understanding may be, in substance, as correct as in the total absence of any exciting cause. Whether, where the excitement in some degree is proved to have actually subsisted at the time of the act done, it did or did not subsist in the requisite degree to vitiate the act done, must depend, in each case, upon a due consideration of all the circumstances of that case itself in particular; it belonging to a description of cases that admits of no more definite rule, applicable to the determination of them, than the one now suggested, that I am aware of.

In this view of the question before the Court, it must be obvious that the result will depend upon the deceased's state and condition at the time (to be collected, principally, from what passed at the time) of his giving instructions for, and signing, the instrument now propounded as and for his last will. But [211] previous to considering this it may not be improper that the Court should briefly notice one or two outlying circumstances.

And here, in the first place, I am bound to observe that the dispositive part of this will has, to my judgment, nothing very alarming in point of probability. The deceased, in early life, had been for many years in the service of a Mr. Holker (the uncle of Mr. Megginson), an attorney, who left him an annuity by will, which the deceased constantly received at Mr. Megginson's office. Hence he appears to have considered himself connected, in a manner, with Mr. Megginson; and it is in proof that he frequently spoke of his regard for him, and his intention to benefit him at his death. The bequest, then, to Mr. Megginson is one by no means improbable. Again, as to Pike and his family, the wife of the deceased died in February, 1820. During her life the deceased had resided at Bethnal Green—he was much affected by her death, and took, upon that event in particular, to a course of excessive drinking, which led to the commission of many of those acts of extravagance deposed to by the witnesses upon the niece's allegation. Soon after his wife's death (in the Spring of 1820) he went to lodge with Pike (whom he had previously known) at Anderson's Buildings, in the City Road, and became from that time much attached to, and fond of, his children. It is charged that the deceased, while at Pike's, drank spirits to excess, and that Pike and his children, the latter especially, encouraged him in that pernicious habit; but this, admitting it to have been true, was a circumstance not likely to abate his fondness for them; though itself, most undoubtedly, very [212] highly reprehensible. In March, 1821, the deceased bought a house, and went to reside, at Dalby Terrace (also in the City Road); and was accompanied by Pike and his family; who remained, however, at Dalby Terrace about three weeks only, or till about the middle of April. But the deceased himself soon became dissatisfied with his purchase; and removed back to Pike's, in Anderson's Buildings, in the following June; a few days prior to the date of the present will. Under the circumstances the disposition, so far as it benefits Pike and his family, is not by any means very unlikely. Even Mr. John Ayrey, the third executor, had been well known to the deceased from the year 1817—and I think that there are sufficient vestiges in the evidence of mutual kindnesses between the parties to relieve the testamentary benefit derived even to this executor, though, of the three, the one least connected with the deceased, from any charge of high improbability. The deceased had intrusted him with some charitable donations—and it appears that Mr. John Ayrey was also executor of a former will, executed by the deceased, about six months before his death.

But how, again, was the deceased situated with regard to his family? for this is a circumstance by no means immaterial in estimating the probability, or the improbability, of this will, in the dispositive part of it. The deceased left one niece, the posthumous child of a brother by the half-blood, his sole next of kin, and only known relation. She at that time, was forty years of age; and, though twice married, had never had a child. Now, the will in question is scarcely inofficious with regard to this niece: it bequeathes her a very considerable portion of the property for life; she [213] is the general residuary legatee for life: her husband, too, though pleaded and proved to have been no favourite of the deceased, has a legacy of 500l. in the event of his surviving her. The probability of the niece ever having any child or children was too remote a one to be much contemplated: so that the will's containing no provision for that event, but substituting other residuary legatees, strangers to the testator in blood, after her decease, is a circumstance, again, not at all extraordinary.

Lastly, of two at least of the three executors and substituted residuary legatees, the will now propounded is not the deceased's first testamentary disposition in favor. Annexed to Mr. Megginson's affidavit of scripts is the draft of a will prepared by a person named Durant, and executed by the deceased on the 21st of March, 1821: but the original of which does not appear. Now from the contents of this draft it appears that the will of March, 1821, was a will equally if not more in favour of Pike's family than that now propounded; and Mr. John Ayrey is an executor of this will, with a legacy of 100l. Between that time and the 25th of June it is deposed by Combes (an adverse witness) that he, at the deceased's request, drew up a third (intermediate) will from his dictation, which the deceased afterwards indeed refused to execute; although it was probably upon the occasion of his dictating this will that he destroyed the former will made by Durant. Of the contents of the will so prepared by Combes there is no account—but the testimony of Combes (an adverse witness) on this part of the case is express to the capacity of the deceased at that time and to his intention to die testate; in which respects it is not immaterial.

[214] The only direct evidence as to the factum of the will now propounded (independent of that of the two other subscribed witnesses, who merely speak to the formal act of execution) is to be found the deposition of Mr. Singleton, a subscribed witness, being also the solicitor who prepared or drew it up. The following is a brief abstract of the course of the transaction as represented in the evidence of this witness.

On the morning of the 25th of June (1821) the witness attends the deceased, of whom he had previously no knowledge, in order to make his will, at the instance of, and in company with, Mr. John Ayrey, party in the cause, whom he had known well for the last four years. Ayrey says the deceased had told him to "bring his own attorney." On arriving at Anderson's Buildings they are shewn up to the deceased, who is ill in bed. The witness, after certain preliminaries which need not be stated, is accommodated with a chair close to his bed side, near the pillow; and Mr. John Ayrey continuing in the room all the time, gives the deceased to understand upon this, that he is ready to take instructions for his will. The deceased says, "I, Peter Efford, being of sound and disposing mind," but, stopping himself, adds, "You know what to say as well as I do." The witness proceeds accordingly, without farther dictation, to write the introductory part of the will; intimating to the deceased when it is that he arrives at the dispositive part or the first bequest. The deceased then furnishes instructions, agreeably to which the witness reduces into writing the paper now propounded. The witness in some instances is obliged to make the deceased repeat his words from his inarticulate manner of speaking—in some instances names are spelt [215] by the deceased, the witness not knowing how to write them—and the Christian name of one of Pike's children is ascertained and communicated to the witness by Ayrey, the deceased himself not recollecting it. When the witness arrives at the residuary clause, the deceased desires that the residue shall be given to certain charities to which he had bequeathed specific legacies in the former part of the will—but on the witness telling him that real estate, part of the residue, is incapable of passing by will to charities, he says, after pausing for about a minute, as if reflecting how he shall dispose of it, "Give the residue (meaning, as the witness deposes, the residue of his property generally) to the executors." The witness then proceeds with and finishes the paper, which being done, it is audibly and distinctly read over to the deceased by the witness, who explains to him the purport and effect of certain parts of it, and the deceased says that it is "all right." It is then executed and published with the usual formalities in the presence of the witness and of two neighbouring tradesmen, who are called in to attest, and who, together with the witness, Mr. Singleton, actually do attest, the execution—Ayrey being also present, but of course not a subscribing witness. The witness then tells the deceased that "he shall get the will done in a more formal and regular manner and be with him again in a day or two;" but he deposes that he "can't recollect what the deceased answers, he, the deceased, being a good deal exhausted." The witness upon this retires, keeping possession of the will. I shall have occasion to notice in the sequel all which occurs subsequently between the deceased and this [216] witness that has any bearing, real or supposed, upon the validity of this will—as also to observe upon one or two other facts disclosed and opinions expressed by him in the course of his examination.

This in substance is the testimony of the only direct material witness to the immediate factum of this instrument. It is obviously, I think, satisfactory—provided it be such as, in connection with the res gesta and the face and appearance of the instrument itself, ought to satisfy the Court as to the deceased's free agency and capacity (the contested points) at and during the particular period of time to which it relates.

And first, as to free agency, the res gesta as disclosed upon the face of this evidence suggests nothing to my mind even of undue influence, much less of actual control. There is no appearance of conspiracy. One of the executors, Mr. Megginson, is in no degree implicated in, nor was even privy to, the transaction: and even Pike, the second executor, and with his family, principally benefited under it, and at whose house it was executed (being also, however, it is to be observed, the deceased's own then residence), takes no part whatever in the actual making of the will. Ayrey, the third executor, is present indeed, but does not actively interfere—and although the witness, Mr. Singleton, was his solicitor and not that of the deceased, there is little to excite suspicion in the circumstance of the deceased choosing to employ his friend's solicitor upon this occasion in preference to his own; especially it being considered that in the instance of neither of the two former wills prepared, the one by Durant and the other by Combes, Mr. [217] Megginson's assistance had been or apparently was intended to be invoked. Lastly, the solicitor is not introduced to the deceased with a will ready prepared merely in order to obtain a formal execution—he is introduced to receive, and actually does receive, instructions for a testamentary disposition of his property from the deceased himself—and when, added to all this, it is considered that the benefit at first intended to the executors was but slight and compensatory for the trouble imposed upon them, and that instructions for making them the substituted residuary legatees were only furnished upon the deceased's being apprized that real estate, part, and the very principal part, of the residue would not pass to charities, I do think that the res gesta disclosed upon this evidence is such as to negative the charge that has been set up of fraud and conspiracy—and to evince the testator's free agency in the proper legal sense of that term (if of sufficient capacity) at the time of the transaction.

And here, with respect, secondly, to the deceased's testamentary capacity at that time (his general state and condition being, in my judgment, that which I have already described), it is surely not immaterial that the Court should advert to the time of day at which this transaction takes place. This transaction does not take place in the evening when the deceased's habits were likely to be in operation (a circumstance this, again, which tends to negative the charge of fraud and conspiracy in the parties to the transaction), but at eleven or twelve o'clock at noon; when, if ever, it is to be presumed that the deceased was, and it was probable à priori that he would be, free almost or altogether from the [218] effects of intoxication. Now this being so in the first place, does the instrument itself, upon the face of it, tally with, and by consequence sustain, the account given by the witness of the manner and mode in which it was drawn up and prepared? and, 2dly, how does it bear upon the stringent question, that of the deceased's testamentary capacity at the time?

The will is written, as I have already said, on five sheets of paper; it has no appearance of a paper taken as instructions merely and subsequently converted into a will by a provisional or precautionary execution. Does this, then, falsify Mr. Singleton's account of the transaction? By no means. He had said that he was ready to "take instructions," &c.—but the deceased immediately commences with, "I, Peter Efford, being of sound and disposing mind," &c.—clearly indicating his intention not merely to furnish instructions, but to dictate a final will. Consequently the formal shape of the paper is perfectly consistent with the witness's account of the manner in which it was prepared; and although, upon the face of it, it exhibits a fairer appearance (I mean, is written with fewer alterations and erasures, for some there are) than an instrument of this length, written at once without any previous draft, would ordinarily exhibit; yet still I can easily conceive that an experienced solicitor, verging upon forty years of age, might well draw up such an instrument at once, if the instructions were clearly conveyed; which it is likely that they were, in this instance, from that knowledge of testamentary forms for which the deceased was indebted to his employment for several years in an attorney's office; and from the circumstance of two prior wills then lately prepared: so that the disposition, [219] in point of general outline, may be presumed to have been fresh in his mind. In the instance of the will prepared by Combes, he speaks of it as a will drawn up precisely as the instrument now propounded is deposed to have been, namely, from the deceased's "dictation." It must be admitted, however, that this appearance of the instrument does at first seem a little incongruous with the mode deposed to by the witness of its actual preparation; and it was a circumstance, this, to which the Court directed the attention of the counsel for the next of kin, in order to have the benefit of their observations upon it in the course of the argument. The difficulty is, however, I think, sufficiently removed by those considerations suggested, in the first instance, by the counsel for the executors, and now upon deliberation adopted by the Court, which have just been applied to it.

How, then, lastly—assuming (partly at least) for the present the credibility of Singleton's narrative of the mode in which it was prepared—how does the face and appearance of the testamentary paper propounded bear upon the question of the testator's alleged testamentary capacity? Upon that head it is, I think, nearly conclusive. It is as complete a testamentary disposition of property as can well be conceived: it disposes of various properties—it bequeathes various legacies, and to various legatees—all these are minutely and circumstantially set forth—no error is suggested even as to any one of these particulars.(a) It is quite impossible for the Court to pronounce that the person dictating such an instrument as this, in the [220] manner in which it was dictated by this testator (if the witness, Mr. Singleton, is to be believed), was, as it has been contended, non compos mentis or destitute, in any sense of the phrase, of testamentary capacity.

The sole remaining question then (one already indeed partly disposed of) is, ought the Court in this case to withhold its credence from Mr. Singleton's testimony? Now this witness is not only a person of unimpeached character, and sustained in his account of this transaction in substance, as I have already said, by the appearance of the paper itself, and by the testimony, so far as it goes, of the other subscribed witnesses; but he deposes in one, and that one the most material, particular with an apparent openness and candour which renders it imperative on the Court, in my judgment, to answer that question in the affirmative. He says, upon his examination, not only that the deceased spoke so inarticulately as to make a repetition of his questions necessary, but that in a few instances Mr. John Ayrey does interfere to suggest what it is that the deceased said; that Mr. John Ayrey did, on one occasion of the deceased's speaking inarticulately in the course of giving his instructions, say, "I think he is tipsy," or "I think he is drunk." And that he, the witness, "thought that the deceased was then, to a certain extent, affected by drinking spirituous liquors;" that while the witness so took the instructions, the deceased calling for drink, a tumbler of rum and water was brought, which he sipt occasionally, though the witness adds, "he observed no alteration in him in consequence of what he so drank." Lastly, this witness, though he speaks to his belief of the deceased's testamentary capacity at the time, disclaims the ability of [221] forming any absolute opinion "how far he was at that time fully capable of giving instructions for, and making and executing, his last will and testament; or of doing any other act of that or the like nature requiring thought, judgment, and reflection." The Court has already arrived at its own conclusion, that he was so capable at the time, to the extent at least of entitling this instrument to probate—a conclusion not to be shaken or disturbed by this witness's qualified opinion as to his possible incapacity at that time, though a startling feature in the case, and fairly open as such to those observations which have been made upon it by the counsel for the next of kin. Meantime this, with the rest appearing, too, as it does in the examination in chief, and not merely drawn out by interrogatories, is clearly indicative of the witness's fairness and candour, and justifies the confidence reposed by the Court in his representation of facts—facts themselves again which, being credited, seem, in connection with the rest of the case, fully to warrant that conclusion at which the Court thinks that it is bound to arrive.

Having pursued the inquiry thus far, the Court is not compelled to travel in detail through the evidence as to what subsequently took place. The following is an outline of this. Singleton tells the deceased that "he shall get the will done in a more formal and regular manner, and be with him again in a day or two." What the deceased then said he cannot recollect; but he is neither proved to have given, nor is it probable that he did give, directions for any further instrument. The deceased was, he says, and might well be much exhausted; this transaction having occupied from eleven or twelve o'clock [222] till three in the afternoon. The witness, however, on the same day (the 25th of June) proceeds with the will to a conveyancer's, who returns it, together with a draft will, on the 28th; with which draft will Singleton waits upon the deceased on the same day. The deceased suggests alterations in this draft will on that day and further alterations on the following day, the 29th of June, which, being inserted, a will is engrossed for execution, and is produced to the deceased in that state, on Sunday the 1st of July. The deceased kept that engrossed copy but postponed the execution, and died without any further act done on the 5th of August. But these subsequent unfinished acts, in my judgment, are of no avail to defeat the regularly executed will. The execution of the will of the 25th of June was not a provisional execution, so far as the deceased was concerned, but a final execution—this was Singleton's notion, obviously not that of the deceased. Again, what passed subsequently seems to have all arisen from Singleton's distrust of the correctness of that will, as having been reduced into writing at once, without any previous draft; and does not appear to have been sanctioned by, or to have proceeded from, any instructions or directions of, the deceased himself.

Nor will the disposal of the residue having proceeded, in part at least, under a possible mistake materially bear upon the question. Being told by Singleton that his real property would not pass to charities, he says, "Give the residue (real as well as personal) to the executors." Why, it is said, was not the personalty given to charities? This bequest over of the residue to the executors, so far as personalty is [223] concerned, might (it has been argued must) have been founded on mistake or misconception. But such possible mistake is surely of no avail to defeat the will; nor is the Court either disposed or authorized to apply so subtle a test to the trial of its validity. The mistake, at all events admitting it to be, is not of a nature to affect the niece. Her interest, at least in the residue, either real or personal, the deceased never meant to extend beyond her own life. Meantime the residuary clause having been drawn up in exact conformity with the deceased's own directions, and the will when finished having been read over to the deceased, and then executed and attested in the mode that I have described, the Court, in my judgment, can go no further. It appears to me to be the will of a free and capable testator; and, as such, I pronounce for it.

DAVIS v. DAVIS AND DAVIS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1824.—Substance of a codicil pronounced for, in the absence of the instrument itself, upon satisfactory proof, 1st, that it was duly made; and, 2dly, that (even if cancelled) it was not revoked by the testator.

[Referred to, Colvin v. Fraser, 1829, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 292.]

This was a business of propounding and proving by witnesses, in solemn form of law, a second codicil to the last will and testament of Edmund Thorp Luff, late of Berkley Place, in the parish of Clifton, in the county of Gloucester, Esq., the party in the cause, deceased, which second codicil was alleged to have been] lost, or unintentionally destroyed, but the substance of which was contained, as alleged, in a certain affidavit as to scripts sworn to by Henry Davis and Maria Davis (the wife of the said Henry Davis); promoted by Richard Hart Davis, Esq., one of the executors named in the said will (praying probate of [224] the will and first codicil thereto), against the said Henry Davis, the other executor named in the will; and also against Maria Davis (wife of the said Henry Davis), the residuary legatee named in the said alleged second codicil.

His majesty's proctor had intervened in the cause on behalf of the Crown; as, in the event of the codicil propounded not being pronounced for, the deceased was dead intestate, as to the residue of his property, and he was expressly alleged to have died without any known relation.

The circumstances of this case (which will be found detailed in the judgment) were pleaded in an allegation given in by the parties who propounded the codicil: and all the principal facts in the allegation, so far as the respondent's knowledge went, were admitted in the answers of the other party.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. There can be no doubt that the contents or substance of a testamentary instrument may be established, though the instrument itself cannot be produced upon satisfactory proof being given that the instrument was duly made by the testator, and was not revoked by him: for example, either by shewing that the instrument existed after the testator's death; or that it was destroyed in his lifetime without his privity or consent. Many cases of the sort have been decided.

In the present case the party deceased, Mr. Luff, died in May, 1823, a widower, without any known relation, at the very advanced age of eighty-five, leaving behind him property to the amount of about 4000l. He duly executed a will in May, 1818, thereby [225] leaving several legacies to charities, amounting together to about 2000l. He left also 50l. to each of his executors, Mr. Henry Davis, and Mr. Richard Hart Davis: but the will declared that the residue was to be disposed of "by any paper signed by him which was to be a codicil thereto." In December, 1822, the deceased made a codicil, giving two legacies of 50l. each to Burton and his wife (the persons at whose house he lodged) and 10l. to each of the children of those persons, but still not disposing of the residue.

It is pleaded that the deceased had a very great affection for Mr. Henry Davis and his wife; and that in the beginning of April, 1823, he gave Mr. Henry Davis instructions for a codicil, bequeathing the residue of his property, undisposed of by his will, to Mrs. Henry Davis; that a codicil was to that effect prepared and duly executed, the substance of which is set forth in Mr. H. Davis's affidavit of scripts; (a) that, after the execution, the deceased declared he should "never alter it;" and that the codicil was then folded up and put in a small box which stood in the deceased's room, in which he kept some papers and various other articles.

Now the evidence, especially that of Fisher and Harris, the alleged subscribed witnesses, fully establishes that the deceased executed a codicil on this evening in April, as pleaded; and I see no reason to doubt that the contents of this codicil were as set forth in the affidavit. The deceased had no known relations whatever: his wife and his only son were [226] dead: he had no intimate acquaintances or connections except Mr. and Mrs. Davis; they were constantly treating the deceased with the utmost attention and kindness, and the deceased was as constantly expressing his gratitude towards them. There was no other person, therefore, in whose favor it was at all likely he should now bequeath the residue of his property, the disposal of which, by codicil, he had expressly reserved to himself in his will: he had already bequeathed about 2000l. in charities, to the several objects of his benevolence, at Bristol; and he had already, in the preceding December, made a separate codicil in favor of the persons in whose house he lodged. All his declarations to the Burtons and others are fully confirmatory of his alleged intention to give the residue of his property to Mrs. Davis; and the daughter, Mary Ann Burton, indulging a little of that curiosity which is commonly attributed to her sex, actually perused a codicil to that effect, upon one day finding the deceased's "trunk" open; and she deposes to the substance of its contents.(a) The tenor therefore of the codicil is proved by the probability of the disposition, by the declaration of the testator, and by a witness who actually read it.

But the instrument is not found upon the death of the testator; and as it was left in his own possession, the legal presumption is that he himself destroyed it, animo revocandi. This presumption, however, may be repelled by evidence; nor does it require evidence amounting to positive certainty, but only such as reasonably produces moral conviction.

[227] The whole conduct of the deceased, and his declarations down to the very evening of his death, render it most highly improbable that he should have revoked this codicil. Those declarations, having been detailed from the evidence by the counsel, need not be again stated by the Court. The codicil is proved by Mary Ann Burton to have been in the trunk already mentioned. It is also proved that the deceased was a great smoker, and frequently took papers out of this trunk for the purpose of lighting his pipe: he was a very old man: and it is in no degree improbable that he may have taken the codicil out by mistake, and used it for that purpose. This is infinitely less improbable than that he should have destroyed the codicil with the intention of revoking it.

It also appears that the trunk was sometimes left open: that it was the receptacle of all sorts of things; and was accessible to other persons in the house. The codicil therefore might have been taken out, accidentally, or otherwise, neither by, nor with the privity of, the deceased. Upon the whole I feel morally convinced by the evidence produced, first, that the deceased duly executed a codicil to the effect alleged: and, secondly, that it was not revoked by himself; and therefore it is the duty of the Court to pronounce for its validity, as propounded. The probate must pass in the usual form, namely, "till the original, or a more authentic copy, be brought in," for it is still not physically impossible that the original may be in existence._

_ The alleged codicil, as stated in the affidavit of scripts, was as follows:—

"I, Edmund Thorp Luff, do hereby make this a codicil to my last will and testament: and do give and bequeath to Maria [228] Davis, wife of Henry Davis, of Berkley Square, in the city of Bristol, solicitor, all the rest, residue, and remainder of my monies, chattels, and estate, to and for her own use and benefit, for her very great kindness and attention to me during my long illness. And I do hereby ratify and confirm my will in all respects, save as the same is hereby altered.

"Witness my hand, this day of April, 1823. "E. T. Luff.

"Signed, published, and declared, by the said E. T. Luff, as and for a codicil to his last will and testament in the presence of us Jane Harris, James Fisher."

Mary Ann Burton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Burton, in whose house the deceased lodged, deposed, on the seventh article of the allegation propounding the codicil, in part, as follows:—

"The deceased had a little box in his room, covered with leather, and very old, in which he used to keep a variety of things, but principally letters, scraps of poetry of his own making, and notes of sermons by different ministers; both which last he was in the habit of taking occasionally out of the said box, the key of which he kept in his waistcoat pocket, and reading to the deponent: once or twice the deponent has known the box to be left open, when the deceased had been reading, and had gone to lay down on the bed; and, on one occasion of this sort, happening about ten days or a fortnight before his death, she, the deponent, whilst lingering in the room, took up some of the papers so kept in the said box, and read them: the first was a piece of poetry that she had seen and read before—the second was folded up as a letter, but with no writing or direction on the outside, and not sealed, and so she opened and read it—it was, she verily believes, the codicil to the deceased's will. It was, as near as she can recollect, for she read it but once, in the following words:—'I, Edmund Thorp Luff, give and bequeath to Maria Davis, wife of Henry Davis, my whole and sole estate and effects, for her kind attentions to me during my illness.' This she knows was the substance, though she will not undertake to swear that she has given the words correctly. It was signed by the deceased and witnessed by Mr. Fisher and Mrs. Harris. When deponent had read it, she was sensible she had done wrong, and thought that the deceased might have seen her, and she immediately replaced the [229] said paper, and the others, in the box as she had found them; and came down stairs, without the deceased being conscious of what had happened."

The Court observed in conclusion—"It has been usual, on similar occasions with the present, for the Court to pronounce for the instrument as contained in the deposition or depositions of some witness or witnesses." But since in the present case there can be no question that the contents of the instrument are set forth at once more correctly and less to the benefit of the parties who propound it, in the affidavit of scripts made by those very parties, than in the deposition of the witness Burton, I have no difficulty on the present occasion in acceding to the prayer of the parties, though out of the usual course, by pronouncing as above for this codicil "as contained in the affidavit of scripts."

His majesty's proctor prayed that the costs of his appearance as such might be paid out of the estate. In objection it was said that the "Crown neither took nor paid costs," but

Per Curiam. That rule is not, I think, applicable to an appearance given by the Court under the present circumstances, and I direct the costs of that appearance to be paid out of the estate.

MEDLYCOTT v. ASSHETON. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 7th July, 1824.—The ordinary presumption that a codicil to a will is revoked by the revocation of that will, held not to be sufficiently rebutted by circumstances shewing a different intention, and the testatrix consequently pronounced to be dead intestate.

This was a question as to the validity of a codicil found uncancelled among the papers of the deceased. Her will had been cancelled in her lifetime; unquestionably by order of the deceased.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The testatrix in this cause, Miss Catherine Cockayne, died in March, 1824, at the house of her relation Mr. Maunsell, where she had been previously resident two or three months. The deceased was possessed of personal property to the amount of above 2000l. and was entitled to a ninth share of some real [230] property. She left behind her the honorable Barbara Cockayne Medlycott, widow, her mother, and eight sisters, the parties entitled in distribution in case she is dead intestate.

In April, 1820, the deceased executed a will, which she deposited for safe custody in the hands of a Mr. Smith, described as the steward of the family. In December, 1820, she wrote a codicil, giving 100l. each to the two "trustees" named in her will, and dividing some trinkets among her family. In the month of January last (1824) she looked over the papers in her writing-desk, several of which she burnt (it is to be presumed) as useless; and a few days afterwards wrote to Mr. Smith desiring him to destroy her will. This is admitted not to have been done with the intention of making a new will; for she neither expressed, nor is there reason to suppose she entertained, any such intention. Mr. Smith, upon receiving the letter, shewed the envelope containing the will, with the seal unbroken, to a third person; and immediately in his presence put the will into the fire unopened, where it was burnt, and wrote to inform the deceased that he had obeyed her directions. Upon the death of the deceased, Mr. Smith's letter is found in her writing-desk, the uppermost paper; and lower down, in the same desk, among other papers, the codicil of December, 1820, is also found uncancelled. These are the facts of the case: and the Court is to decide whether this codicil is valid or whether it is revoked.

A codicil is primâ facie dependant on the will; and the cancellation of the will is an implied revocation of the codicil. But there have been cases where the codicil has appeared so independant of and uncon-[231]-nected with the will that, under circumstances, the codicil has been established, though the will has been held invalid. It is a question altogether of intention. Consequently the legal presumption in this case may be repelled, namely, by shewing that the testatrix intended the codicil to operate, notwithstanding the revocation of the will. In my judgment, however, the circumstances of this case are not sufficient to establish such an intention in order to repel the legal presumption. The codicil in this case appears connected with the will; for the principal legatees in the codicil are "her two trustees" being such under the will; and the will being revoked, they no longer retain that character. Even the distribution of the trinkets made by the codicil might be influenced by the disposition contained in the will.

It seems probable that the deceased last saw the codicil when she put her desk in order and burnt some of her papers: but that was done before she sent directions to have her will destroyed. And even if she had then determined to cancel it, she might not choose actually to destroy the codicil till she knew her directions to Mr. Smith had been carried into effect. Afterwards, when she received Mr. Smith's letter, which she deposited at the top of her desk, she either might not think of the codicil or might not deem it necessary to destroy it; under the more common idea that a codicil is dependant on a will. Under these considerations I am of opinion that, the legal presumption of the codicil being revoked by the cancellation of the will, is not sufficiently repelled by circumstances shewing a different intention in the testatrix, and consequently that she must be pronounced to be dead intestate.

[232] IN THE GOODS OF MARY RADNALL, Spinster, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1824.—When a sole next of kin refuses to take administration, the Court, on cause shewn, will decree letters ad colligendum bona defuncti, limited according to the special circumstances of the case.

(On motion.)

Mary Radnall, of Bewdley, in the county of Worcester, the party deceased in this cause or business, died in September, 1823, a spinster, without parent and intestate, leaving behind her Francis Radnall, her natural and lawful brother and only next of kin and the sole person entitled to her personal estate and effects. The deceased's property, consisting principally of money due to her on mortgage and by bond, leasehold estates, cash at her bankers, &c. amounted to about 3700*l*. The deceased was also entitled to an undivided moiety of certain leasehold property in Bewdley, as also of some freehold property, of which she, the deceased, and her brother, Francis Radnall, were tenants in common. She died without leaving any other than a few trifling debts, which were immediately discharged by her brother, Francis Radnall, out of his own property.

Subsequent to the deceased's death, various applications had been made to Francis Radnall by Robert Pardoe, who had been agent for the said deceased during her life, and still was agent to the said Francis Radnall, relative to his taking out administration of the deceased's effects; but the said Francis Radnall (on being informed that in case of an administration an oath must be taken faithfully to administer the effects, and as to the value thereof) positively declined, either himself to take the said letters of administration, or to take any step whatever for enabling any [233] other person so to do, on the score of all oath-taking being contrary and repugnant to his religious opinions.

Mr. Pardoe and his partner Mr. Nicholas were also agents and solicitors to the executrix of Henry Lancellot Lee, Esq., deceased, whilst living indebted to the deceased, on bond, in the sum of 500*l*.; Mr. Pardoe being also a trustee under his will for the sale of his estates for payment of his debts. Those estates had been sold accordingly: the money was now ready for payment of the said sum of 500*l*. so due on bond to the deceased's estate; and inconvenience and loss were accruing to the estate of the said Henry Lancellot Lee, in consequence of there being no person legally authorized to receive, and give a discharge for, the same: nor could he, Mr. Pardoe, for the same reason, though willing and desirous so to do, settle his accounts with the estate of the deceased, and obtain a proper discharge for the balance thereof.

The above facts being duly verified by the affidavit of Mr. Pardoe, the Court, on motion of counsel, was pleased to direct a citation to issue, calling on the said Francis Radnall to accept or refuse the letters of administration of all and singular the goods, chattels and credits of the said deceased: otherwise, to shew cause why the same should not be committed and granted to the said Robert Pardoe, limited to "the collection of all the personal property of the said deceased; and giving discharges for all the debts which might have been due to her estate on payment of the same; and doing what further might be necessary for the preservation of the property aforesaid:" and to "the safe keeping of the same, to abide the directions of the Court."

[234] GALE v. LUTTRELL AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1824.—The executors of a deceased executor, though not the personal representatives of the original testator (there being an executor of the original testator still surviving), are compellable to bring in an inventory of the effects of the original testator.—The Court will compel an executor to bring in an inventory &c. at the suit of a creditor by bond of the testator, notwithstanding its alleged invalidity, and a suit as to this actually commenced, and then depending, at common law.

(On petition.)

John Fownes Luttrell, late of Dunster Castle in the county of Somerset, and of Northway, in the county of Devon, was the party deceased. He made his will and appointed four executors, two of whom only, John Fownes Luttrell and Francis Fownes Luttrell, took probate of the will, namely, in May, 1816; of these Francis Fownes Luttrell was since dead, having made his will, and thereof appointed Henry Fownes Luttrell and Frederick Moysey, Esquires, executors, who took probate of the said will of Francis Fownes Luttrell in May, 1823.

In Michaelmas Term, 1823, a decree issued, citing John Fownes Luttrell, Henry Fownes Luttrell, and Frederick Moysey, Esquires, to exhibit an inventory of the effects of John Fownes Luttrell (the original testator, and an account of their administration thereof) at the suit of Mary Gale, administratrix (with the will annexed) of William Hawkes, whilst living, a creditor of the said original testator.

An appearance was given to this citation under protest as to Henry Fownes

Luttrell, and Frederick Moysey; and the Court was prayed to pronounce for that protest, on the ground that, there being still living an executor of the original testator who had proved his will, they, the said Henry Fownes Luttrell and Frederick Moysey, though the executors of a deceased executor, were not the personal representatives of the said original testator, and consequently, were unduly cited to [235] render an inventory and account of his effects. As to the surviving executor, Mr. John Fownes Luttrell, it was prayed that, under the circumstances stated in an act of Court into which the protest was extended, the Court would further, in its discretion, decline, assigning him to bring in the inventory and account called for; until a question stated to be then depending in the Court of King's Bench as to the validity of a bond, under which the party at whose suit the citation had issued, claimed to be a creditor of the deceased, should have been determined in the affirmative, by that Court.

This act of Court, or extended protest, was replied to on the part of Gale, the creditor, to the effect stated in the judgment, and the cause after argument by counsel now stood for sentence.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Gale, as a creditor of John Luttrell, deceased, has cited his son John Luttrell, his surviving executor, and Henry Luttrell and Frederick Moysey, the executors of Francis Luttrell, another of his executors since deceased, to exhibit an inventory: an appearance for the parties cited has been given under protest: and in the act on petition extending the protest it is stated that the validity of the bond, under which Gale claims to be a creditor, is controverted in an action brought in a Court of common law; and, further, that the executors of the deceased executor are not bound to exhibit an inventory, there being a surviving executor.

To this it is replied that Francis, the deceased executor, received a considerable portion of the testator's effects; that both executors had recognized the bond [236] after the death of the testator: and that in the action brought against John, the surviving executor, he had pleaded "plene administravit." The Court is now to decide whether the parties cited are bound to exhibit an inventory.

An inventory is due from an executor or administrator almost as matter of course, at the prayer of any person having the appearance of an interest: though, in modern practice, inventories are not required to be exhibited without being so called for.

In respect to the party calling for the inventory in this case, here is an asserted creditor by bond: this Court will not enter into the validity of the bond: it is sufficient that such a claim is put in suit against the executor. And as the executor has pleaded "plene administravit," it furnishes the strongest reason to entitle the creditor, before he proceeds farther in trying the validity of the bond, to ascertain by the production of an inventory whether the deceased left assets to answer his demand. The surviving executor is therefore cited by a party having an apparent interest sufficient to entitle him to call for an inventory.

In respect to the executors of the deceased executor, Francis Luttrell, though they are not the representatives of the first testator, there being a surviving executor, yet, being called upon as representing another executor who took probate, and who is stated to have got possession of a considerable part of the deceased's effects, the creditor has an interest sufficient to entitle him to call upon them also for an inventory: since, without a disclosure from them of such parts of the first testator's property as came to the possession of the deceased executor, Francis, the creditor, is still without [237] means of finally ascertaining what assets his debtor has left; as those assets may be unknown to the surviving executor.

Protest over-ruled—John Fownes Luttrell assigned to bring in an inventory, and Henry Fownes Luttrell and Frederick Moysey assigned to appear absolutely—and question as to costs reserved.

PAUL v. NETTLEFOLD. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-day, 1824.—An executor (at least one who has a special interest) may call upon his co-executor for an inventory.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In this case an inventory is called for, from an executor, by a co-executor, but who is also sole residuary legatee.

It is objected to, on the ground that "an executor cannot sue his co-executor"—but the rule does not apply. The party calling for an inventory in this case does not call for it as co-executor, but in the character of residuary legatee. Those characters are quite distinct: so much so, that a person who possesses both, and wishes to decline being the representative of the testator, must renounce, as well the probate, in the character of executor, as the administration, with the will annexed, in the character of residuary legatee. As residuary legatee the party has the greatest interest in ascertaining what effects the testator left behind him; the whole of which effects may have got into the hands of the co-executor, without the knowledge or privity of the residuary legatee. I therefore see no ground in principle, nor has any [238] authority (indeed quite the contrary) (a) been produced, by which a residuary legatee, though also [239] possessing the character of executor, is deprived of the right of calling upon the other executor for an inventory, and consequently I over-rule this objection.

Objection over-ruled, and an inventory ordered.

GREENOUGH v. MARTIN. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1824.—A will and codicil pronounced for; and three intermediate codicils, propounded on behalf of legatees in the same, held to be invalid. In a Court of Probate, what instruments the testator meant to operate as, and compose, his will, is to be collected from all the circumstances of the case.

Jane Greenough, late of St. John's Wood, Mary-le-bone, in the county of Middlesex, the party deceased, died on the 14th of February, 1824.

The deceased, by her last will and testament, bearing date on the 30th of March, 1821, gave to her butler, Henry Martin, 300l., if he should be living in her service, or in the joint service of herself and her nephew, Mr. George Bellas Greenough (with whom the deceased then was and continued to be, resident till she died), at the time of her decease—and to her servant, formerly Elizabeth Fletcher, but then Martin, wife of Henry Martin, a like legacy of 300l., upon the same condition, subject also to which she farther gave to Elizabeth Martin an annuity for life of 50l.; [240] and to Henry and Elizabeth Martin, 15l. each for mourning.

(a) The following case, cited in the argument from a manuscript note of Dr. Bettesworth, would go to shew that an executor, as such merely, or without any special interest, might call upon his co-executor for an inventory:—

Huggins v. Alexander. In the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1735-6.

Mr. Alexander died, leaving children, minors; and made his will, whereof he appointed his wife, Mr. Huggins, and another person executors. The wife possessed herself of all the effects, and refused to give Mr. Huggins any account. Huggins thereupon cited her to give an inventory; and the question now was, whether, where two executors have taken probate jointly, one can call the other to bring in an inventory.

Dr. Strahan, for Mrs. Alexander, said—the deceased appointed his wife guardian to his children; and allowed her to dispose of 6000l. among the children, in such proportions as she should think fit. Executors and trustees by the will are not responsible for any involuntary acts or losses, but only for their own acts. One executor cannot sue another [Swinburn, part iv. s. 20] unless he has a special interest in the estate. Mr. Huggins hath nothing in the will, nor any interest.

Dr. Paul for Mr. Huggins. There are three executors and two trustees named in the will; and, by the will, the executors and trustees, or one of them, are to consent to the marriage of the minors. Huggins had an interest, as executor; and in Chancery one executor can sue another. In the Prerogative, February 6, 1726, Thomas Duck made an executor and an "overseer"—the "overseer" prayed a "commission of appraisement," and the Court decreed an inventory. Hugh Nash died at Paris, and left two sons, Hugh and Gyles, co-executors. Gyles prayed an inventory from the other; and it was granted in the Prerogative. Hugh appealed to the Delegates; but afterwards deserted his appeal, on September 8th, 1727.

Court [Dr. Bettesworth]. Where minors are concerned, the Court doth often, ex officio, order an inventory. There is no provision in the will, in case of the wife's second marriage. Huggins has taken probate; and, if she should die, he, as surviving executor, will be accountable. It is said that a co-executor, before probate, may call for an inventory; and he is then as much an executor as afterwards. The question is, whether Huggins has not an interest, merely as executor, sufficient to entitle him to a discovery of the estate. I am of opinion that he has; and therefore decree Mrs. Alexander to give in an inventory.

The deceased, in the interval between the 30th of March, 1821, and the 30th of December, 1823, made four codicils to her will, in favor of this same Martin and his wife. These codicils were wholly written by the deceased, although she was quite blind; owing to which they were nearly illegible, and not to be decyphered without great difficulty, viz.—

A codicil, dated May, 1821, by which she gave them 200l. each—over what she had left them by her will.

A codicil, dated January, 1822—by which she gave them 400l. each—over what she had left them by her will.

A codicil, dated 4th September (without any year, but probably 4th September, 1822), by which she gave to Elizabeth Martin, the wife, her "round silver salt spoons"—and

A codicil, dated "December, 1822," by which she gave to Henry Martin 500l.—likewise to Elizabeth Martin 500l.—without any mention of her will.

On the 30th of December, 1823, the deceased made and executed a codicil to her will, under the circumstances (pleaded and proved on the part of her executor, Mr. Greenough) which are stated in the judgment. By this codicil she expressly says, "I revoke the several legacies given by my will to the servants in my service, or in the joint service of myself and George Bellas Greenough, at my decease—excepting those to Henry Martin and Elizabeth Martin, his wife. The legacies of 300l. and 300l. which I have, by my will, given to Henry Martin [241] and Elizabeth Martin, his wife, I hereby increase to 1000l. sterling each—the said legacy of 1000l. to the said Elizabeth Martin, to be in addition to the life annuity of 50l. provided for her by my will. And I further, and additionally, give to the said Henry Martin and Elizabeth Martin 15l. each for mourning—such annuity and legacies to the said Henry Martin and Elizabeth Martin to be payable only in case they shall be in my service, or the joint service of myself and Mr. Greenough, at the time of my decease." And the following clause is then added:—"My said will, having been this day read over to me, I hereby confirm the same, excepting as to any legacy that may have lapsed by reason of the death of any legatee or legatees."

On the part of Mr. Greenough, her executor, it was contended that, under the circumstances so pleaded and proved, the codicils previously made by the deceased in favour of Mr. and Mrs. Martin, and now propounded in their behalf, were revoked by this codicil of the 30th of December, 1823. The allegation propounding the codicils opposed by the executor only pleaded (in addition to hand-writing and capacity) the period (as stated in the judgment) during which Martin and his wife had been in the service of the deceased—that the deceased reposed an entire confidence in them, and constantly entertained and expressed for them a great regard and affection—and that she frequently declared her intention to be, that "the longer Elizabeth Martin lived in her service, the better it should be for her"—lastly, that the codicils propounded shortly after the same were written respectively were lodged by the deceased with a [242] duplicate part of her will, in the hands of her bankers, Messrs. Drummond's, where they remained till the time of her death—and that the deceased never declared it to be her intention to revoke them or any of them, nor mentioned them either directly or indirectly, at the time of executing the codicil, dated the 30th of December, 1823.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Mrs. James Greenough, the testatrix in this cause, died on the 14th of February last, 1824—she was a very old lady, and had been quite blind for several years—she lived with her nephew—they kept house together. She had been attended for several years by Henry Martin and Elizabeth his wife: the husband had been her butler twenty-two years; the wife her own personal attendant twenty-eight years.

In March, 1821, she made her will: it was prepared in a full and formal manner by her solicitor, and executed in duplicate; one part of which was deposited with her solicitor, the other part with Messrs. Drummond's, her bankers. By this will she left Martin and his wife each a legacy of 300l., and she further bequeathed to Mrs. Martin an annuity of 50l. for life. In the month of May following, the deceased with her own hand, wrote (or rather scrawled, for it is scarcely legible on account of the deceased's blindness) a codicil giving to Martin and his wife each 200l. "over what left by my will." In January, 1822, she wrote a similar paper giving them 400l. each "over what left by my will." In December, 1822, she wrote another similar paper, giving each of them 500l.: but in this last paper there is no mention of her will. [243] These three papers she sent to her bankers. In December, 1823, she sent for her solicitor, desiring him to bring her will with him, as she wished to make a new one—he accordingly attended her, and took down her instructions in respect to the alterations which she wished to make by her new will. Among other instructions, she directed legacies of 1000l. each to Mr. and Mrs. Martin, and 15l. to each of them for mourning.

The solicitor, finding the alterations to be but few, suggested that they might conveniently be made by a codicil; to which she assented. The next day the solicitor brought the codicil for execution.

The will and the codicil were then read over to, and the latter executed by, the deceased. In the conclusion of the codicil she confirms the will except so far as altered by the codicil. Now, the question is, whether the will and this last codicil are alone to be proved; or whether the three intermediate codicils also composed a part of the deceased's testamentary dispositions.

In a Court of Construction, where the factum of the instrument has been previously established in the Court of Probate, the inquiry is pretty closely restricted to the contents of the instrument itself, in order to ascertain the intentions of the testator. But in the Court of Probate the inquiry is not so limited: for the intentions of the deceased as to what instruments shall operate as, and compose, his or her will, are to be there collected from all the circumstances of the case taken together.

In the present case it seems admitted that the second of these codicils, giving 400l. to each of the [244] Martins, "over what was left by the will," would, even in a Court of Construction, be held as a substitution for and not as an addition to, the bequest by the former codicil of 200l. each. But when the Court looks at the regular progress of these instruments, it can have very little doubt as to what were the real intentions of the testatrix in respect of all these codicils. After a very long service, when she makes her will she estimates the proper recompence to each of them at 300l.: she soon after adds 200l., making this 500l.; she then, after sometime, substitutes 400l. for the 200l., making the whole 700l.: near a twelvemonth afterwards she writes a paper, giving each of them 500l. This again was probably a substitution for the preceding codicil, as it would make the whole benefit to each 800l., and the deceased, under her infirmity of blindness, and sending each of these papers as they were written, severally, to her bankers, might, very probably, not be exact in the formality of her proceedings, or aware of the legal construction which these several instruments might be exposed to. But when she sent to her solicitor to bring the duplicate of her will, which was in his possession, to her; and gave him instructions as for an entire new will; and in and by that new will intended to make the benefit to Martin and his wife 1000l. each; I cannot bring my mind to doubt that upon this intended new will being, at the suggestion of her solicitor, converted into a codicil, the former will and this codicil were clearly intended to convey the whole benefit which she meant to give to Mr. and Mrs. Martin; and that she had no intention whatever that these intermediate papers, written by herself and [245] deposited at her bankers, should have any operation—the more especially as, by this codicil, now regularly executed, she confirms her will, except as thereby altered, but takes no notice of the three codicils now propounded. I am therefore of opinion that they do not compose a part of the deceased's will, and I must pronounce against their validity.

LANDON v. NETTLESHIP AND ARMITAGE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1824.—A probate called in at the suit of the widow; and the executors put on proof, per testes of the will, alleged by the widow to be invalid on account of the testator's incapacity. The will pronounced for; with costs against the widow, from the time of giving in her allegation; though against the evidence of two of the three attesting witnesses.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Henry Landon, a liquor merchant, died on the 31st of July, 1821, leaving a widow and five children. The will which is in contest in this cause bears date the preceding day; by this will he gives all his property to his wife and children, equally: except his real property, which he gives to his eldest son; and he appoints Mr. Nettleship and Mr. Armitage his executors, but without any benefit. He had no real property in possession: his personal estate is insolvent.

Probate of this will was taken by the executors soon after the testator's death; and they administered the effects for about eleven months: the probate is then called in by the widow; and the executors are put upon proof of the will. What just motive could exist for taking such a step in respect to this insolvent estate it is difficult to assign. The executors, however, have propounded the will; and in support of the factum they have examined the drawer of it, the three attesting witnesses, and the apothecary who attended the deceased.

[246] The drawer of the will mentions a circumstance, at the outset, rather of a startling kind; namely, that he was not allowed to go up stairs to the testator to receive the instructions, but that the instructions were brought down to him through the intervention of Armitage, one of the executors. The witness explains, however, the reason, namely, that he entertained certain religious opinions and occasionally preached; and that the deceased, being fearful that he, the witness, might think it right to urge his own opinions, declined a personal interview, as unwilling at that time to be disturbed upon such a subject. Another witness, Brown, was present and heard the deceased give the instructions. Besides, the executor who conveyed the instructions to the drawer of the will has no benefit whatever under the will—nay, he was not even intended to be an executor: for the deceased, having finished the dispositive part of the instructions, proposed to Brown to be one of the executors with Nettleship; and it is only upon Brown's declining that he requests Armitage to be an executor, to which Armitage assents and is thereupon appointed. Nettleship was not present at any part of the transaction. But, further—the widow, who perfectly well knew the condition of the testator, was actually a party to the whole transaction, though the will was to her prejudice, she not taking her distributive share, nor being even an executrix.

Brown is one of the attesting witnesses—and although he states that his memory is defective from ill-health, yet he appears to give a fair and cautious account of what passed—and if he is credited he fully proves capacity and volition. But the two [247] women who have attested the instrument describe the deceased as in a state of total insensibility. They are deposing, however, against their own act and against their own conduct at the time; and what is more, against the whole conduct of the very party who produces them as witnesses, the widow herself. The deceased's cellar-man also, who came into the room just after the execution, joins the two women in representing the deceased to have been then in a state of incapacity—but on an interrogatory he says that he "always represented the deceased to two persons, Nettleship and Page, to have been in an insensible state when he saw him." Now, these two persons, Nettleship (not the executor) and Page, who, on the next day and for four months afterwards, were in constant communication with this cellar-man, being generally employed in the same warehouse, positively depose that he never to them represented the deceased as being in a state of insensibility or intimated any thing of the kind—his credit is therefore materially shaken.

The medical attendant, Mr. Warner, left the deceased soon after twelve o'clock in the day on which the will was made; and he deposes that although he thought his recovery hopeless, yet his capacity was good at that time.

Mr. Warner's conduct at the time was consistent with the opinion he has now given—for on going away he recommended that, if the deceased had not settled his affairs already, he had better make his will. This circumstance connects itself with what is stated by the witness, Joseph Armitage, who says "that the widow told him the doctor had recom-[248]-mended the deceased's making his will, but that she did not think him so bad as the doctor did." Here then is the widow's own declaration at the time, confirming, indeed, her entire conduct that the testator was in a sufficient state of testamentary capacity.

The whole subsequent conduct of the widow and of all other parties tends to confirm the validity of the will. Immediately on the death the executors act in that character. Nettleship, who was not present at the making of the will, as well as Armitage, who was present, join in all acts. They conduct the funeral. They buy mourning for the family. They take probate of the will. They carry on the business. They renew the licence. They pay the rent. They meet the creditors.

At the meeting of the creditors it was ascertained that the estate was greatly insolvent: it was agreed to allow the widow three guineas and a-half a week for two months and to give her the preference of taking the stock in trade in case she could find friends to assist her. Three meetings of the creditors are held; when at length, some dispute arising, either between the creditors, or on account of the widow's weekly allowance being discontinued, the widow is put upon calling in question the validity of the will and compelling the executors to the proof of it by the present suit. I am of opinion that they have proved it and that they have been vexatiously harassed to their own injury and to the injury of the other creditors of this insolvent estate. The widow in this suit has set up the incapacity of the testator against the whole tenor of her own conduct, by which conduct she was, in effect, an attesting witness to this will. [249] It is therefore the duty of the Court not only to pronounce for the validity of the will, but to condemn the widow in costs from the time of giving in her allegation.

MOLONY v. MOLONY. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1824.—An allegation responsive to the libel in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights admitted to proof—although the facts pleaded amounted to a charge of neither cruelty nor adultery against the party by whom a sentence of restitution was prayed.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

This was a cause of restitution of conjugal rights promoted by "Edmund Molony, Esq., of Woodlands, in the county of Dublin, in Ireland, but now at Downing Street, in the county of Middlesex" (so described in the citation), against Jane Molony, of the parish of St. Mary-le-bone, in the county of Middlesex, his lawful wife.

The libel pleaded the marriage of the said Edmund Molony to Jane Molony, then Jane Jackson, widow, at Dunmore, in the county of Galway, in Ireland, on the 18th of March, 1817, and their cohabitation at Woodlands, till July, 1819; and, subsequently, in London, until the month of November, 1820; when it was pleaded that "the said Edmund Molony was obliged by important and necessary business to return to Ireland; but that the said Jane Molony declined to accompany him: upon which he proceeded thither alone, and left her residing in his house, No. 17, in Crawford Street, Portman Square"—that the said Edmund Molony "was detained by his said business for a considerable time in Ireland;" and that "some-[250]-time in or about the months of May or June, 1821, the said Jane Molony quitted his said house in Crawford Street; and, from that time, concealed the place of her residence from the said Edmund Molony"—that in the spring of 1823 the said Edmund Molony, by means of his friends, "discovered the residence of the said Jane Molony," and came to London in the month of May in that year; and that, since discovering the residence of his said wife, the said Edmund Molony had many times by himself and his friends required and intreated the said Jane Molony to live and cohabit with him; with which request and intreaty she, the said Jane Molony, had refused, and still refused, to comply without any just cause. And the libel concluded by praying that "the said Jane Molony might be compelled by the sentence of the Court to live and cohabit with the said Edmund Molony, to treat him with matrimonial affection; and to render him conjugal rights."

To this it was pleaded, responsively, on the part of the wife, in substance, as follows (a):—

1. That at the time of the marriage of the parties as pleaded in the libel Jane Molony, then Jane Jackson, widow, was entitled, under the will of her late husband, to an annuity of 800l. for life; and was possessed of jewels and other articles of personal property, valued at between 4000 and 5000l.: and that, [251] in virtue of her marriage settlement, this annuity of 800l. was secured to the wife for her own sole and separate use; and the husband became entitled to her other property of what nature soever.

2, 3. That from and after the marriage of the parties they cohabited at Woodlands for upwards of two years, and until the month of June, 1819; when Mrs. Molony, having become nearly blind in consequence of cataracts that had formed in her eyes, came to London, accompanied by her husband, to consult Mr. Alexander. That on

(a) This, it should be stated, however, is the substance of the allegation as reformed under the direction of the Court—a reform effected by striking out some parts of the allegation, in its original state objected to as irrelevant, and so deemed by the Court; and by introducing the substantive averment in the 6th article, as to the plaintiff's usual place of abode and fixed permanent domicil being in Ireland only.

Mr. and Mrs. Molony's arrival in London they took up their residence at a furnished house in Crawford Street; where they also cohabited until Mr. Molony's departure for Ireland in November, 1821. That Mrs. Molony did not on that occasion decline or refuse to accompany her said husband, as pleaded in the libel: but that Mr. Molony, without apprizing his wife either then or previously of any such intention, left his house in Crawford Street on the evening of the 19th of November in that year, and immediately proceeded to Ireland; where he continued till May or June, 1820.

4. That Mrs. Molony neither quitted the house in Crawford Street voluntarily; nor concealed from Mr. Molony her subsequent places of abode, as pleaded in the libel—on the contrary, that she continued in Crawford Street till the month of June, 1821, when she was compelled to quit it in consequence of an execution put into the house by the landlord for rent in arrear; under which execution her whole property, except her wearing apparel, was seized and removed—that payment of the wife's separate income had been stopt in this interval in consequence of proceedings [252] [a bill filed and injunctions had] instituted by the husband in Chancery against the wife and her trustees, towards the close of the year 1820—that, on so quitting Crawford Street, Mrs. Molony removed to lodgings, first in George Street, and afterwards, viz. in August, 1822, in Charles Street, Manchester Square—and that Mr. Molony was acquainted from the first with such his wife's changes and places of residence.

5. That from November, 1820, Mr. Molony neither saw nor communicated with (nor in any manner contributed to the maintenance and support of) his said wife till the month of June, 1823; when, being compelled to come to this country in order to give evidence in a suit then depending in the House of Lords, he did, upon arriving in London, call upon his said wife in Charles Street.

6. That the usual place of abode of the said Edmund Molony was, and had long been, at Woodlands in Ireland: and that he, the said Edmund Molony, had not any fixed place of residence in this country.

7. That the said Jane Molony, from 1819 down to the present time, had been in very delicate health; and had been confined to her house, and to her room principally, from August, 1822—and that the said Jane Molony was, in the opinion of her medical attendants, incapable of removing to Ireland, or undertaking any considerable journey, without imminent danger to her health.

The admission of this allegation was opposed by counsel, as not setting up any case which, however proved, would justify the Court in declining to pronounce the sentence prayed by the husband on proof, in substance, of his libel. They relied, of course, on the [253] commonly received maxim, departed from, as they maintained, in no single instance; that "facts pleadable in bar to a suit for restitution are such only as, upon proof, will entitle the party who pleads them to a sentence of separation, such sentence being prayed." (a) Nor could it be inferred, as they contended, either from the description of the husband in the citation, as from his now alleged sole domicil in Ireland, that it was the object of this suit to compel his wife to return to, and cohabit with him in, that country. But,

The Court overruled these objections—as not choosing at present to decide that the facts pleaded were wholly irrelevant—especially the wife's state of health; and the husband's sole domicil in Ireland, as pleaded. Consequently, it admitted the wife's allegation to proof—but without pledging itself to the effect of the facts pleaded as a bar, either wholly or in part, to the sentence prayed on behalf of the husband in the libel at the final hearing of the cause.

BAIN v. BAIN. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1824.—Alimony pendente lite is to be computed from the return only, and not from the issue, of the citation, even though considerably prior to the return—unless, possibly, under special circumstances.

In this, which was a suit instituted by the husband against the wife for a separation à mensâ et thoro, by reason of adultery, the Court upon this day allotted alimony to the wife, pendente lite, at the rate of 300l. per annum. It was then prayed on behalf of the wife that the Court would direct it to be computed from the issue, and not from the return, of the cita-[254]-tion, an interval of between three and four months: (a)[1] otherwise it was said the alimony, pendente lite, for the first year is in effect allotted at the rate of 200l. and not that of 300l. per annum, the proportional allotment, as with reference to the husband's faculties. But,

The Court saw nothing special in the case to induce it to depart from its usual practice of allotting alimony from the return only of the citation; and decreed accordingly.

SMYTH v. SMYTH. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, 1824.—It is incompetent to the Court under any circumstances to make a formal allotment to the wife of any sum, in the nature even, or as an account, of alimony; until a fact of marriage, at least, is either proved against or admitted by the husband.

This also was a cause similar to that of Bain v. Bain; instituted, however, by the wife against the husband.

The libel on this day was admitted as reformed; and the proctor for the wife now prayed that the Court would allot a sum to the wife, as on account, or in the nature, of alimony—this being the Court day immediately preceding a long vacation. But,

The Court said that it was incompetent to it, in point of form, to make any allotment to the wife of the nature prayed—there not only being no constat of the husband's faculties; but a marriage de facto, even though pleaded against, being neither proved nor confessed by [255] the husband. It recommended, however, that, in effect, the wife should be alimented proportionably to the husband's means—during the long vacation, intimating that it should take this into the account when, in the progress of the suit alimony pendente lite came to be regularly allotted, if its recommendation were not complied with.

STEEVEN AND HOLLAH v. THE RECTOR, PARISHIONERS, AND INHABITANTS OF THE PARISH OF ST. MARTIN ORGARS, IN SPECIAL, AND ALL OTHERS IN GENERAL. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, By-day, 1284.—An application for a faculty to take down a church (so styled), in effect, acceded to by the Court; under the peculiar circumstances, verified on behalf of the applicants, of the building being in a state of dilapidation; and there being no person, or persons, compellable by law to restore and uphold it.

(On motion.)

The parish church of St. Martin Orgars,(a)[2] together with that of the adjoining parish, St. Clement, Eastcheap, was destroyed by the fire of London in 1666. By the act of 22 Car. II. c. 11, for rebuilding the several churches, and the union of the respective parishes therein mentioned, it was enacted (s. 63) that the parishes of St. Clement, Eastcheap, and St. Martin Orgars should be united into one parish; and that the church thentofore belonging to St. Clement, Eastcheap, should be the parish church of the said parishes so united. And by sect. 66 of the same act it was provided that the scite of the church of [256] St. Martin Orgars, and the church-yard belonging to the same, should be inclosed with brick or stone walls for a burial place for the said united parishes, and should not be used or employed for any other purpose whatever—a general provision of the act extending to the several other demolished churches and their church-yards, similarly circumstanced under the act, with those of St. Martin Orgars.

It appears, however, that the rector and churchwardens of the said parish, by lease, bearing date the 3d of February, 1699, demised or granted the piece of ground whereon the church of St. Martin Orgars had formerly stood, to certain persons (as trustees for certain French refugees of the Protestant religion who had previously assembled, first, at a house in Jewin Street, and afterwards, at a house on College Hill, in virtue of the letters patent under the great seal of England,(a)[3] bearing date

(a)[1] The citation was served on the 26th of July [1823], but, owing to there being no intermediate Court day, it would not be returned till after the long vacation in November.

(a)[2] This epithet "Orgars" is derived by Newcourt from Odgarus, or Ordgarus, the probable founder of the church; who gave it to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, still its patrons, about the year 1185. See Rep. Eccl. vol. i. p. 416.

(a)[3] "Granted originally to Peter Alix, clerk, and such other French refugees of the Protestant religion" (very numerous, and becoming daily more so at that time, in consequence of the then recent revocation of the edict of Nantz) "as should join themselves with him."

the 16th of June, in the second year of King James the Second), in order to erect a church for the performance of divine service, and the celebration of the holy sacraments, or other rites of the church, in the French language, but according to the liturgy of the Church of England—saving to the rector and churchwardens of the said parish their right of burial therein, and all fees in respect thereof. This lease, which was for fifty years, with powers of renewal as covenanted in the same, and [257] at a reserved rent of 35l. per annum, was confirmed by a private act, 11 & 12 Will. III. No. 54.

A church was accordingly built, partly, it should seem, upon the old foundation: and continued from that time in the occupation of French Protestants, descendants, probably, of those for whose use it was originally erected, at first by renewal of their lease, and, latterly, as yearly tenants, till Christmas, 1823, when possession of the same was delivered up to the churchwardens of St. Martin Orgars; who, in consequence of the dilapidated state of the building, were authorized by order of vestry to take down the same, preserving the vaults beneath so as still to form part of the burial place of the inhabitants of the said parish.

Under these circumstances a decree had issued, at the promotion of the said churchwardens, calling upon the rector, parishioners, and inhabitants of the parish of St. Martin Orgars, in special, and all others in general, having or pretending to have any right, title, or interest in the premises, to appear and shew cause why a licence or faculty should not be granted to the churchwardens for the purpose aforesaid with the usual intimation: which citation having been duly published in the church of St. Clement, Eastcheap, and returned without any appearance given, the Judge was now moved to decree a faculty pursuant to the said intimation.

Court [Sir Christopher Robinson]. The Court is disposed on the whole to accede to the present application, unwilling as it is, upon general considerations, to sanction the utter demolition of any building which has something, at least, of the cha-[258]-racter of a national church.(a) At the same time it could wish this matter to stand over in order to afford the parish time to consider whether this building, which is a spacious building, and not, as the Court has ascertained by its own inspection, in a state of visible decadency, might not be repaired and made subservient in some way (for instance, as a national school) to the church establishment: its appropriation in this sort the Court might feel itself justified in sanctioning under, at least, the implied authority of the private act of King William the Third. In the event of the building itself being wholly demolished the scite can only be used for a burial place; and can be devoted to no other use whatever under the express provisions of the act of Car. II. sect. 66.

Let this matter stand over till next term; in which interval an accurate survey may be made of the state of the building; and the parish may have time to consider, or to reconsider, the propriety of applying it, and the capacity of the building to be applied in some such manner as that which I have suggested. But if they think it ultimately expedient, as there are great dilapidations, though principally, it seems to me, in the [259] roof, and which nobody is compellable to repair, I think that they are entitled to have the scite of the old church restored to the state contemplated by the fire act; under which impression I shall be disposed to accede to their renewed application for a faculty to take this building down, unconditionally. I understand that the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, the patrons of the living, have been consulted; and have intimated that it is not their intention to offer any objection.

BRISCO v. BRISCO. High Court of Delegates, Trinity Term, 1st June 1824.—Adultery committed by either party (husband or wife) at any time before sentence will bar a sentence of separation at the suit of the other party; or will compel the Court to dismiss both parties, adultery being mutually, or reciprocally, charged in the cause: and Courts must permit either of such parties to plead adultery against the other in any stage of such a cause, whether before or after publication, and how long soever this may have passed, or the cause may have been depending, it being certified to have been pleaded within a reasonable time after coming to the proponent's knowledge.

(a) The Court observed that the act of King William had scarcely impressed that character permanently upon it, although, in confirming the lease, &c., it provided "that, before the building to be erected should be made use of for purposes of divine worship, it should be decently fitted and accommodated; and so furnished and adorned as the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London for the time being, or one of them, should direct and appoint." Quære, however, such being the character of the building, the necessity for any faculty to justify the parishioners in taking it down?

The Judges who sat upon this question were Mr. Justice Burrough, Mr. Baron Garrow,(a) Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Gostling, Dr. J. Addams.

This cause commenced in the Consistory Court of London; and was brought by Dame Sarah Brisco against her husband Sir Wastel Brisco, Baronet, for a divorce by reason of cruelty and adultery.

[260] The following is an abstract of such of the proceedings in the cause as require to be stated with reference to the question before the Court.

The citation was returned on the first session of Hilary Term, 1814; and a libel brought in in the same term was admitted to proof, without opposition, on the fourth session of Easter Term in that year.

In the month of April, 1815, an allegation, responsive to the libel, was brought in on the part of Sir Wastel Brisco; and was admitted, as reformed, having been opposed in its original state on the first session of the following Trinity Term.

In the month of May, 1816, a rejoinder or second plea was filed on behalf of Lady Brisco, and was admitted to proof, without opposition, as the libel had been, on the first session of Trinity Term in that year.

Publication of the evidence taken upon these several pleas passed in the Consistory Court of London on the 20th of May, 1817. And on the first session of Hilary Term, 1818, both proctors asserted allegations, exceptive to the testimony of the witnesses.

Such exceptive allegation on the part of Sir Wastel Brisco was argued on the third session, and was admitted on the fourth session of that same Hilary Term. The admissibility of an exceptive allegation offered on behalf of Lady Brisco was debated on the second session of the following (Easter) term; when the Judge of the Consistory Court, directing certain articles of that allegation to be reformed and, especially refusing to admit to proof, or wholly rejecting the 5th, the 8th, the 9th, and the 12th articles of [261] the allegation, the proctor for Lady Brisco appealed to the Court of Arches.

In the Court of Arches the Judge was pleased, on the fourth session of Easter Term, 1819, to allot the same sum to Lady Brisco for alimony pendente lite, being the sum of 200l. per annum, as had been allotted to her by the Judge of the Court below. But having, at the same time, ordered or decreed that such alimony should be computed from the date of the sentence appealed from, and not merely from the return of the inhibition, as prayed by Sir Wastel Brisco, an appeal on the part of Sir Wastel Brisco was lodged from that order or decree to the High Court of Delegates.

On the 15th of February, 1820, the cause on the appeal as to this grievance came before the High Court of Delegates (the whole commission); when the judges pronounced against the appeal, and affirmed the order appealed from: but (at the prayer of both proctors) they retained the principal cause (3 Phil. 106); and therein decreed a monition against Sir Wastel Brisco for the payment of certain costs, and the alimony then due. And on the second session of Easter Term, 1820, Sir Wastel Brisco was pronounced in contempt, and directed to be signified, by the Court of Condelegates, for not having obeyed that monition, duly and personally served upon him.

On the third session of Michaelmas Term, 1822,(b) Sir Wastel Brisco was absolved from his contumacy by the Court of Condelegates, on payment of the [262] costs and alimony, for non-payment of which he had been pronounced in contempt, and taking the usual oath: upon which the cause, as to the appeal from the rejection, &c., of certain parts of Lady Brisco's exceptive allegation by the Consistory Court of London, was proceeded in, and the same came on for hearing, before the whole commission, on the 19th of June, 1823; when the judges admitted the 8th, 9th, and 12th articles of (a) Mr. Justice Best, who was also named in the commission, had taken his seat as Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in the interval between this and the last sitting of the Court; and was not present.

(b) Sir Wastel Brisco was understood to have been abroad during the greater part of this interval, to avoid an attachment under the significavit.

that allegation, which had been rejected by the Judge of the Consistory Court, as also the 5th article, with a slight reformation.

On the by-day after Michaelmas Term, 1823, the Court of Condelegates decreed publication of the evidence upon these exceptive allegations; when, on the same day, the proctor for Lady Brisco asserted, and prayed leave to bring in a further allegation, on the part of her ladyship, in the principal cause. The Court of Condelegates declining, as upon its own responsibility, to receive that further allegation in this late stage of the proceedings, the proctor then prayed to be heard, as to this, upon his petition,(a)[1] before the whole commission; and that prayer was referred by the Court of Condelegates to, and now came before, the whole commission, as at the final hearing of the cause; when the proctors of the several parties concurred in praying a sentence of separation—the proctor for Lady Brisco, by reason of the cruelty and adultery of Sir Wastel Brisco—the proctor for Sir Wastel Brisco by reason of adultery committed by Lady Brisco—the proctor for Lady Brisco, however, also praying that the judges would first rescind [263] the conclusion of the cause in order to receive the allegation aforesaid, and admit the same to proof, before proceeding to the hearing of the principal cause; in the event only of which prayer being rejected he prayed it to pronounce to the effect before stated.

The allegation so brought in, in the principal cause on the part of Lady Brisco, in substance pleaded the commission of adultery by Sir Wastel Brisco with a person named Sarah Stow, a servant in his family, with whom it pleaded that he went to reside in furnished lodgings at a house situate in Upper Norton Street, in the parish of Mary-le-bone, in the month of February, 1821: that they continued to live and reside there, passing as husband and wife, till the latter end of March, in the same year: and that, after leaving the said lodgings, they, the said Sir Wastel Brisco and Sarah Stow, went to Crofton Hall, the seat of Sir Wastel Brisco in Cumberland, where an adulterous intercourse (alleged still to subsist) was kept up, and carried on, between the said parties; in consequence of which she, the said Sarah Stow, had been delivered of two children, the one in September, 1822, and the other in September, 1823, begotten upon her body by the said Sir Wastel Brisco. This allegation was accompanied with an affidavit, made by Lady Brisco, to the effect that the several facts and circumstances pleaded in the allegation did not come to her ladyship's knowledge till the month of August, 1823, long after the 20th of May, 1817, when publication of the evidence taken in the cause passed in the Consistory Court of London.

In opposition to the reception of this further allegation in the principal cause, on the part of Lady Brisco (the preliminary question), it was not attempted to be [264] maintained, by the counsel for Sir Wastel Brisco, that the allegation ought not to be received upon general considerations, and viewed as with reference to general principles: but they contended that this being a suit unique, and sui generis, as it were, with respect to the length of time consumed and the number of witnesses examined in it, the Court, in its discretion, ought not to rescind the conclusion of the cause in this last stage of it, and by so doing permit her ladyship, in effect, to set up a new case, nearly seven years after publication of the principal evidence taken in the cause, and founded upon delinquency of the husband, admitting it to be, even laid in the allegation to have occurred, more than seven years after the return of the citation.

On the part of Lady Brisco it was contended, on the other hand, that these circumstances were not of a nature at all to affect the general principle (a)[2] upon which

(a)[1] No petition in fact was entered into, the question being determined, as upon a mere motion, at the (intended) hearing of the cause. See post, pp. 263-266.

(a)[2] "Quando ante divortii sententiam contingit innocentis lapsus, constat inter omnes doctores teneri hunc ad conjugem dimissam—immo post sententiam;" he afterwards says "satis probabiliter docent multi" [lib. x. disp. x. No. 24.] And so, as to this last particular (for the first appears to admit of no question) Ayliffe asserts [Parer. 226] that "if the husband himself shall, after such divorce (namely, for the wife's adultery), commit fornication, the marriage shall be restored, on the score of his lewdness, and the husband, for a punishment, shall be obliged to receive his wife again." By this, however, it is not to be understood that the "lapsus innocentis post divortium" places the other party in a condition to charge, or object, that delinquency, in the first instance, in order to make it the foundation of a prayer the allegation was confessedly receivable, or to prevent its application to the individual case; that the [265] husband's delinquency, at any time prior to sentence, would bar his claim to a legal separation on account [266] of his wife's adultery; as also would entitle the wife (adultery, as in this instance, being mutually or reciprocally charged) to a sentence of separation on account of the husband's adultery, in the event of the charge against her not being proved. Consequently, they insisted that facts of the nature of those now pleaded were strictly pleadable in such a cause at any time prior to a sentence; being also, as sworn in this instance, noviter perventa, or facts that had recently come to the proponent's knowledge: so that the allegation before the Court, at however late a period of the cause offered, ought to be received.

The Court on deliberation inclining to this view of the subject; and that this was not a case in which it was at liberty to exercise any such discretion with respect to rescinding the conclusion of the cause, &c., as that with which Sir Wastel Brisco's counsel had sought to invest it, finally pronounced for receiving the allegation; and it was afterwards, on the same day, without further opposition from Sir Wastel Brisco's counsel, admitted to proof.

for "restitution of conjugal rights." This is to be inferred from the terms made use of by Ayliffe, "for a punishment," &c., and from the following passage in Sanchez, upon whom Ayliffe probably found himself in this dictum; although neither that of Sanchez nor any other authority is expressly vouched for it.

The fourth opinion upon this subject, says Sanchez—"Quarta sententia (cui adhæreo tanquam probabiliori) asserit nullam actionem acquiri conjugi adultero ut repetat innocentem, qui, post divortii sententiam adulteratus est; atque ita ea delicta minimè compensari: integrum tamen esse judici ut eos conciliet, ex officio suo illos cogens, quo fornicationis periculo consulatur. Prob. prior pars, nimirum non dari actionem: 1mo, quia, semel bene diffinitum minimè retractandum est: secundò, quia servitus, semel amissa, non renascitur: Servitus autem innocentis conjugis amittitur, lata sententia divortii: Tertiò, quia licet adulterii exceptio per simile adulterium extinguatur; at exceptio rei judicatæ, quæ obstat priori conjugi repetenti, minimè aboletur per crimen post sententiam admissum: Quartò, quia divortii sententia absolvit innocentem a debito conjugalis societatis; dissolviturque contractum matrimonii quoad jus thori, et habitationis, manente vinculo: quare innocens, postea fornicans, reus erit adulterii in ordine ad Deum ob vinculum matrimonii perseverans; non tamen peccabit adversus conjugem dimissum, nec illi injuriam inferet, utpote qui jure in illius corpus destiturus erat per sententiam, &c." This, he says, however, is only to be understood "quando sententia illa divortii transiit in rem judicatam, eo quod decennium appellationi concessum sit transactum; vel si fuerint tres sententiæ latæ. Nam si id non ita se habeat, perinde reputandum est ac si sententia non præcessisset adulterium posterius: quia virtus sentiæ est suspensa."

"Debet autem," he goes on to observe, "judex ex officio, licet alter conjux minime petat, hos conjuges reconciliare. Quia Prælatus, ut pastor animarum, tenetur periculis incontinentiæ occurrere. Hoc autem intelligendum non est regulariter: sed solum quando manifestum est, periculum conjugum, et aliorum scandalum. Sic Sotus. Bart à Ledesma, et alii. Imo Sotus et Bart. à Ledesma recte dicunt minimè teneri judicem uti medio tam rigido, nisi conjux ille prius innocens perditissime viveret, magnum suis adulteriis scandalum generans. At posse compellere, in pœnam, ob ejus conjugis scandalum." See Sanchez, lib. x. disp. x. No. 30, 31, per tot.

This note has been extended, in consequence of a doubt expressed in a late work (suggested in part by something reported to have recently fallen from a learned judge) whether the doctrine of "compensation" might not possibly apply to the extent of entitling either party, a wife or a husband, divorced for adultery from the other party, to be restored to his or her conjugal rights on proof of similar delinquency in that other party, even though itself not occurring till after such sentence of divorce. See Mr. Poynter's "Law of Marriage and Divorce" (p. 225, 2d ed. 1824); where the various points connected with those subjects are neatly arranged, and are stated, in the main, with great accuracy.

[267] DURANT v. DURANT. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1824.—When the Court is prayed to rescind the conclusion of a cause, in order to fresh matter being pleaded, it always requires to be satisfied both that the party praying it is in no laches and that the measure prayed is one essential to the ends of justice. It always further requires that some special ground be laid (as that of such fresh matter having newly come to the party's knowledge, or as the case may be) to found the prayer.

[See further, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 528, 733.]

(On petition.)

This was a cause of divorce by reason of adultery, brought by the wife against the husband.(a) The present question respected an application made to the Court on the part of the husband, by act on petition, to rescind the conclusion of the cause: in order to receive an allegation not filed in due time, that is, before the cause was concluded, exceptive to the testimony of certain witnesses examined upon the wife's libel.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In deciding upon this petition I must be understood to confine myself to the matter of the petition—for I have not thought it my duty, in order to this, to peruse and consider all the evidence (the depositions of forty-four witnesses) (b) and all the pleadings in the principal cause. The petition must stand upon its own statements—together, indeed, with what of the principal cause has been brought officially to the notice of the Court in former stages of it.

[268] The proceedings have throughout, I must say, the same general complexion. The cause throughout has an appearance of great and studied delay in one of the parties. It is a charge brought by the wife against the husband of adultery—which, whether well or ill founded, ought at once to have been fairly met. The suit, however, has existed nearly five years; during the last four at least of which it has been adversely contested, without any decision either as to the principal point or even as to the matter of alimony: so that the wife has merely obtained from time to time, and with difficulty, small pittances on account of alimony, instead of being in possession of stated alimony during this long interval, to which she was justly entitled. On the second session of Hilary Term, 1823, nearly two years ago, the Court concluded the principal cause and assigned it for informations and sentence on the next Court day; rejecting an application made by the husband's proctor to allow further time to bring in an exceptive allegation to certain witnesses examined on the wife's libel—an application founded merely upon verbal statements made by the proctor and unsupported by any affidavit. From this an appeal was lodged at once to the Court of Delegates; who in Trinity Term, 1823, affirmed the order of this Court and remitted the cause—in which, however, when the Court was about to proceed "according to the tenor of former acts," namely, to a hearing, it was again stopped by the present petition, praying that it would rescind the conclusion of the cause and allow time for giving in an exceptive allegation—a prayer which, as I have just said, it had once already rejected when moved to grant it (at that time, to be sure, on verbal statements merely) by the defendant's proctor.

[269] Applications of this nature, for obvious reasons, are seldom acceded to by the Court; though undoubtedly it is competent to the Court to accede to them. But in order to this it ought at least, I think, independent of any special ground laid, first to be satisfied both that the measure prayed is one essential to the ends of justice; and that the necessity for praying it has resulted from no laches on his part in whose behalf it is prayed. In the absence of either, à fortiori of both, those requisites, the Court is bound to reject such a prayer, if for that reason or for those reasons only—especially in a case the proceedings in which justify a suspicion that the measure itself may be one of several contrivances to protract and impede the decision of the principal cause.

The special ground laid, in addition to those general ones already suggested, for an application to rescind the conclusion of a cause in order to permit fresh matter to be pleaded, ordinarily is that certain material facts are "noviter perventa,' newly come to the knowledge of the applicant. No such ground is laid in support of this prayer—on the contrary, the special ground is one of such a nature as to suggest serious doubts whether, under any circumstances, the Court would be justified in attaching any weight to it in support of such a prayer. No "new facts" are even alleged to have come to the knowledge of the defendant in this cause. He has endeavoured, however, both to relieve himself from any charge of laches and to satisfy the Court that the measure prayed is one really essential to a due decision upon the merits of the cause—with what success I proceed to consider; in doing which, that special ground laid for sustaining the prayer of this petition, to [270] which I have just adverted, will incidentally disclose itself.

(a) See 1 Add. 114.

(b) Twenty-three on the libel, and twenty-one on the allegation of faculties.

Of the evidence taken in this cause, publication actually passed on the fourth session of Michaelmas Term, 1822, the proctor for the husband declaring (all facts being then to be propounded) that he should give no allegation unless exceptive to the testimony of witnesses; upon which the cause stood "on admission of such exceptive allegation, if any, on the by-day; if not admitted, the cause to be concluded, and assigned for informations and sentence the next Court." From the by-day that assignation was continued till the first session of the ensuing term (a period of nearly seven weeks), the husband's proctor being at the same time assigned to deliver a copy of his exceptive allegation to the adverse proctor fourteen days before that first session; with a strong intimation from the Court that, not complying precisely with the assignation, he must, at all events, be prepared satisfactorily to account for this, by an affidavit or affidavits, to save the cause from being concluded. Under these assignations, neither an allegation being tendered nor a single affidavit to account for its not being, even upon the first session of Hilary Term itself, the Court concluded the cause—the appeal from which decree and the proceedings under that appeal and subsequently have already been stated; and the effect of which has already been to delay the hearing of this cause nearly two years. Are, then, the facts stated in this petition such and so sustained as to induce the Court to occasion still further delay, by rescinding the conclusion of the cause at this late period in order to admit an exceptive plea?

The principal, I might almost say the only, matter [271] set up, both to justify the husband on the score of laches and also to lay any special foundation for the present application, is that he was prevented from filing his allegation at the time assigned him by the Court through the illness of his attorney. The petition states in substance that immediately upon copies of the evidence being taken, the same were forwarded to Thomas Wood, the attorney of the husband, and who had attended the execution of the commission issued by this Court for the examination of witnesses on the libel and allegation of faculties at Penkridge in Staffordshire, as the proctor's substitute, with an earnest request that instructions should forthwith be furnished for an exceptive plea, if any such was intended to be offered—this in the beginning of December—but that early in that month Mr. Wood was taken ill and was confined to his house from that time for the space of three months (only once going out upon urgent business), by reason of which he was prevented from seeing the husband on the subject of this exceptive plea—however, that he forwarded the evidence to the husband, with written advice on the subject, who returned the same with directions that the necessary steps should be taken to except to the testimony of five witnesses examined on the libel—that the husband was then apprized by Wood of the nature of the evidence which would be required in support of such exceptive plea; who thereupon instituted enquiries as to the persons whom he supposed competent to give evidence in support of it—in the course of which, from the difficulty in discovering the abode of such persons and the distance thereof from the husband's residence, so considerable an interval elapsed that only on the [272] 17th of January (three days before the first session of Hilary Term) the proctor received final instructions for an exceptive plea—and being then only for the first time informed of the illness of the said Thomas Wood, &c.; he was unable on the first session of Hilary Term either to comply with the assignation of the Court as to giving in the exceptive allegation or to procure an affidavit accounting for the delay.

Now here, in the first place, not to insist that this Court knows nothing of attornies; that the proctor is "dominus litis," and that he and his principal are alone responsible both to the Court and the other party, I must observe that the fact of Mr. Wood's illness to any such extent as to account for the delay alleged to have been occasioned by that illness, is denied, and is, I think, substantially disproved on the part of the complainant. But supposing the fact to have been true—supposing that his assistance as an agent was, if not so necessary, so convenient, as hardly to be dispensed with; that he, Wood, was incapacitated by illness from affording that assistance, and that the services of no other agent could be substituted for or accepted in lieu of his, what is there to account for all this not being verified to the Court at the proper time by affidavit? The statement in the act on petition may excuse the proctor in respect of laches, especially as it states him to have written as early as the 6th of December, earnestly desiring instructions forthwith in the premises; notwithstanding which he hears nothing of the parties till the 17th of January. But this, which acquits the proctor of laches, fixes that imputation the more forcibly, either on the party or on his sub-agent, for whose acts he is answerable, or on both—it [273] being incumbent, as I have said, for the party to have absolutely cleared himself from any such imputation, to justify the Court in acceding to him the indulgence now prayed. Hence I think that the excuse offered is neither true in fact nor sufficient in kind if it were true. And I must further observe that even supposing the case now set up, the main ground for the indulgence now prayed had been made in due time, and urged in a proper shape, that of a petition, sustained by affidavits, to the Court itself, to rescind the conclusion of the cause in lieu of and prior to the appeal; it might have been a grave question how far the Court would have been justified, no disability in either the proctor or the party being alleged in permitting the disability of a third party, of a solicitor of whom the Court knows nothing, to operate the desired effect; or at all to weigh with it in favour of that one party to the prejudice of the other.

The Court might stop here without any impropriety: for at least the party who prays it, being in laches, has made out no title to the indulgence prayed, on that ground only. But let us see how far the measure prayed, upon this shewing, is one likely to be essential to the ends of justice in the cause: a consideration in which it will also further incidentally appear, whether the husband has a fair claim to any special indulgence of this description.

Now so far is the measure prayed from being one apparently essential to the ends of justice, on the face of this petition, that I think it extremely doubtful how far any allegation in exception to the testimony of the five witnesses proposed to be excepted to would have been admissible, even prior to the conclusion of [274] the cause. I am not saying that it might not have so been, if tendered in the proper stage of the cause. But I do say that its claims to admission even then would have been so strictly investigated by the Court, and would have been required to be made out in so unexceptionable a manner, as to render this extremely questionable. Who are the five persons proposed to be excepted to? They are persons living in the defendant's own neighbourhood, and deposing to his own conduct; so that he must have known, generally at least, if not very specifically, the effect of their evidence, from the contents of the libel in proof of which they were examined. Add to this, it is not suggested that they have introduced any extra-articulate matter into their depositions; or that the husband had not full time and opportunity to cross-examine them. Now it is difficult to conceive that an exceptive allegation to the testimony of such witnesses, under such circumstances, could have made good its claim to be admitted at any time. From the moment of their production he must have known their general character—and from the contents of the libel, as I have said, the substance, at least, of their testimony. Yet neither is their general character excepted to—nor is the libel in such or any particulars contradicted by plea; for the husband gave no plea whatever before publication. As then no rule is better known or ought more strictly to be adhered to than this; that a witness shall not be excepted to, as to facts spoken to in his deposition, provided the party against whom that witness appears might have contradicted those facts by plea prior to publication—it is difficult, I say, to conceive, for it is unnecessary to decide that point absolutely, that the husband could [275] have framed any allegation, in exception to the testimony of these witnesses, that the court would have admitted to proof in any stage of this cause. Be that, however, as it may, there is nothing on the face of this petition, which is all that I can look to, to satisfy me that the indulgence now prayed is one at all likely to conduce essentially to the ends of justice in this cause; from which, as well as from thinking that other circumstance alleged in order to induce the Court to grant this indulgence, viz. the illness of the party's attorney, neither such in itself, nor so sustained that it ought to have any weight with the Court, and from the laches of the party on whose behalf it is made, I hold myself bound to reject the prayer of the petition.

If, however, at the hearing it shall appear that the cause entirely, or even mainly depends upon the testimony of the five (out of twenty-three) witnesses on the libel proposed to be excepted to, so that every thing, or even much, depends upon giving them full credit (their credit being shaken, as by interrogatories or otherwise), the Court in its discretion, and in order to arrive at the real and substantial justice of the case, may even then rescind the conclusion of the cause and permit evidence to be taken upon a plea of the description of that now proposed to be offered. But on the statements made in this petition, the Court cannot hesitate in rejecting the prayer of it, and in proceeding to hear the cause. And as it is the duty of both parties to be ready to proceed to the hearing, for so stands the assignation, I shall proceed to the hearing next Court day, at least at the prayer of the [276] wife, the complainant, whether this be convenient or otherwise to the defendant in the cause.(a)

Petition rejected.

GREG v. GREG. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1824.—If an appearance under protest be given to an inhibition which discloses an appealable grievance, on the face of it, without at the same time so disclosing any peremption of the appellant's right to appeal therefrom, the court will at least overrule such protest and direct an absolute appearance.—Note 1. That praying a judge to rescind any order perempts an after appeal from that order. 2. That his refusing to accede to such prayer is not itself an appealable grievance, any more than is—3. His refusing to permit witnesses to be examined "on the day assigned to propound all facts;" even though such witnesses are actually in court, and are sworn to be necessary witnesses.

(On protest.)

This was a suit by the husband for restitution of conjugal rights, appealed by the wife to this Court from that in which it originally depended (the Consistory Court of London) on a grievance. The husband appeared to the usual inhibition of the Court, not absolutely, but under protest; and the validity of that protest was the point immediately at issue.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by the husband against the wife, originally depending in the Consistory Court of London, and is appealed to this Court by the wife. It is necessary that I should briefly advert to the proceedings in the [277] Court below, in order to arrive at the merits of the present question; which arises out of an appearance given by the husband under protest to the inhibition issued by this Court.

The citation was returned on the first session of Easter Term, 1819, but no appearance was given for the wife till the second session of Hilary Term, 1820. On the second session of Easter Term, 1820, a libel was given in by the husband in common form. This produced a responsive allegation on the part of the wife; but not again till the third session of Trinity Term, 1821: nor was that allegation admitted, as finally reformed, till the first session of Easter Term, 1822. The husband's answers were brought in, in the October of that year; but no witnesses have been produced upon this allegation. A second plea on the part of the husband was brought in on the by-day after Hilary Term, and was admitted on the 12th of May, 1823. Upon this, as also upon the libel, witnesses have been examined; and on the third session of the following Michaelmas Term the husband prayed "publication, and all facts to be propounded next Court." Such have been the proceedings, as appears by the several assignations in the Court below, in the principal cause; exclusive of that from which this appeal is prosecuted, of which presently—and I must say that they carry with them every appearance of studied delay in the wife, the party proceeded against in the original cause, and the appellant in this Court.

Collaterally with these proceedings in the principal cause there were some other proceedings, also depending between the same parties in the Court below, upon a matter incidental to, though partly independent [278] of, the first, which require to

(a) The principal cause, however, was not finally disposed of till the second session of Easter Term, 1825; when the judge held the libel to be proved, and pronounced the sentence of separation prayed by Mrs. Durant. From that sentence Mr. Durant has since appealed to the High Court of Delegates.

be stated. On the first session of Easter Term, 1821, the wife's proctor prayed to be heard, "on taxation of costs." The proctor for the husband prayed to be heard, on his petition, in objection to this; and, on the first session of Trinity Term following, alleged that he had delivered his "act" to the wife's proctor, who was assigned to return the same the next Court. Instead, however, of complying with that assignation precisely, or in any sense of the word, the "act" in question is not returned by the wife's proctor even upon the third session of Michaelmas Term, 1823, when the husband's proctor, as I have said, prayed "publication, and to propound all facts next Court." The proctor for the wife objects to this assignation; and on the by-day after that Michaelmas Term (then, for the first time alleging that he has (just) returned the act to the husband's proctor) prays that the Court will rescind the assignation decreeing "publication, and to propound all facts;" and that it will extend the term probatory till the wife's costs are paid—whilst the proctor for the husband prays the Court to conclude the cause, and assign it "for informations and sentence." No order should seem to have been made upon this; the judge merely directing the whole matter to stand over generally. It is pretty obvious, I think, from the course of the above proceedings, that the wife had means of defending herself independent of the husband; for she takes no step to enforce payment of her costs by the husband for above two years.

On the first session of Easter Term, 1824, the act of Court (that, I mean, as to the question of costs) is at length concluded, and affidavits on both sides are [279] brought in in support of it. On the second session the petition is heard, and the judge takes time to deliberate. On the third session the wife's proctor tenders a further affidavit in support of his petition, which, however, the Court rejects, together with the petition (the wife's petition for her costs) itself; and at the same time, at the husband's petition, concludes the cause, and assigns it for informations and sentence.

I do not make out very clearly how the assignation stood upon this Court day, no process being before the Court. I rather apprehend it to have been a sort of compound assignation; "to propound all facts, and on petition of both proctors." But however the assignation stood on that Court day, on the following Court day, viz. the fourth session of Easter Term, the cause is alleged to be, in due time and place, appealed on the part of the wife—and the wife's proctor, at the petition of the proctor for the husband (not alleging the supposed grievance not to be an appealable matter, or that, if an appealable matter, the appeal had been perempted as by acquiescence, or otherwise, so that it is competent to the Court below to proceed to a sentence, notwithstanding the appeal, or any thing of that sort) at the petition, I say, of the proctor for the husband, is assigned to prosecute his appeal by the first session of the next term. In spite of which, however, that proctor for the husband now appears under protest to the inhibition issued by this Court—submitting the incompetence of the wife to allege the appeal from which he prays the husband's dismissal: at the same time praying the Court "to retain the principal cause"—prayers of which I will only say that the latter appears to me not very well to [280] consist with the former. Such, in substance, as far as I have been able to collect them, have been the several proceedings in this cause.

Now the Court, without any process before it, and consequently without any assurance even that the proceedings, such as I have described them, have been accurately stated (for it can place no great reliance in this particular, either on the written statement of those proceedings in the act of Court, into which the protest has been extended or (indeed still less) upon any supplementary or explanatory statement of them, addressed to it verbally in argument by counsel), must look principally, if not solely, in order to determine the merits of the protest to what appears on the face of the inhibition. Does that, on the face of it, or does it not, disclose an appealable grievance or appealable grievances? By this, almost sole, consideration it is that the protest must stand or fall; for whether the Court below was right or wrong in making the orders or decrees appealed from, or, in other words, the merits of the appeal itself, are matters of which it is incompetent to it to form any notion even under the present proceeding.

This appeal is generally, as appears by the inhibition, from "certain grievances, nullities, iniquities, injustices, and injuries (words, these, of common form) done to and inflicted upon the appellant by the judge of the Court à quo:" but it is more especially "from the said judge having, on the third session of Easter Term (to wit, Saturday, the 22nd day of May), in the year 1824, by his order or decree, refused to admit and hear read a certain affidavit then tendered on behalf of Sabina Mary-Ann Greg (the appellant): and also from the said judge having, by the said order [281] or decree, rejected the prayer of the proctor of the said appellant 'to rescind the order or decree made by him, the said judge, on the third session of Michaelmas Term, 1823, whereby he decreed publication in the cause, and assigned all facts to be propounded:' and from his having refused to direct the registrar to tax the costs made, and to be made, on behalf of the appellant, and to enlarge the term probatory until the said costs should have been paid; and, further, to allow a reasonable time after payment of the said costs for the examination of witnesses upon the allegation given in on behalf of the appellant: and from his having concluded the said cause, and assigned the same for informations and sentence"—to the "manifest injury of justice, and to the very great detriment and prejudice (words of common form again) of the said Sabina Mary-Ann Greg, the said appellant."

Such, then, on the face of the inhibition itself, to which an appearance under protest has been given in this proceeding, are the orders or decrees of the judge of the Consistory Court specially appealed from. It appears to me that they are orders or decrees of a very different complexion, and that they are subject, in this respect, to very different considerations.

The first alleged grievance is the judge's "refusing to rescind an order." Now, the very praying of the judge to rescind that order is, pro tanto, an acquiescence in the order; it is an act of the party, subsequent to and in respect of it, which, in my judgment, is sufficient to perempt any after appeal; that is, from the order itself.(a) As to the mere "refusal to rescind an [282] order," that is a matter not appealable, but one solely in the judge's own discretion, in my view of it.

The order or decree next specially appealed from is one her right to appeal from which the party appellant had perempted by no act of her own that I am aware of. But is that order or decree itself an appealable grievance? I strongly incline to hold that it is not an appealable grievance; being, like the refusal to rescind an order or decree, as already said, a matter purely discretionary. It is expressly so laid down in books of practice—in Oughton, for instance—"Si in die assignato," says Oughton [tit. 116], "ad proponendum omnia pars actrix, sive rea, habuerit testes necessarios presentes in judicio, et juraverit eos esse testes necessarios, judex eosdem admittere, jurare, et examinare potest: tamen relinquitur judicis arbitrio, an voluerit hujusmodi testes admittere vel rejicere, et neutri partium datur justa causa appellandi." If, then, the judge's refusing to permit witnesses to be examined, who are actually present in Court, on the day assigned to propound all facts, and who are sworn to be necessary witnesses, be no appealable grievance, surely his declining to assign, at large, a new term probatory on that day (especially, too, at the prayer of a party who had suffered the original term probatory to stand open a twelve month without producing a single witness) no single witness being present in Court, and no single affidavit being tendered as to any proposed witness or witnesses being a necessary witness, or [283] necessary witnesses (nothing of all which is even alleged to have occurred in this instance)—surely this, I say, a fortiori, is no appealable grievance, and the Court is quite disposed, upon this authority, to view it in that light.

So far, then, this appearance under protest to the inhibition (a proceeding by the way of rather a novel nature) might seem to stand upon reasonable grounds. But what subsequently appears on the face of the inhibition goes to deprive it of this credit, both almost and altogether. For what are the other acts appealed from, as appears by this? Why they are appealable grievances beyond all question, and such as the appellant has perempted her right to appeal from by no circumstance whatever, even as alleged in the cause. Her petition as to costs is rejected—the cause is concluded and assigned for informations and sentence, without time afforded her even to see the depositions; so that, clearly, she has had no opportunity of objecting to the testimony of the husband's witnesses, how objectionable soever on inspection that testimony may turn out to be. I do not mean to say that all this may not have been (I am rather indeed bound to presume that it was) very right—there has apparently been great and studied delay on her part—it may even have been so great, and so vexatious, as justly to debar her from those privileges to which she would ordinarily have been entitled; for instance, that of having her costs taxed, and that of having time afforded her to bring in an exceptive plea, if so advised after inspecting the depositions; from both of which these orders of the judge now complained of went actually to debar her. But the Court, without any process before it, with merely this inhibition and act of Court, or ex-[284]-tended protest, cannot undertake to decide all this, or any part of it. Meantime these orders and decrees being clearly of an appealable nature, without any circumstance even alleged to perempt this appellant's right in special, to consider and treat them as such, I am clearly of opinion that this appearance under protest is wrong, and that I am bound to overrule it, and entertain the appeal. By so entertaining the appeal I am not to be understood, as in the slightest degree, prejudging the merits of it—the merits of the appeal constitute a totally different question, and one of which it is incompetent to the Court to form any notion without seeing the process. It is one thing to say that such or such an order is of an appealable nature, that is, generally, may be appealed from; it is quite another to say that it is duly and fitly appealed from, under all the circumstances in any particular instance.

(a) And this, it should seem, notwithstanding a protocol of appeal entered; for it was distinctly stated in the act of Court by the proctor for the wife that "within 15 days from the third session of Michaelmas Term, 1823, to wit, on the 1st day of December, 1824, he, the said proctor, had duly interposed his protocol, protesting of a grievance and of appealing." And such protocol of appeal was brought in in part proof of the act.

I would only add that no blame whatever attaches to the appellant for including all the several acts done (as well those of an appealable nature as the other) which she has included in the presertim of her appeal. For being all the act of one Court day, they all make up but one decree—at least, so as to warrant the inhibition's going as to the whole. It will be for the Court to distinguish between these at the hearing; applying, possibly, its remedy as to those of the one class, leaving the appellant, as it must, without remedy as to those of the other; those I mean of a nature not appealable. Meantime I overrule this protest, and with costs; both as the proceeding itself has somewhat the appearance of an experiment, and as the parties to it are husband and wife. Upon these grounds, and without at present entering into the question of [285] whether the wife is or is not entitled to her costs in that character generally, I think her, at least, entitled to the costs of the present proceeding.

Protest overruled, with costs.(a)

BARKER v. BARKER. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1824.—If a deed of separation be so worded as rightly to found a presumption that it might (so intended) go to sanction even adultery committed by the wife, living apart from the husband under that deed, that presumption must be rebutted by evidence to entitle the husband to a sentence of divorce, as by reason of such adultery committed by the wife.

[Discussed, Ross v. Ross, 1869, L. R. 1 P. & D. 736.]

(On appeal from the Consistory Court of London.)

This was a cause of divorce for adultery brought by Samuel Barker, against his wife Amelia Penelope Barker. It was appealed by the husband to this Court from the Consistory Court of London, the judge of which had dismissed the wife.

(a) On an extra Court day (25th of February) after Hilary Term, 1825, the Court pronounced for the appeal, so far as respected the cause having been concluded as stated in the judgment; but in all other particulars affirmed the decree of the Court below. At the same time, it gave leave to the wife to proceed to the examination of witnesses on her allegation; provided this were done immediately, and at her own expence. It appeared in the cause that the wife had a considerable income; and that the husband was in distress and in gaol. Under these circumstances the Court approved of the Court below having rejected the wife's petition for her costs: on the principle (often recognized) of the ordinary rule as to the wife's costs in cases of this nature not applying.

The principal cause was heard on the merits, and finally disposed of in Trinity Term, 1825, the Court, in the absence of any evidence on the part of the wife, upon whose allegation, after all, no witness was examined, pronouncing the sentence of restitution prayed by the husband.

[286] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the Consistory Court of London, where the cause was a cause of separation, a mensâ et thoro, promoted by the husband against the wife for adultery. A libel was given in, in the Court below, pleading the adultery: and, upon the evidence of nine witnesses examined upon that libel the cause went to a hearing. In the course of the hearing the judge directed certain articles of separation into which the parties had entered, previous to the adultery charged, to be brought in—as with reference to which, in connection with the facts (the only facts then) proved, he, after some deliberation, pronounced the husband to have failed in proof, and dismissed the wife; which has given occasion to the present appeal.

It appears that these parties were married in 1815, the wife being at that time a minor: and that they cohabited as husband and wife from that time, principally at Clifton, till March, 1820; when in consequence, as pleaded in the libel, of "certain differences having arisen between them," they agreed to separate. The deed of separation just adverted to was accordingly drawn up, and was executed by both parties, on the 18th of that month. The wife then removed to Teignmouth in Devonshire, where she lived with her mother, Mrs. Burden; the husband continuing at Clifton; nor did they ever from that time cohabit as husband and wife, save for a few days; when they met at Bath, and so cohabited at the latter end of December 1820. Mrs. Barker returned from Bath to Teignmouth; but, in the month of February, 1821, about five weeks after, she eloped from that place with [287] a person named Thomas Bailey Potts, whom she had become acquainted with at Teignmouth, in the course of the preceding year. The husband, on being informed by the mother of his wife's elopement, immediately comes to London and institutes inquiries, which terminate in a discovery, by certain friends of the husband, of the wife in the society of her paramour, under circumstances quite unequivocal, at an inn at Hampton Court. The wife is, with some difficulty, prevailed upon to accompany the husband's friends to London, where she is placed under the protection of an uncle, her mother's brother; but, in about three weeks, she again elopes with the same companion, and goes to France, where they are said to have since cohabited. Of this subsequent elopement and cohabitation there is no proof; but of the first from Teignmouth, and of the adulterous connexion of these parties at Hampton Court, the proofs are clear and ample.

The Court neither supposes, nor has been given to understand, that the judge of the Court below entertained any doubt that the adultery was proved, as charged in the libel. His reason for declining to apply the usual remedy in that case seems to have been this. He appears to have considered the deed of separation so ample in its stipulations for the wife's perfect free agency, for the future, in all respects, as to found a presumption that it might (so intended) do this among the rest; namely, license that very conduct in the wife of which the husband complained.(a) And that presump-[288]-tion, if rightly founded, not being rebutted by any facts in evidence in the cause, as it then stood, would justify the sentence appealed from, in its fullest extent, in my judgment. Volenti non fit injuria—and though the mere separation of husband and wife is no bar to relief at the suit of one, for adultery committed by the other—yet where a separation subsisted at the time of the adultery charged it is peculiarly incumbent on the party charging it (especially that party being the husband) to make out most satisfactorily to the Court that the injury complained of is not one to which he or she, the complainant, is in any sort accessary.

(a) The parts of this deed principally relied on to found that presumption were the following:—"Now this indenture witnesseth, and the said Samuel Barker and Amelia Penelope Barker, his wife, do hereby mutually declare and agree that they shall and will continue to live separately and apart from each other, henceforth, for and during the time of their mutual lives. And the said Samuel Barker for himself, &c. doth hereby covenant and agree with the said Amelia Penelope Barker, &c. that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Amelia Penelope Barker from time to time and at all times during the present coverture, to live separately and apart from him, the said Samuel Barker, in such manner and at such place and places and with such person and persons as she, the said Amelia Penelope Barker, shall, from time to time, think proper to choose (notwithstanding her present coverture), and as if she were sole and unmarried. And that he, the said Samuel Barker, shall not nor will

Now I think I am bound to take it that the presumption on which the judge of the Consistory Court [289] acted as above was rightly founded, and consequently that his sentence was correct. But whether, in true legal construction, the deed in question were or were not, in itself, what he appears to have considered it—whether it did in itself amount to license, even the commission of adultery by the wife; or whether the clauses relied on to sustain that construction were not rather technical clauses, ordinarily inserted, whether rightly or wrongly, in instruments of this description, to prevent, so far as may be, suits for restitution, and not to bar suits for divorce in the event of adultery committed, are questions which, as merging in the present case, the Court may be excused from exercising any definitive judgment upon. For even although the Court should put the same construction upon this deed as it received in the Court below, it may arrive at a different conclusion upon the evidence, without any impeachment of the former sentence. The presumption which this would raise against the husband would then, it is true, be the same in both Courts: but whereas that presumption in the Court below was not, as I have said, rebutted by any evidence; it is in this the Appellate Court, I think, amply so rebutted. For the husband in this Court, as he was fully entitled to do, has brought in a further allegation, pleading the circumstances under which the original separation was had, and a correspondence by letter which took place between him and the wife subsequent to the separation—several letters from the wife being exhibited, in supply of proof; as also the letter from the mother, in which she communicated to her son in law the first information that he received of his wife's elopement. From the evidence taken upon this allegation, and from [290] the face of these exhibits, I collect, both that the husband was not to blame in the matter of the separation—and that the deed of separation was understood neither by husband, nor wife, as dispensing to either with the obligation of fulfilling the marriage vow in the article of fidelity, so far as the consent of the other party was concerned; however, the contrary might seem upon the mere wording of the deed. The separation it appears took place at the wife's instance, upon no, imputed even, misconduct on the husband's part; but in consequence solely of differences that arose between them as to a change of trustees for certain property, to which the wife was entitled under her father's will. Her letters exhibit the wife as a strange, flighty, romantic character at all times. In these (after the separation), so far from imputing blame to the husband, she addresses him uniformly, in terms of ardent affection. She visits and, as already observed, cohabits with him for some days at Bath, in December, 1821. No blame again is imputed to the husband on that occasion; a letter is exhibited of a date subsequent to this even, as affectionate in its language, at least, as any of the preceding; in which, in particular, she hopes that they "shall soon be united again, never again to part." That the vast fondness expressed for the husband, especially in this last letter, was rather feigned than real may readily be conceded; as it appears that she was previously on pretty intimate terms with her paramour, and actually eloped with him, within a few weeks from the date of that letter. But, real or dissembled, the sentiments expressed are equally good in proof that no just foundation for any complaint was laid in the conduct of the husband [291] to the wife—if they were partly meant, which is very probable, as a blind to the husband, this at least shews the wife not to have suspected that she had the husband's licence to commit adultery. Again, the mother's letter, a letter expressive of great anger, and at the same time of great distress, conveys no reflection whatever on the husband, in apprizing him of the wife's elopement; and the promptitude with which that information is acted upon by the husband, to vindicate molest or disturb her, the said Amelia Penelope Barker, in her person or manner of living; nor at any time or times hereafter, either by ecclesiastical censures or otherwise, require or endeavour to compel her, the said Amelia Penelope Barker, to cohabit, &c. with him, the said Samuel Barker; and shall not nor will, for that purpose or otherwise, use any force, violence, or restraint to the person of the said Amelia Penelope Barker; or sue, or cause to be sued, any person or persons whomsoever for or on account of receiving, harbouring, lodging, protecting, or entertaining her, the said Amelia Penelope Barker; but that she shall and may in all things live and act as if she were sole and unmarried: without the restraint or coercion of the said Samuel Barker, or of any person or persons, by or through his means, assent, consent, privity, or procurement."

his own honour, fully rebuts any presumption which might grow out of the deed of separation, taken per se, that he was at all a party consentient, à priori, to his own disgrace. The case here then has a different aspect to that which it had when before the judge of the Consistory Court; and without definitively pronouncing whether, in my judgment, the deed of separation, taken per se, did or did not of itself raise, as against the husband, that presumption upon which he appears to have acted, but taking it so to have done, I am of opinion that under the explanations to which I have adverted, and upon the matter thus cleared up by the additional allegation in this Court, there is, even upon that supposition, nothing any longer to debar the husband of his remedy; but that he is now at least intitled to the sentence of separation, which he prays.

[292] MOGG v. MOGG. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1824.—The wife's libel in a divorce cause, charging cruelty and unnatural practices on the husband, admitted to proof—the case charged (at least taken as a whole) being held to be one "per quod consortium amittitur."

(By letters of request from the vicar-general of the diocese of Bath and Wells.)

(On the admission of the libel.)

This was a cause of divorce or separation a mensâ et thoro brought by the wife against the husband for cruelty and unnatural practices.

The libel, after pleading the marriage and cohabitation, &c. of the parties, in the usual form, pleaded (somewhat generally indeed) that, from the beginning of the year 1820 till the month of June in that year, when she, the wife, quitted him and went to reside with her mother, the husband treated the wife with great unkindness, indignity, and cruelty; refusing to cohabit with her during all that time, either at bed or board—in consequence of which treatment (so pleaded) she, the wife, in the month of May in that year (1820), suffered a convulsive labour, at which her life was considered to be in great danger. It then pleaded that the said R. M. (the husband) had, at the assizes, held in and for the county of Somerset, at the city of Wells, in January, 1823, been convicted of assaulting one E. K. his apprentice lad—and of lewdly, wantonly, and wickedly pressing, &c. the said E. K., and of endeavouring to persuade the said E. K., to permit and suffer him the said R. M. to take indecent liberties with his person—to the corruption of the morals of the said E. K., to the great scandal and subversion of [293] decency, &c. and against the peace.(a)[1] Lastly, it pleaded a certain paper writing annexed to be, and contain, a true copy of the record of that conviction.

In objection to the admission of this libel it was submitted that the cruelty, per se, as charged, was too vague and unspecific. With respect to the other charge, it was said—in the case of Bromley v. Bromley, the sole precedent (Delegates, 1793. See page 158, ante, in notis), the conviction was of an assault with actual intent to commit, &c. Not so here—here the conviction was of a minor offence, though one of the same kind. And it might be doubtful whether the conviction of a husband for such minor offence would entitle the wife to a sentence of separation, a mensâ et thoro, merely upon that ground.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. The case laid, as a whole, does amount in my judgment to that per quod consortium amittitur. Could the Court send the wife home to such a husband? He refuses her access to his person—he resorts to abominable practices, cruelty itself, independent of that other charged. But the Court may be compelled to send the wife home if it should be of opinion that her case is not such as to entitle her to a sentence of separation. [294] On the contrary, I think that the wife, on proof of her case, as laid, will entitle herself to a sentence: under which impression of course I admit the libel.(a)[2]

(a)[1] The bill found consisted of four counts; the first charging an assault on E. K., to the effect stated in the text—the second and third assaults on the said E. K. of a similar, but still more aggravated, species; and the fourth an assault on the same subject generally. But the verdict found the defendant guilty of the offences charged in the first and fourth counts only—whereon he was sentenced to the payment of a fine of one shilling, and to imprisonment in the common gaol for six calendar months.

(a)[2] This cause was finally heard in Trinity Term, 1825; when the libel being proved in all particulars the Court pronounced for the divorce as prayed by the wife.

NORTHEY v. COCK. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1824.—In interest causes, where the suitor whose interest has been denied, succeeds in establishing it, costs follow, almost of course, without some special ground of exception to the rule.—Note that the certificate of registry is not essential to the proof of a marriage; especially not to the proof of a marriage had, if at all, anterior to the marriage act.

This was a cause of interest—in which the Court, in pronouncing for the interest of one asserted next of kin, condemned the other in full costs; as having questioned that interest, under the circumstances stated in the judgment, on frivolous and unfounded pretences.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a cause technically described as a cause of interest (originally depending in the Consistory Court of Exeter); (a)[1] and it is limited to the single object of ascertaining the next of kin of Mary Row, late of Broadwoodwiger, in the county of Devon, the party deceased in the cause. The suitors, respectively, are Mr. Emanuel Northey and Mr. Richard Cock. Northey claims as cousin-german once removed by the whole blood—as that is descended from the same common ancestors with the deceased, William Drown and Joan his wife, the grandfather and grandmother of the deceased, and his, the claimant's, great-grandfather and great-grandmother, respectively. The claim [295] of the other suitor is founded upon his descent from the same grandmother with the deceased only, Joan Drown—who, after the death of William Drown, her first husband, is pleaded to have intermarried with one Diggory Cock, by whom she became the mother of Diggory Cock, father of Richard Cock, the party claiming.

Thus it appears that the asserted relationship between Richard Cock and the deceased is by the half-blood only. But as the law makes no distinction between the whole and the half-blood, in respect to administrations and rights of succession to personal property, it follows that if Cock's relationship to the deceased is proved, as pleaded, there is an end at once to Northey's claims, either to be administrator of the deceased or upon her personal property. For, as to the administration, Mr. Cock is of kin to the deceased, upon this shewing, in the nearer degree: nor is Mr. Northey entitled to any share of the personal estate, even by representation, no representatives being admitted among collaterals after brother's and sister's children.

The claim of Mr. Richard Cock appears to be questioned only in a single particular. His being the grandson of Joan Drown, also the grandmother of Mary Row, the deceased in the cause, is admitted: but Mr. Northey has denied that this Joan Drown was ever married to Diggory Cock, her alleged second husband; asserting that, although she lived and cohabited with him as such, till his death, it was in a state of concubinage merely, and that she never became his lawful wife.

Now here I must first observe that the burthen of proof principally rests with Mr. Northey. Where parties [296] have cohabited, especially where, for a long period, and till the death of one of them, as in this instance, the law presumes them to have been married; for it will not presume a criminal and illicit connexion between parties, at all events not to the prejudice of their issue. As then Mr. Northey (rather ungraciously) has raised this charge against his great-grandmother, he should have been prepared with evidence to sustain it; in which point, as I shall presently observe, he has wholly failed. On the contrary, to say nothing of the legal presumption in its favour, the actual marriage of this Joan Drown and Diggory Cock is established by their grandson, Mr. Northey's opponent in the cause, upon what appears to me the most satisfactory evidence.

The marriage in question is one of more than a century back; consequently, it was a marriage anterior to the marriage act; when marriages were neither solemnized nor registered with the regularity that they have since been, in virtue of that act. To hold the certificate of registry indispensable to the proof of such a marriage would be absurd: reputation, cohabitation, and mutual acknowledgments sufficiently prove, at least, such a marriage (a)[2] in such a cause if not strongly impeached. [297] But

(a)[1] It was appealed to this Court on a grievance—when the Court pronounced for the appeal, and retained the principal cause.

(a)[2] Or probably any marriage, the marriage act having been repeatedly held not to take away the ancient mode of proving a marriage by presumptive evidence. See judgments to this effect of Lord Mansfield in the case of St. Devereux v. Much Dew though no entry can be found in any register of the marriage of Joan Drown and Diggory Cock, there is documentary as well as oral evidence in the cause (though the latter alone might possibly be sufficient), which places the fact beyond any question. For instance, the parties had three children; these children were christened in the parish where they always resided as the children (two sons and a daughter) of "Diggory Cock and Joan his wife." Again, one of the sons (a first Diggory) died: he is buried in the same parish as Diggory, son of "Diggory Cock and Joan his wife." Extracts in proof of all this from parish registers are exhibited and duly verified in the cause. Lastly, on the death of Diggory Cock, administration is granted to Joan as his lawful widow and relict, of course upon her oath to that effect; and, on real property being sold which had belonged to Diggory Cock, subsequent to that grant, she, Joan, is a party to the conveyance, as his "widow and administratrix." These facts are also proved by duly verified exhibits in the cause. Of witnesses examined, the testimony is all one way, namely, in favour of the marriage, for Mr. Northey has produced no evidence upon his allegation that "the Cocks were generally known and reputed as base born." Nor has he succeeded in extracting any such evidence by cross-examining his adversary's witnesses, except in a single instance of much too trifling a nature to be dwelt upon. I allude to the evidence of one old blind man of 83, who does say, in answer to an interrogatory administered to him on the part of Mr. Northey, that a person named Parkinson told him some years ago that these "Cocks" were all "base born."

In proof of this some stress appears to have been [298] laid upon the circumstance that Mr. Cock himself, upon the death of the deceased, confessed or admitted that "her property," generally, belonged to "the Northeys." But this circumstance is sufficiently explained. Being of the half-blood, and not aware of the legal distinction in this particular between the descent of real and that of personal property, he did, at first, erroneously conceive that Northey was entitled to the personal as he is to the real property of the deceased; under which impression, and not, as asserted, from any consciousness of his father's illegitimacy, he made the admission relied upon. But he retracted this almost instantly upon receiving better information; and from that time to the present has asserted his interest, an interest which, in my judgment, he has amply proved.

The single question, under these circumstances, is that of costs; to which I think that Mr. Cock, whose interest has been denied upon such frivolous pretences, is justly entitled. Indeed, costs generally follow where the person whose interest has been denied succeeds in establishing it, almost, of course, without special grounds of exception, of which I can discover none in the case in point. On the contrary, Mr. Northey, not content with the real estate, having called in the administration duly obtained by his opponent and put him on proof of his interest by setting up a case that he has failed to sustain by any evidence, he is, I think, especially liable to reimburse that opponent for his expences in both Courts.

[299] SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1824.—The mere desertion of a wife by the husband, though a malicious desertion, will not bar a sentence of divorce at the suit of the husband on proof of adultery committed by the wife.—The long absence of the husband from, held not to be a desertion of the wife in the particular case; and the sentence held not to be barred, as insisted, by any part of the husband's conduct towards the wife, her adultery being proved.

Church [1 Bl. Rep. 367], and that of Birt v. Barton [Doug. 171]. And Lord Kenyon has declared in a case at nisi prius [Espin. 1, 214] that, though the marriage act had introduced a register of marriages, registration made no part of the validity of a marriage, but only went in proof of it; and that since, as well as before the passing of that act, cohabitation, reputation, mutual acknowledgments, &c. were good and available evidence of a marriage though no register whatever was produced.

against the wife by reason of adultery. It is admitted that the proofs of adultery are complete if the identity of a female, whose history is given in the depositions, and of Maria Sullivan, wife of the party promoting, and the party proceeded against in this suit, be established in a manner satisfactory to the Court. But of this identity I entertain no doubt, either legal or moral, on the proofs—any more than I do of the diversity of the husband, and of a person whose intercourse with the wife is proved to have been such as fixes upon the wife (that diversity being also proved) the charge of adultery.

The marriage of the parties took place in July, 1816; from and after which they cohabited for a short time, and mutually acknowledged each other as husband and wife. A suit was then instituted by the father of the husband (a minor at that time of the age of 17 or 18) to annul the marriage, as celebrated by banns not published in the true names of one of the parties—unquestionably a sufficient ground of nullity had the fact so been. But at the hearing of the cause, in the [300] month of June, 1818, the judge of the Court in which that suit was instituted pronounced for the validity of the marriage—and the sentence so had on appeal to this Court was affirmed also in the month of June in the following year. It was then appealed, namely, from the sentence of this Court to the High Court of Delegates; nor was that appeal actually dismissed till the month of February in the present year [1824]; although it had not been prosecuted by the appellant beyond to the mere bringing in of a libel of appeal; to which the respondent had at once given a negative issue.

Upon the institution of the suit of nullity in 1816 the husband was sent abroad by his father to await its issue. He was soon joined on the Continent by his father and mother; and continued abroad till February, 1822; at which time the appeal in the Court of Delegates, as just said, was still depending—having, during the greater part of that time, been attached to the British Embassy at Paris. The circumstances to which the Court has referred, as connected with the marriage, account, I think, satisfactorily for this part of the history. But I should say that on the husband's coming of age a deed of separation is executed by and between the parties; covenanting for their living, in future, separate and apart: an annuity for life of 500l., and the sum of 1000l. by way of outfit being settled on the wife in and by that deed.

The wife during all this time continued in this country, resident at various places —at first at a place called Gold Hill, near Chalfont in Buckinghamshire; and then at lodgings in Mary-le-bone, until the spring of the year 1821—at the former of which places it is that she is proved to have become intimate with [301] a Mr. Henry Gouldney, her alleged paramour. At what precise time that intimacy assumed the character which now attaches to it neither is, nor requires to be, stated in evidence. Suffice it to observe that in April, 1821, the wife, Mrs. Sullivan, went to reside at Mottingham, near Eltham, in Kent, where she continued till the month of April in the following year—and that, during nearly the whole of that period, she, Mrs. Sullivan, and Gouldney cohabited as husband and wife: passing, however, under assumed names, and using every precaution (as by suffering no trades people to enter, or even to come within the outer gates of the house, which is described as situated in a spot considerably secluded, &c.) clearly, as it should seem, in order to avoid any detection of this intercourse by or on behalf of the husband. The same, at Nelson Square, in the neighbourhood of Newington, to which they removed after leaving Mottingham; and then at Loosely Row, in the parish of Princes Risborough, in the county of Bucks; where Mrs. Sullivan was resident at the issue of the citation in the cause. And it is in proof that the fruit of this intercourse has been two children, to whom the wife has actually given birth; without any pretended connection with her husband, the complainant in the cause.

So far, then, as respects the adultery charged on the wife, the case is fully proved. Now being so proved, and actual connivance, at least, on the part of the husband not being suggested; what is there, let me ask, to justify the wife's violation of her marriage vow; and so to deprive the husband, in this particular instance, of that remedy to which the wife's infidelity plainly intitles a husband under ordinary circumstances? [302] It has been argued that the husband's going, and his long sojourn, abroad amounts to a malicious desertion of the wife; and that this should operate as a bar. Now here, in the first place, I am still to learn that even a malicious desertion of the wife by the husband is any bar to a sentence of divorce prayed by the husband for adultery committed by the wife. By the law, indeed, of some countries, malicious desertion is a substantive ground of divorce, at the prayer of the wife against the husband; but not even there, that I am aware of, it licences adultery on the part of the wife by precluding the husband from a sentence of divorce on proof of its commission. Certainly, however, that neither is, nor ever has been, a doctrine of the law of this country; which also, as it is well known, has not recognized even malicious desertion as a substantive ground of divorce. But though, secondly, principally I am clearly of opinion that in true legal construction the husband's absence from was any thing but a malicious desertion of the wife, under the circumstances of the case. At the time of the husband's going abroad a suit (then just instituted) was depending to try the validity of the marriage: nor was that question finally disposed of till long after the adulterous connexion formed by the wife, on which, being proved, the husband now relies for a sentence. But during the pendency of that suit cohabitation was not only not incumbent by law on the parties, or on either of them; it would even have been legally censurable, at least in the husband. Nor could the wife at any period, till after that when she had forfeited her conjugal rights by the actual commission of adultery, have sued the husband for restitution, had he been resident in this country. [303] Of one feature, at least, of malicious desertion there is a total absence of any appearance in the cause—I mean that feature (often a very principal one in the character of malicious desertion) which discloses itself in the circumstance of the wife being left unprovided for. She was amply provided for out of the husband's funds, on his becoming of age, as already said by the Court, under the deed; and, up to that time, she had been alimented at the rate of 300l. per annum by the Courts in which the suit of nullity successively depended.

But the deed of separation has also been urged in bar of the husband's prayer. Now these Courts have so repeatedly said that such "deeds of separation" are no bars either, on the one hand, to suits for restitution, or, on the other, as here suggested, to charges of adultery, that it would be quite superfluous to combat this argument, looking at the deed of separation between these parties, quâ deed of separation merely. But it has been said that this particular deed of separation, by the very wording of it, amounts to a letter of license to the wife, to conduct herself howsoever, and to connect herself with whomsoever she pleases. But I see nothing in the deed, even taken per se, which necessarily implies this. I see no more in the deed than the ordinary class of provisions (a) for enforcing, so far as [304] may be, the continuance, and preventing the determination, of the separate state in which the parties covenant to live, by means of a suit for restitution brought by either, which, nearly in all cases, find their way into deeds of this nature; though nugatory as to any binding effect on the parties, in this particular, as already hinted. But what again, as appears in evidence, has been the conduct of the parties to the deed? Does that countenance the interpretation sought to be put upon it by the wife's counsel?

(a) "Now this indenture witnesseth that in pursuance of the said agreement, &c., he, the said John Augustus Sullivan, doth covenant, &c. that the said Maria Sullivan may, at all times hereafter, live separate and apart from him, the said John Augustus Sullivan, her husband, as if she was sole and unmarried; and that she shall be free from the power and command, restraint, control, and authority of him, the said John Augustus Sullivan; and shall and may live, and reside, in such place or places, and in such manner, as to her from time to time shall seem meet: and that he, the said John Augustus Sullivan, shall not, nor will, molest or disturb the said Maria Sullivan in her person or in her manner of living, &c., nor, at any time or times hereafter, by suit or process in the ecclesiastical Court, &c., or by any other means whatsoever, seek or endeavour to compel the said Maria Sullivan to cohabit or live with him, the said John Augustus Sullivan, or to enforce any restitution of conjugal rights; and shall not or will for that purpose or otherwise, use any force, constraint, or violence to the person of the said Maria Sullivan; or sue, or cause to be sued, any person or persons whatsoever, for receiving, harbouring, lodging, protecting, or entertaining her—but that she, the said Maria Sullivan, may in all things live as if she was sole and unmarried, without the restraint or correction of the said John Augustus Sullivan, or of any other person or persons, by or through his means, consent, or procurement." It will be seen that these provisions are precisely similar to those in the deed of separation in the cause of Barker v. Barker. Vide page 287, ante, in notis.

Does that give it to be supposed that either the one gave or the other took it as a letter of licence to the effect contended? Quite the contrary. Did the wife consider it a letter of licence to connect herself with Mr. Gouldney? The clandestinity of that connexion, to which I have already alluded, shews it not to have been so regarded on her part. And as to the husband, it is not denied that immediately on receiving intimation of what the wife's [305] conduct had been he takes steps to bring the matter to its present legal issue; without any suspicion, as it should seem, that he had licensed the wife to form any such connection as that which is the foundation of this suit—although the mere production of the deed, if a letter of license to the wife to form such a connexion, would at once defeat the sole object of the suit, as he himself must have known.

The Court has been urged over and over to consider the ill effect which it has been partly argued, and partly assumed, that a sentence of divorce in this cause will have on public morals. This, of course, as with reference to the supposed countenance that immorality will derive from a husband so circumstanced as the plaintiff taking advantage, as it has been phrased, of his wife's infidelity. But is the Court, by withholding its sentence, to leave it to be inferred, as it must do, that a wife, even one so circumstanced as the defendant, has its sanction to commit adultery? I hardly think that of the two alternatives this is the one least likely to countenance immorality. What should have been the wife's conduct in the peculiar circumstances under which I admit her to have been placed? Its object should have been to qualify herself during his absence, by mental and moral improvement, for the husband's future society; which might then, notwithstanding the state of actual separation in which they were living, have been ultimately afforded her. Instead of so doing, by abandoning herself to her vicious inclinations, she has clearly founded the sentence of legal separation now prayed by the husband—which, as thinking him justly entitled to it, under all the cir-[306]-cumstances of the case, in spite of what has been urged to the contrary, I accordingly pronounce.(a)

ENGLAND v. HURCOMB. ENGLAND v. WILLIAMS. ENGLAND v. RICHARDSON. Peculiars Court of Canterbury, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1824.—Articles against three defendants for brawling, &c. in a church, pronounced to be proved, and the defendants suspended and condemned in full costs—the case of no one of the three, either looking to his own conduct, or that of the promovent, being held to be a case for mitigated costs.

England v. Hurcomb.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The case before the Court is one already in part disposed of by its judgment in the cause of Palmer v. Roffey (see page 141, ante), which was heard in Easter Term. It arises [307] out of the same general transaction, and the same general principles are applicable to it; though in their circumstances each is a distinct case, independent of the other, and standing upon its own grounds.

The offence charged upon Mr. Hurcomb in the present suit is the identical offence charged in the former suit against Mr. Roffey. Roffey's offence was that of quarrelling, chiding, and brawling with Hurcomb—Hurcomb's is that of quarrelling, chiding, and brawling with Roffey. Roffey's offence was held to be proved by the Court—but, in so holding it, the Court intimated its opinion that Hurcomb, upon his own shewing (for Hurcomb was a witness in that cause), was in pari delicto—so that his shortest way out of such a suit as the present, should any such be instituted, would probably be that most conducive to his own interest. The defendant, however, has persisted, notwithstanding this intimation, in bringing his cause to a hearing, and in defending (a) Mr. Sullivan has since obtained an act of parliament by which the marriage was dissolved: although he and his wife were living separate, as above (in effect had never cohabited), when the adultery in proof was committed by the wife. To compensate for this ordinary requisite (namely, the cohabitation at that time of the parties) to the passing of such an act it seems that the two houses examined witnesses to the wife's ante-nuptial incontinence. The editor conceives this to be the single instance of their having so done. Such evidence, it may be added, has in no instance been received to assist in making out the husband's claim to a sentence of separation by reason of his wife's adultery in the spiritual Court. See Perrin v. Perrin, vol. 1, p. 1.

it by counsel; though he has profited to some extent, by the advice of the court, in not examining witnesses upon his defensive allegation; which, of course, renders the evidence, and consequently the expenses, on both sides less considerable in this than in the former cause; in which witnesses were actually examined to a defensive allegation, although their evidence failed to sustain the defence set up.

In support of the articles exhibited in this cause depositions have been taken, the result of which, in my judgment, leaves the case satisfactorily proved. It is proved that Hurcomb quarrelled and chode with Roffey, whom he repeatedly called a "common informer," for hours together at the polling table—and that, subsequently, he renewed the quarrel in the north aisle, [308] down which Roffey was proceeding in his way out of the church—a renewal which led to that disgraceful scene of uproar and confusion, stated and reprobated by the Court in its former judgment. It is proved, too, that Roffey upon that occasion was certainly treated with great violence, even that his clothes were torn from his back—but there is no satisfactory proof of any actual "smiting" of Roffey by Hurcomb, as charged in the articles. The "lifting up of his arm," spoken to by the witnesses, seems to have been for the purpose of warding off an expected blow; and not for that of actual aggression. The brawling, however, at the polling table, and its renewal in the north aisle, I repeat, are most satisfactorily proved; and the result is that which the Court anticipated at the hearing of the former cause.

England v. Williams. England v. Richardson.

Neither of the other defendants, Mr. Williams or Mr. Richardson, is defended by counsel. They are both proceeded against for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, upon the same day (and on the same occasion) as the first defendant. The case against Williams has no direct connexion with the quarrel between Roffey and the first defendant; nor is the case of Mr. Richardson again immediately connected, either with that or with the case of Mr. Williams. But the offence of brawling, and an aggravated offence of that description is proved against both these defendants; against Richardson in particular, whose case in fact is the most offensive of the three. Against this defendant is [309] proved, not only the use of the most opprobrious language, but that of the menaces (delivered, too, in the attitude) of a prize fighter; it is even proved that he went so far as to demand the "card" of a person who merely interfered to repress his gross incivility to the rector; a species of implied challenge, tending to positive bloodshed; and all this in a church; where Christian benevolence, and forgiveness of injuries, if any have been sustained, ought especially to prevail. In short, the articles of charge are fully proved against both these defendants.

The only real question in either of the three cases is that of costs.

Now the Court has looked in vain for grounds to render either of these cases, like that of Palmer v. Tijou (see page 196, ante) (a still other cause arising out of the same general transaction, disposed of here in the last term), a case for mitigated costs. The cause of Palmer v. Tijou is dissimilar from either of the three, both as respects the promoters, severally, and the parties proceeded against. As respects the promoters, true it is that Mr. Palmer was a parish officer, acting ostensibly in the discharge of his official duty; but the Court is still disposed to adhere to its opinion, entertained at first for reasons already expressed, that the prosecution of Tijou was one that originated, to some extent at least, in party feeling, although directed or advised by so respectable a body as the vestry of this parish; with which the Court had the [310] misfortune to differ in opinion as to the propriety of selecting Mr. Tijou for a party to be proceeded against, rather than one of the present defendants. Here, as in Tijou's case, the promoter is a parish officer, acting in discharge of his official duty (for upon Mr. England as sidesman this prosecution, if proper to be had, clearly devolved; Roffey, the churchwarden, being himself under prosecution for, and afterwards convicted of, a similar offence), without any such circumstance as, I am still of opinion, existed in that other case, to derogate from his claim upon the Court for full protection and indemnity. Palmer, too, might possibly look to the parish purse to reimburse him for his expences; this promoter has, obviously, no prospect of being indemnified for the costs of the present prosecutions by any contributions from that quarter. Again, as to the parties proceeded against, Tijou's transgression was one by no means of an aggravated nature; Tijou was, confessedly, no party to the original broil—he interfered to protect his churchwarden, Roffey, who was being treated at the time with great actual violence—and his interference, if it had been confined to that object, would have entitled him to praise rather than to censure. But his language and conduct upon that occasion were extremely reprehensible, whatever his motives might be; and though capable of much excuse; they admitted (the former) of no justification. These on the contrary are all aggravated cases; and I think that I am bound to accompany the sentence of suspension, ab ingressu ecclesiæ for one month, in each of the three, as in the case of Palmer v. Roffey, with full costs.

It would have been matter of some gratification to [311] the Court to have found any just ground for mitigating the costs in any or all of these cases. For this, probably, as giving a triumph to neither party, would have best conduced to allay animosities, and to conciliate that harmony in this parish which has been too long interrupted—an object which, undoubtedly, has not been out of the view of the Court. Still, however, to do justice is a paramount consideration; and I really do not see how, both for the purpose of repressing such offences generally, and for that of affording due protection to the parish officer officially proceeding in these particular suits (and whose claim to full protection is derogated from by no circumstance whatever that I am aware of) I can refuse to condemn all three defendants, Mr. Hurcomb, Mr. Williams, and Mr. Richardson, in costs generally.

HUNTER v. BYRN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1824.—Where objections to an inventory, given in on the oath of an executor, are taken by one only of various parties (her interest, too, only derivative) equally interested in the effects of the testator, the rest apparently acquiescing; and where the disclosure of assets sought refers back to transactions pretty remote in point of date, &c.—under such (and by parity of reason under similar) circumstances the court will presume the inventory to be correct, and, consequently, will dismiss the executor, without strong grounds laid to induce a contrary suspicion.

(On petition.)

Henry Frederic Arbouin, late of Mincing Lane, London, died some time since, having duly made and executed his last will and testament, whereof he [312] appointed his wife, Elizabeth Arbouin; James Byrn (party in the cause); and John Sabatier, executors; who took probate, as such, of his will in the month of May, 1803.

The testator by his said will directed that the residue of his estate and effects should be converted into money, and invested in the names of the said James Byrn and John Sabatier, upon trust to pay the interest, annual dividends, or profits thereof to his said wife, Elizabeth Arbouin, for her life; and from and after her decease (in the event of the deaths of their common issue, under age and unmarried, a contingency which actually befel in the year 1817), upon trust for the benefit of such person or persons as she, the said Elizabeth Arbouin, should by will or otherwise lawfully appoint.

Elizabeth Arbouin died, having first duly made and executed her last will and testament, whereof she also appointed James Byrn aforesaid, and the Rev. Daniel Veysie, clerk, executors, who duly proved the same in the month of February, 1806; having, in and by such will, directed and appointed that both her own property and that subjected to her appointment by the will of her husband, in the event aforesaid, should, in that event, go to and be divided among certain persons in certain proportions—one eighth being limited and bequeathed in the same to Susannah Hunter (formerly Arbouin), the other party in the cause.

Under these circumstances a citation had issued, at the instance of the said Susannah Hunter, calling upon the said James Byrn, as surviving executor of the will of Elizabeth Arbouin deceased, for an inventory and account of her effects. And the present question re-[313]-spected the validity of an objection taken, on the part of Mrs. Hunter, to the declaration in lieu of an inventory exhibited by the said James Byrn under and in virtue of that citation.

In support of the objection it was contended that the inventory was unsatisfactory, as not duly setting forth the husband's effects, subjected as above to the disposal of the wife; to a constat of which Mrs. Hunter, as appointee to an eighth of these, was clearly entitled, and from Byrn, the party cited—he, Byrn, being the surviving executor, both of husband and wife.

On the other hand, it was argued that the objection was unfounded; the inventory itself being satisfactory in the view taken of it by counsel (in effect, that stated in the judgment). It was also submitted that the objection was one which, whether founded or not, it might be incompetent to the Court to entertain on the authority of certain cases determined at common law; and, in particular, on that of a late case, Henderson v. French, in Maule and Selwyn's Reports.(a)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This inventory or declaration is objected to in a single item. The party who objects states in her act on petition that "she has been informed, and believes, that the sum of £1140l., over which the said Elizabeth Arbouin is, in the said declaration, by the said James Byrn, admitted to have had a disposing power by the will of her late husband, does not constitute, and is not in the said declaration stated to constitute, the whole of her late husband's effects, subjected to the disposal of [314] the said Elizabeth Arbouin as aforesaid," that is, as already stated in the former part of the act. And she prays that "the said James Byrn may be assigned to amend his declaration, either by inserting therein, or by exhibiting separately a full, true, and particular inventory of all and singular such the goods, chattels, and credits of the husband, that at any time since his death have come to his, the said James Byrn's, hands, possession, or knowledge, as by the husband's will were directed to be invested upon trust for the benefit, in a certain contingency, of the appointees of the wife"—of which Mrs. Hunter, I may say, is fully admitted to be one.

Now the property of the husband, so subjected to the wife's disposal, being the "residue of his effects," the exhibitant has stated, in substance, both the amount of that residue and how derived. For he says that till the death of his co-executor, Mr. Veysie, in the year 1817, he, the exhibitant, scarcely intermeddled in the deceased's effects; save only that early in that year, "at the time of his, the exhibitant's, bankruptcy, he proved, as executor of the deceased, a debt against his own estate, for the share of property due to her, the deceased, on account of a partnership concern in which he, the exhibitant, and the deceased's late husband, had been formerly engaged;" with the dividends upon which he purchased the sum of 1500l. three per cent. consolidated bank annuities in the joint names of himself and Mr. Sabatier, his co-executor in the estate of the husband. He admits the deceased to have had a disposing power over this by the will of her husband; and this it is of which Mrs. Hunter speaks in her act as 1140l., being the sum for which that stock was actually sold out in August, [315] 1821; and which constitutes the supposed objectionable item in the declaration now excepted to.

The question then is, whether the exhibitant is compellable upon this statement of facts to substitute for this sum of 1140l., stated in his declaration, an inventory in full of the husband's effects as now prayed? I am of opinion that he is not compellable at this time, in virtue, at least, of the present citation, and under the circumstances. The disclosure sought is very remote in point of time—it is sought by one whose interest in the effects of the husband is merely derivative; and the citation is for an inventory of the wife's effects only, not those of the husband—although this last, as being a technical objection merely, inasmuch as Byrn, the party cited, is the husband's executor, as well as that of the wife, might have been overlooked by the Court, had the party citing him made a strong case upon the merits. Both testators have been dead these almost 20 years. Byrn too had co-executors in the management of the estates of both; each of whom is since also dead—and of various legatees, the whole, it should seem, with the exception of Mrs. Hunter, have acquiesced in this sum of 1140l., being, as he states it, that residue of the husband's effects subjected, by his will, to the wife's appointment. Now I think, under these circumstances, that I am bound to presume the inventory correct in this particular, without strong grounds laid to induce a contrary suspicion. But I have looked in vain for such in the present proceeding. Nothing in the shape of any omission, or suppression, is specified—all which her act states (unsupported too by any affidavit) is, that she, Mrs. Hunter, has been informed, and believes, that this sum of 1140l. is not the whole of her late husband's [316] effects, subjected to the wife's disposal by his will. On the contrary, it is sworn by Byrn generally, at the end of his declaration, that no further or other goods, chattels, or credits of the deceased (the wife) have at any time come to his, the declarant's, hands, possession, or knowledge, than those inserted in the declaration; which would be plainly false, if this sum of 1140l. did not constitute the whole of the effects, subject to her disposal, under the first testator's will as above. It is in effect then both stated and sworn in this declaration to constitute that whole, though Mrs. Hunter says otherwise in her act—and I think that I am bound to presume that statement, so made and sworn to be correct, at least for any thing that appears to the contrary on the face of these proceedings; and, consequently, that I am bound to dismiss the party cited from the further effect of the citation.

(IN THE GOODS OF SAMUEL ROLLS, Deceased.) Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1824.—The Court will not decree probate, even in common form, of alterations in a will, so made as, in themselves, and on the face of them, to be only cursory and deliberative upon affidavits; where it is doubtful whether any proof of what appears of their history, as stated in the affidavits, would justify the Court in pronouncing for those alterations, if regularly propounded, as parts of the testator's will.

(On motion.)

Samuel Rolls of Tottenham, in the county of Middlesex, Esq. (the party deceased), died suddenly, on the 25th of July last [1824]; possessed of personal property to the amount, in value, of about 25,000l.

In April, 1815, the deceased duly made and executed his will, in the presence of three witnesses, and thereof appointed his wife and three other persons executors.

[317] By this will he bequeathed to his wife the sum of 1000l., and all his furniture, &c., absolutely; and a life interest in the sum of 8000l.: to his nephew, John Rolls, 500l.: to a person named Francis Sard, 50l.: and the residue (with the exception of certain other legacies, amounting in the whole to about 2000l.) to his nephews and nieces, children of his brothers and sisters, twenty-three in number; eight of which residuary legatees were still minors.

In the month of April, 1822, the deceased, in a conversation with Mr. John Sard, mentioned to him that it was his intention to leave Francis Sard 100l.

In December, 1823, or January, 1824, he produced his will to Mrs. Rolls, intimating his intention to make certain alterations in the same. He then read over the will to Mrs. Rolls; and, on reading the legacy of 500l. given to his nephew John Rolls, made some alteration therein with a pencil. On reading the bequest of 50l. to Francis Sard, he made a similar alteration; observing that he had promised Mr. John Sard to leave Francis Sard 100l.; the propriety of keeping which promise she, Mrs. Rolls, assented to. On reading the bequest of 8000l. for life to Mrs. Rolls he observed that "he had not done sufficient for her," and that "he would leave her something more, increasing her income to 500l. per annum;" upon which, still with a pencil, he made a further alteration in the said will.

The will remained in the testator's own possession; and it was found after his death, in his iron chest, by a Mrs. Holt, with the following pencil marks and alterations. The legacies to Mr. John Rolls, and Mr. Francis Sard, increased, the one from 500l. to 1000l.; and the other, from 50l. to 100l., respectively, by [318] figures—and the bequest for life to Mrs. Rolls increased from 8000l. to 9000l., by the word "nine" (substituted for eight in the will), all in pencil—such figures and word respectively being in the deceased's hand-writing.

An affidavit of these facts was now exhibited, made by Mrs. Rolls, Mrs. Holt, Mr. John Sard, and a Mr. Saddington (the latter to the hand-writing only), and a decree was prayed, on the part of the executors, calling upon the residuary legatees to shew cause why probate of the said will with the said pencil alterations should not be granted to the executors in common form; with the usual intimation.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. These alterations are slightly made, and are clearly, in themselves, and upon the face of them, only cursory and deliberative. And it is by no means certain that any proof even of what appears of their history in these affidavits would justify the Court in pronouncing for them, if regularly propounded, as parts of the deceased's will. With this impression of the case I think that probate of the will, as altered, ought not to pass to the executors in common form; and, consequently, that the citation now prayed is one that ought not to issue. A probate in common form would of course not be binding upon the parties entitled to the residue; especially not upon such of them as are minors. At the same time, in permitting it to pass, the Court might well mislead all the parties as to what its probable judgment would be in the event of these alterations being propounded; and the facts and circumstances now stated, merely upon affidavits, for the purpose of [319] sustaining them being pleaded, and proved—a possible mis-conception against which, I think, I am bound to guard by rejecting the present prayer. In the event of these alterations not being propounded by those who are interested to sustain them, and proved per testes; probate must be taken of the will as originally executed.(a) Motion refused.

TELFORD v. MORISON, FORMERLY THOMAS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1824.—A creditor (or legatee) may object to an inventory given in by an executor or administrator; and may file an allegation pleading omissa, in order to take the answers of the executor or administrator, though he may not go on to examine witnesses to falsify the inventory.—The court is plainly not merely ministerial in the matter of inventories, under the statute of Hen. VIII., although there are two cases in prohibition in the Court of King's Bench, seemingly to the effect (one, at least, of them) as reported, that it is so, merely ministerial. Accordingly it will go on to entertain objections to inventories as above, until it is more fully assured that the advised judgment of the Court of King's Bench is, to the effect of those cases, as reported.

(On motion.)

This was a question of objection to an act on petition, which the proctor for the party objecting had declined writing to; simply moving the Court by counsel that his party might be dismissed under the following circumstances:—

Amy Thomas, widow and executrix of John Thomas, the party deceased in the cause, had been cited by John Telford, a creditor of the said deceased, to exhibit an inventory of his effects, and to render a true and [320] just account of her administration of the same. A proctor appeared for the party cited; and, after exhibiting a declaration (instead of an inventory), together with an account, as required, prayed that his party might be dismissed. The proctor for the creditor prayed to be heard on his petition, in objection to this; and brought in an act on petition; alleging in objection that she, the executrix, in her declaration, had not "set forth the particulars of the sundry spirituous liquors, of which she admitted the deceased" (a publican by trade) "to have died possessed;" nor had she "set forth and specified the several articles of household goods, furniture, plate, linen, and china belonging to the deceased; nor when, where, and by whom the same were appraised;" but had merely stated generally that "they were appraised at the sum of 120l. 10s." And the same in respect to the lease and good-will of the testator's house and business, which were only said generally again to have been "appraised at the sum of 100l.;" though they were objected to be of much greater value. The Act therefore prayed that the executrix might be compelled to amend her declaration in these particulars; and might, further, be condemned in the costs of the proceeding. Instead of writing to this act, the proctor for the executrix, as already said, moved the Court by counsel, that his party might be dismissed—submitting that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain objections of this or any nature to an inventory, on the authority of two cases determined in prohibition by the Court of King's Bench; the case of Catchside v. Ovington, reported in 3 Burrows, and that of Henderson v. French, [321] reported in 5 Maule and Selwyn (3 Burr. 1922, 5 M. & S. 406), and, consequently, that his party, the executrix, was entitled to her dismissal.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. This is a question of jurisdiction; and it is one which should have been raised by the proctor for the executrix writing to the act, to the effect of what is now submitted to the Court by counsel on a mere motion. At the same time, as both the Court and the adverse counsel were previously apprized of the grounds of the motion, so that neither the one nor the other are taken by surprize in consequence of the course actually pursued, I shall proceed to dispose of the question at once, notwithstanding the general irregularity of the proceeding: although, as I repeat, this is not the mode in which a question of jurisdiction at all, especially one of this magnitude, ought to have been raised.

(a) These alterations were propounded in the following Hilary Term, in an allegation, pleading in substance, as stated in the above affidavits: but the Court on debate rejected the allegation, and decreed a probate of the will to the executors in its original state.

The jurisdiction of the Court in the case in point is denied, not so much avowedly upon any reason or with reference to any principle, as it is upon the authority of two cases determined in prohibition, that of Catchside v. Ovington and that of Henderson v. French, the latter itself, by the way, founded partly no doubt on the former, which must be taken to have had at least some weight with the Court in its character of precedent, as and for which it was cited in the latter case. In a third case, indeed, that of Hinton and Parker (8 Mod. 168), there is a dictum to a similar effect with the judgments in the other two, so far as that dictum itself goes. But the principle upon which that dictum pro-[322]-ceeded, be it what it might (for it is not said nor is very easy to be conjectured), at least gives no countenance whatever to the avowed principle upon which the other two cases were decided. For in that case of Hinton and Parker the power of the Ecclesiastical Court to entertain objections to an inventory, in one of the only two cases in which it has any pretence to exercise such a power, namely, at the suit of a legatee, is admitted: a prohibition is actually denied on the ground of its having such power. The dictum, a mere dictum, is only to this effect—that the Ecclesiastical Court has no such power at the suit of a creditor. But the principle upon which the prohibition seems to have gone in the case of Catchside and Ovington and the other (a)—namely, that under the statute of Hen. VIII. the Ecclesiastical Court is merely ministerial in this matter of inventories—goes to deprive the Ecclesiastical Court of the power of entertaining objections to an inventory altogether; whether at the suit of a creditor or at that of a legatee, as will presently appear.

It is much to be regretted that the Ecclesiastical Court should be prohibited in any matter wherein jurisdiction has long been conceded to it, until (without offence be it spoken) the Court applied to for the prohibition has been attended by civilians, in order to its [323] being fully instructed as to all the points raised by the application. The very circumstance of jurisdiction having been long conceded to it, in any case, implies that its jurisdiction in that case is well founded and of public convenience—and before the further exercise at least of such a jurisdiction is prohibited to the Spiritual Court, it should perhaps be heard by its own counsel in its defence; as better apprized of those matters more immediately appertaining to the peculiar law and ancient practice of the Spiritual Court, which the application to the Temporal Court for a prohibition in that case almost necessarily involves, than counsel who practise in the Temporal Courts only can well be supposed to be. Now in the cases relied on in the present instance against the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, the prohibition seems to have gone without much discussion of any sort; and it certainly went, without the Court of King's Bench at the hearing of either, having been attended by civilians, that I am able to discover. But the Ecclesiastical Court in those cases was prohibited in a matter wherein, as will presently be shewn, jurisdiction had long been conceded to it: and that the exercise of its jurisdiction in that matter was of public convenience can hardly be questioned. It is of great convenience to creditors and legatees (for the same considerations apply to both) to obtain a constat of assets before they engage here or elsewhere in perhaps expensive litigations for the recovery of debts or legacies. A disclosure of assets, the executor or administrator is bound to also by his very oath of office. But all this is merely nugatory, if an executor or administrator can evade a disclosure of assets by [324] any paper exhibited here, which he chuses to call an inventory—which must, however, be, if this Court is merely ministerial in this matter of inventories and can entertain no objections of any sort to an inventory as now contended. Of whom, but persons studious of concealment, are inventories usually sought through the intervention of these Courts? But if these Courts are functi officio the instant that any thing in the name of an inventory is exhibited, as to any benefit that in nine cases out of ten can

(a) In the case of Catchside and Ovington, however, that the prohibition went upon the construction of the statute of Hen. VIII. [21 Hen. VIII. c. 5, § 4] as making the Ecclesiastical Court merely ministerial is a statement which rests not on the authority of the report itself, but on that of the editor of the edition in 1790, who so says in a note on the report. All which the report itself says is this—"By Lord Mansfield and the Court: It appears on the face of the proceedings that the Spiritual Court hath no jurisdiction." But what the proceedings had been does not appear from the report.

The Court of King's Bench, in issuing its prohibition in the cases referred to, seems to have taken up this matter as if both the obligation of exhibiting an inventory and the jurisdiction of these Courts over inventories originated with, and rested solely upon, the statute of Henry VIII. This at least is to be inferred from the printed reports, both of the arguments and especially of the judgments in those cases. In that of Henderson v. French, which is reported most at length of the two, it appears indeed that the present Mr. Justice Littledale, who was then counsel, did state, in shewing cause against the rule nisi for a prohibition that it had been the practice of the Court sought to be prohibited (the Consistory Court of Carlisle), to permit exceptions to be taken to inventories time out of mind: and entries of such proceedings in that court, from the year 1636 to 1812, were produced in support of that statement—the earliest, however, of these, that in 1636, it is observable, being long subsequent to the statute of Hen. VIII. But the counsel who argued in support of the rule, Mr. Scarlett, with-[325]-out any apparent reference to all this, as wholly beside the question, was content, by way of answer, with a mere reference to and argument upon the statute of Hen. VIII. In the words of the report, "Scarlett contrà cited 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5, § 4, which he contended only requires an executor to make an inventory and to deliver it into the keeping of the bishop or ordinary." And the Court seems to have taken the same limited view of the case in its judgment: for "the Court were of opinion (the words of the report again) that as the statute directed the executor, for the security of the creditors and legatees, to make an inventory to the bishop or ordinary; and that no bishop or ordinary should, under pain of 10l., refuse to take such inventory, his office was merely ministerial"—adding, "If the statute had intended more it would have so said."

But whoever is acquainted with the old law and practice of these Courts must be aware that neither inventories themselves, nor the jurisdiction of these Courts over inventories, is at all to be traced up or ascribed to the statute of Hen. VIII. Lyndewood, for instance, who wrote long before the statute, may be cited in proof of this; who in the 13th title of his third book De Testamentis enters pretty fully into the matter of inventories, and shews them to have been at that time generally under the cognizance of the Spiritual Court. Nor does it seem to have been long suspected even that the jurisdiction of these Courts in this particular was abridged by the statute of Hen. VIII. This may be collected from Swinburn, in whose book it appears that inventories and accounts were still required by these Courts of executors and administrators, at the suits of those interested in the effects of testators or [326] parties dead intestate; and might be questioned in these Courts—notwithstanding this, and long subsequent to the statute of Hen. VIII., when Swinburn wrote. There are several sections in the sixth part of his book, setting out when the inventory is to be made, what is to be put in it, and the effect and benefit of it—and it is there expressly also said that "if any creditor or legatory do affirm that the testator had any more goods than be comprised in the inventory, he must prove the same: otherwise the judge (the ecclesiastical judge) is to give credit to the inventory"—clearly not making him merely ministerial in this matter, and so unable to entertain objections of any sort to an inventory.

The object of the statute which is supposed to have this effect (I mean that of making these Courts merely ministerial) is so declared in its title, and runs so much through its enactments as hardly to be mistaken. The title is, "What fees ought to be taken for probate of testaments." And the preamble as clearly shews the true, I might almost say the sole, object of the statute to have been the restriction of fees. The order respecting inventories occurs (incidentally, as it were) in the middle of a section (the 4th § of the act) which, after stating how much the ordinary shall take in particular cases of wills or intestacies, goes on to enact, "That the executor or, in case of an intestacy, the administrator, calling or taking to him such person or persons, two at the least to whom the deceased was indebted or had made any legacy, and upon their refusal or absence, two other honest persons, being next of kin to the deceased, and in their default or absence, two other honest persons, shall in their presence, and by their directions, make or cause to be made a true and [327] perfect inventory of all the goods, chattels, wares, merchandises, as well moveable as not moveable whatsoever, that were of the said deceased; and the same shall cause to be indented; whereof the one part shall be by the said executor or administrator, upon his oath to be taken before the ordinary, &c., on the holy Evangelists (averred) to be good and true; and the same one part indented shall deliver into the keeping of the said ordinary, &c., the other part thereof to remain with the said executor or administrator; and that no ordinary, &c., upon the pain in this estatute hereafter contained, refuse to take any such inventory to him presented or tendered to be delivered as is aforesaid."

Now it is pretty evident that this part of the act neither does nor was intended to confer any jurisdiction on the Ecclesiastical Court with respect to inventories. As little can it be construed to have taken any away. What it does is this: it regulates the mode of making inventories; as, especially, that the inventory shall be made in duplicate, one part to be kept by the ordinary: and in effect (as taken in conjunction with the whole act, and the inception of this fourth section) prescribes that the ordinary shall receive that one part so committed to his keeping, without exacting additional fees—which last I take to be what the legislature had principally in view, in that part of the order respecting the receiving of inventories by the Ecclesiastical Court itself. Nor is there in this fourth section, as might be inferred from the printed report of the case of Henderson v. French, in Maule and Selwyn, any special penalty of 10l., imposed on the ordinary for a contravention of the statute in the matter of inventories; from [328] which penalty imposed the Court of King's Bench seems partly to have inferred that the ordinary's office was so merely ministerial in that matter. That penalty, a general penalty, is imposed by a subsequent general section (the 7th), which enacts that "every ordinary, &c., that shall do or attempt or cause any thing to be done, or attempted, against this act or ordinance (the whole statute, that is) in any thing, shall forfeit and lose for every time so offending to the party grieved in that behalf, so much money as he shall take contrary to the present act" (still with reference this to the main object of the act as explained above, and a further proof of such being the main object); "and over that, shall lose and forfeit 10l. sterling—a moiety to the King, and the other moiety to the party grieved in that behalf that will sue, &c., for recovery of the same." And as to any jurisdiction which the Ecclesiastical Court thentofore had over inventories not being taken away by this fourth section, this is put beyond all manner of doubt by another general (the 8th) section, which is in these words: "Provided always, that this present act shall not be prejudicial to any ordinary, or any other person which now have or hereafter shall have authority for probate of testaments; but that every of them shall, and may, convent before them, all and every person or persons, made and named executor or executors of any testament, to the intent to refuse or prove the testament or testaments of that testator or testators; and to bring in inventories, and to do every other thing concerning the same as they might do before the making of the act."

Here, then, the jurisdiction is not only not taken away from, it is expressly reserved to, the ordinary. [329] The restraining of fees is the great object of the act; the limiting the jurisdiction of these Courts is not its object at all. The act neither originated the obligation of exhibiting inventories; nor did it, in my humble judgment, render the Spiritual Court merely ministerial, concerning inventories—confine it, that is, to the mere receiving of inventories, when exhibited. On the contrary, it reserved to it all the powers in this matter which it had before the act; of which powers that of examining alleged omissions in inventories indisputably was one.

If, however, the Court of King's Bench had put a different construction upon the statute, having all these matters fully before it, it would have been the duty of this Court to have acquiesced in that construction, to say the least, in its public capacity. The Court, therefore, in that case would undoubtedly prohibit itself, by admitting the validity of the present objection. But I am not disposed to do this as the matter now stands—and the rather, as I find that my predecessor did not conceive that his hands were tied up in a case like the present, by the decision of the Court of King's Bench, in the case of Catchside and Ovington; the principal case, that is, on the authority of which it is contended that it is incompetent to the Court to proceed in the present case. This may be collected, for instance, from the case of Shackleton v. Lord Barrymore, which occurred here in Hilary Term, 1798; and which, in substance, was as follows:—

It was a suit by Shackleton, a creditor, against Lord Barrymore, as administrator of his brother, the late lord, for an inventory. Lord Barrymore exhibited an inventory. The creditor then gave in an allegation, [330] pleading omissa; to which allegation not only his lordship's answers were taken, but the creditor, being dissatisfied with those answers, produced witnesses on the allegation who were examined to falsify the inventory. At the hearing of the cause Lord Barrymore's counsel, of whom I was one, took an objection, at least to the depositions being read; citing, among other arguments in support of the objection, this case of Catchside and Ovington. The judge, Sir William Wynne, upon mature deliberation, sustained the objection, so far as it went to the reading of the depositions; at the same time that, notwithstanding the case of Catchside and Ovington, he ordered a fuller inventory as with reference to assets, the omission of which was deducible from the answers. From a note which I took of his judgment at the time I find that learned person to have expressed himself to the following effect:—

"It has been argued, that a creditor not being allowed to object to an account, it is not open to him on the same principle to object to an inventory. Upon principle, perhaps, there is no very solid distinction between the two cases; but a distinction has always prevailed in practice; allegations in objection to inventories have constantly been admitted. Two cases have been cited, indeed, to the effect that the common law will not allow inventories to be objected to in these Courts; but the reports of those cases are so short that it is not easy to see upon what principle they proceeded. In the one of these, the case of Hinton and Parker, it is merely said that the Spiritual Court shall not falsify an inventory at the suit of a creditor, though it may at the suit of a legatee. This is strictly all; for it is neither [331] said how the Spiritual Court shall not proceed to falsify an inventory at the suit of a creditor; nor is any ground for the distinction between the case of a creditor and that of a legatee, in this matter, for which there seems to be no good foundation in reason or principle attempted to be laid." In Catchside and Ovington the Court said, "On the face of the proceedings the Ecclesiastical Court had no jurisdiction;" but what the proceedings had been in that cause does not appear from the printed report.

What has been principally contended, however, is that though the Court may allow an allegation to be given in objection to an inventory, and answers to be taken upon that allegation; yet that it should go no further: that it should not permit witnesses to be examined upon the allegation in order to falsify the inventory. This distinction I take to be well founded (and therefore I incline to sustain the objection so far) for the following reason:—If the answers confess more assets than were inserted in the inventory, the Court may order the inventory to be amended by the insertion of these. But what is it to do if further assets are established by witnesses, in opposition to the answers? It cannot order them to be inserted in the inventory, without the party's oath; for the inventory is required by the statute to be upon oath. Nor can it compel the executor or administrator to swear to assets the possession of which he has twice already upon oath denied. Hence I sustain the objection taken to the depositions being read in this case. Nor in the cases cited (or in any other that I am aware of) of depositions taken on allegations of this [332] sort,(a) does any one occur in which the Court has ordered articles to be added to an inventory on depositions against answers: so that the taking of such depositions at all should appear merely superfluous.

Here, then, in this case of Shackleton v. Lord Barrymore there is a direct precedent for the Courts proceeding in this matter, notwithstanding the case of Catchside and Ovington: and I think that on the authority of that case the Court may proceed in the present; notwithstanding the countenance which that case of Catchside and Ovington derives from the more recent case of French and Henderson; and notwithstanding that more recent case itself, taken substantively. Further, in the present case the party, an executrix, whose authority is derived from the ordinary, objecting a statute in bar of proceedings by the ordinary, is at least, it should seem, first bound herself to a compliance with that statute. Has she complied with the statute? Is this such an inventory as is required by the statute? It is certainly not, in my view of it. The executrix does not even style it an inventory but a declaration in lieu of an inventory. She classes the effects in masses, and does not detail them specifically—nor does she set forth by whom they were appraised—both seemingly required by the statute.

(a) Armstrong v. Caley, 1763. Venables v. Watkins, 1766. Deane v. Crevis, 1767. Griffiths v. Craven, 1771.

Upon all these considerations I think that the executrix must either write to this act or bring in a further inventory as prayed by the creditor.

[333] IN THE GOODS OF ROBERT NICHOLSON, ESQ., Deceased. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1824.—An original codicil of which probate had been granted, containing an assignment of 10,000l. (part of 15,000l. secured by a heritable bond on lands in Scotland) delivered out in order to its being registered in Scotland, and there finally deposited, this being necessary to give the same effect; and the codicil itself (termed in Scotland a deed of disposition or assignation) not relating to any property of the testator in this country.

(On motion.)

In the month of October, 1821, probate of four paper writings, as containing the will and three codicils of Robert Nicholson, the party deceased in the cause, was granted to his three executors. The testator died possessed of large personal and heritable property both in this country and in Scotland; and amongst other property in Scotland of a certain heritable bond, dated the 2nd of January, 1812, granted to him by Patrick Crawford Bruce, Esq., upon the lands and barony of Glenelg in North Britain, for securing the sum of 15,000l. with lawful interest thereon.

The paper writing, of which probate was granted as a third codicil to the testator's will, contained an assignment of 10,000l., part of the 15,000l. so secured by the said bond, in favour of Robert Nicholson Bruce (son of the aforesaid Patrick Crawford Bruce), his heirs and assigns; and in no way related to or affected any property of the testator in this country; and it was absolutely necessary, in order to carry the same into effect, that the said original third codicil itself (termed in Scotland a deed of disposition or assignation) should be recorded in the register books of the council and sessions at Edinburgh.

An affidavit verifying the above facts and circumstances was now exhibited; and the Court was moved by counsel (with reference especially to a case in [334] 1796, Re Macpherson, Deceased, where a similar application was acceded to) to decree that the said original third codicil to the will of the said testator should be delivered out of the registry of the court (an authentic copy of the same being first taken and deposited in its room) for the purpose of being inserted in the register books of council and sessions kept at Edinburgh by the Lord Chief Registrar of Scotland or his deputies; and there finally deposited.

The Court granted the prayer as made; but directed that means should be taken to ensure a certificate of the due delivery of the said original codicil to the said Lord Chief Registrar or his deputies, and of its having actually been inserted, recorded, and deposited as aforesaid (a precaution which should seem not to have been taken in the former case of Macpherson, so that no proof was ever exhibited in that case that the instrument had actually been duly received and registered). And the said codicil was subsequently delivered out, accordingly, to the executors on their entering with two sureties into a bond in the penal sum of 1000l. conditioned to their exhibiting a certificate as above, by the first session of the ensuing (Hilary) term; or at least an affidavit to the same effect, duly sworn in the event of the said Lord Chief Registrar or his deputies refusing or declining to grant such certificate.

Motion granted.

[335] IN THE GOODS OF THE REV. WILLIAM PHILLIPS, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1824.—A defect in the legal representation of a party occasioned by the lunacy of one of his several administrators, how permitted by the Court to be supplied.

(On motion.)

In the month of October, 1817, letters of administration with the will and two codicils annexed, de bonis non, &c. of the Rev. William Phillips, deceased, had been granted by the authority of this Court to three of his younger children; being, as such, three of the substituted residuary legatees named in the said will. They had been granted, in the first instance, to his widow (since also deceased) as residuary legatee for life.

In the month of March, 1824, a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo was duly awarded by, and issued from, the Court of Chancery, under which one of the said three administrators was found to be a lunatic; and two persons were subsequently appointed by the Lord Chancellor committees, severally, of his person and estate.

There were still standing, in the name of the deceased, in the books of the governor and company of the bank of England, certain sums the property of the said deceased; but of which neither the interest could be received nor the principal stock transferred as directed by the will, in consequence of such lunacy of one of the said three administrators; whereby the letters of administration granted as aforesaid had become inoperative in law.(a)[1]

[336] Under these circumstances, duly verified by affidavit,

The Court was pleased, on motion of counsel, to direct that upon the letters of administration so granted as aforesaid being brought in by the two (the sane) administrators and the committees of the third, letters of administration de bonis non, &c., should, with the leave and by consent of the said committees, issue de novo to the two former only; with the omission of the latter, the third administrator, who had so become a lunatic as aforesaid.(b)

Motion granted.

BROGDEN v. BROWN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1824.—An allegation in objection to an inventory brought in on oath, by a party in the cause, admitted; and "answer" decreed. Quære, whether the Court might not assign a "term probatory," and permit witnesses to be examined on such an allegation, in the event of the answers being unsatisfactory.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Mary Jones died on the 13th of June, 1823, a widow and without a child—leaving John Brown, [337] party in the cause, her natural and lawful father, and the only person entitled to her personal estate and effects, if dead intestate. Mr. Brogden, the other party, was sole executor in a will of the deceased, purporting to bear date on the 12th of June, 1823: he had propounded this will, and it was opposed by the father.

Both parties pleaded and examined witnesses—and on the second session of Trinity Term [1824] publication was decreed at the petition of the proctor for Brown, and "for sentence on the first assignation next Court:" when the proctor for Brogden asserted an allegation on admission of which the judge assigned to hear on the fourth session.

On the second session, however, of the term preceding [Easter Term], the proctor for Brogden had brought in an inventory of the effects of the deceased, on the oath of his party,(a)[2] in compliance with an assignation to that effect. And the proctor for Brown, on the second session of Trinity Term before mentioned, objected to that inventory, and the judge assigned to hear "on his petition," in objection to it, next Court.

The above assignation was continued from the third to the fourth session, when

(a)[1] The act of 36 George III. c. 90, entitled "an act for the relief of persons equitably and beneficially entitled in the several stocks and annuities, transferable at the bank of England," so far as it relates to lunatics, was considered to apply only to stock standing in the name of a lunatic, either in his own right or as a trustee—and not to stock standing in the name of a deceased person whose legal representative had become lunatic.

(b) Where a sole executor or administrator becomes a lunatic, it is the ordinary practice of the Court to make a limited grant to his committee for his use and benefit during his lunacy. But until the present no case of an application to the Court to supply a defect in the legal representation of a party deceased, occasioned by the lunacy of his several administrators, is believed to have occurred.

(a)[2] It should be said that Mr. Brogden had been sworn executor of the will which he was now propounding ten days after the death of the deceased—and that, as executor in that interval, he had intermeddled with the deceased's effects, by converting property, &c.—though a probate of the will had been prevented from issuing by a caveat entered in the name of the father, after he had been so sworn; and the subsequent institution of the present suit. See case of Brogden v. Brown, among the cases heard in Hilary Term, post.

both proctors declared that they should give no further allegation, unless exceptive to the testimony of witnesses: on admission thereof, if [338] any, on the by-day—to which by-day the rest of the assignation was also continued; and so regularly on till Michaelmas Term; on the first session of which the proctor for Brown waived his petition, and brought in an allegation in objection to the inventory; which allegation was opposed, and now stood on admission.

1, 2. This allegation, after pleading (articles one and two) in substance that Brogden took possession of the effects of the deceased—that he was assigned to exhibit an inventory and that he had omitted various articles in the inventory actually exhibited, pleaded in substance, more specifically.

3. That the business of the deceased, that of a bread and biscuit baker, was carried on for some time after her death, and until the same could be disposed of—that during such time there were goods sold to the amount or value of 59l. or thereabouts, which sum had been paid into the hands of Brogden, the exhibitant—but that he, Brogden, in the inventory exhibited, had charged himself with the sum of 21l. 14s. 6d. only, in respect of goods so sold.

4. That the deceased at the time of her death had book debts owing to her, amounting altogether to the sum of 300l.: and was also possessed of two bills of exchange (value unknown)—that Brogden had received the said book debts, wholly or in part, and the said bills of exchange—but had charged himself with neither in the said inventory exhibited.

5. That the said deceased was possessed at the time of her death of a policy of assurance effected on her own life for 500l., or some other considerable sum—that Brogden since her death had received the amount of such policy under assignment thereof, or otherwise; [339] but had not charged himself with the same, nor made any mention thereof whatever in the said inventory. Lastly—

6, 7. That the deceased was possessed of various articles of plate, furniture and wearing apparel (in part specified) also taken possession of by Brogden (over and above what he had mentioned and set forth in his inventory): with which, or with any sum or sums of money in respect of which he, Brogden, had likewise omitted to charge himself, as bound by law.

The admission of this allegation was opposed on the behalf of the executor—partly as with reference to the late period at which it was tendered; and to the delay in the hearing of the principal cause, now ripe for the hearing, which the assigning of a new term probatory inferred to be consequent on the admission of the allegation would, of course, give rise to. It was also again submitted as a circumstance,(a)[1] on the authority of Henderson v. French, and other cases, that the Ecclesiastical Court had been held by the Court of King's Bench, merely ministerial in this matter of inventories—and so not authorized to proceed by allegations, admitted or otherwise, to falsify inventories once given in on the oaths of executors.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Mr. Brogden, as sole executor of a will, which in that character he is propounding before the Court, was assigned to exhibit a full, true and perfect inven-[340]-tory of all and singular the goods, chattels and credits of the deceased which had come to his hands, possession or knowledge, at any time since her death. It is evident that he has not complied with this assignation if the averments of the allegation are true. The Court has been told that he is a nude executor—(a)[2] that, however, is a circumstance in the case quite immaterial. He is equally compellable to make a full disclosure of the effects to the other party. Brown, the other party, is therefore equally entitled to specify omissions and suppressions so, at least, as to have his answers in detail, as if the executor was benefited to the whole extent of the property by the asserted will. It may be material too that this full disclosure should be had in the course of the cause. The effects in the mean time may be made (a)[1] See this objection fully disposed of in the case of Telford v. Morison, formerly Thomas, ante, page 319. The executor was here also party in the cause—[See note (b) p. 40, post] and the objection was not taken by a creditor or legatee, but by the other party.

---

(a)[2] The will propounded bequeathed the whole of the deceased's property except a few trifling legacies to Mr. Brogden; but in trust for the benefit of her father, John Brown, for life; and of her brother and sister, Edward Brown and Ann M'Greggor, in equal proportions at his death.

away with—an administration, pendente lite, may even be necessary to secure these—it may turn out to be highly proper, and for many reasons, that the Court should postpone its judgment in the principal cause, till the disclosure sought is first fully had.

I admit the allegation and decree answers. Whether the Court shall proceed to the ulterior step of assigning a term probatory, in order to let in witnesses upon the allegation, is another consideration.(b) So it also is [341] (for I would be understood by no means to have finally decided), whether this collateral matter should, or should not, delay the hearing of the principal cause. I have strong doubts whether it should; in the event of its not being made to appear that it has a material bearing on the principal cause; so that it requires to be definitively settled, in order to enable the Court to pronounce safely in this. But should Brogden delay giving his answers in order to bring the principal cause to a hearing, before these are brought in—this of itself would induce the Court to pause; and possibly to insist on the answers being brought in, before the cause is set down for hearing,

On the matter of costs, if the averments of the allegation should turn out to be unfounded, Mr. Brogden will be entitled to the costs of this collateral proceeding, [342] whatever becomes of the principal cause. And so, on the other hand, will Brown be, whatever becomes of the principal cause, if the charges of omission or suppression made in the allegation are fully sustained. Should the allegation again be only partly sustained—should the omissions proved turn out to be either immaterial or accidental merely, or, in a word, not to be wilful and corrupt, the costs of the present proceeding, in this state of facts, will be purely discretionary; and the Court will allot or apportion them, in that event, to the best of its judgment, and not without reference to all the circumstances of the case.

Allegation admitted and answers decreed.

CRESSWELL AND OTHERS v. CRESSWELL AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1824.—In no case will the Court decree administration to substituted trustees, as such, without the consent of all parties beneficially interested in the trust properties, until the trust properties are actually vested in such substituted trustees.

Estcourt Cresswell, Esq., late of Pinkney Park, in the county of Wilts, died on the 5th of July, 1823, possessed of real and personal estate of a very considerable amount in value—having first made and executed his last will and testament, bearing date the 21st day of February, 1821, whereof he appointed Joseph Pitt, Esq., and the Rev. Charles Dewell, clerk, executors and residuary legatees in trust, and six of his, the testator's, sons residuary legatees—with direction that in case his said trustees, or either of them, should die, or refuse, or decline to act, or become incapable of acting, in the trusts of his said will, his said sons, or the major part of them, might appoint others in their [343] stead, in the usual manner in which trustees are appointed in similar cases.

(b) It may be inferred from the case of Telford v. Thomas [ante] that the Court would not permit depositions to be taken on an allegation given in by a creditor or legatee in objection to an inventory exhibited by an executor, cited to exhibit an inventory that character merely. [See for what reasons in page 331, ante.] But Mr. Brogden had not only been sworn executor, and would so finally be, in the event of the will being pronounced for; he was also the party before the Court propounding the will; and the allegation in objection to the inventory was not given in by a creditor or legatee, but by the other party, the party opposing the will. This, obviously, subjects the case to very different considerations; so that the Court might well have permitted depositions to have been taken on this allegation, had the answers proved unsatisfactory, without at all departing from the principle laid down in that other case of Telford v. Thomas. No such step, indeed, was actually taken in the present case for the following reason. The answers had were most satisfactory—and at the hearing of the principal cause which followed the conduct throughout of the executor, which had been grievously aspersed throughout, in the name of the other litigant, was not merely vindicated from those aspersions; but was proved to have been exemplary, and generous in no ordinary degree. [See cases in Hilary Term, post.]

Shortly after the death of the said testator the said trustees signified their refusal to act, and declined acting altogether in the trusts of the said will—and subsequently renounced, by a special proxy under their hands and seals exhibited in this Court, as well the probate and execution of the said will, as their right and title to letters of administration of all and singular the effects of the deceased with the said will annexed.

In the month of August, 1823, one of the sons of the deceased filed a bill in the high Court of Chancery, in behalf of himself and the several creditors, legatees, and next of kin of the deceased, generally, against all the other parties before mentioned, for the purpose of having the trusts of the said will carried into execution, under the authority of the said Court; praying that it might be referred to one of the masters of the said Court to appoint a trustee or trustees in the room and stead of the said Joseph Pitt and Charles Dewell; as also for the appointment of a receiver; and for an injunction to restrain the defendants (or either of them) in the interim, from receiving, or possessing themselves of, any part of the testator's real or personal estate.

On the 13th of the same month of August the Lord Chancellor was pleased to grant the injunction; as also to appoint a receiver till further order (an order and appointment still in force); and was also further pleased on the 13th of December, 1823, to order or direct that it should be referred to a master (Mr. Dowdeswell) to appoint proper persons to be trustees under the will of the said testator, instead of the defendants Pitt and Dewell: and that they, the said [344] last-mentioned defendants, should convey and assign all the several trust premises to the trustees, so to be appointed, to, for, and upon the several trusts contained in the will of the testator concerning the same, or such of them as were still subsisting, and capable of taking effect, by a deed or deeds of conveyance and assignment to be settled and approved of by the said master.

In pursuance of the said order the master, to wit, on the 7th of April, 1824, reported that he had approved of the appointment of Richard Hopkins Harrison and Francis Henry Thomas, Esqrs., as trustees of the real and personal estate and effects of the testator; as also that he had settled, or approved of, deeds of conveyance and assignment, to vest in them the several trust premises. But the said report was still unconfirmed by the Lord Chancellor; nor had the conveyance and assignment therein referred to been executed, so as to vest the several trust premises in the trustees, so approved of by the master, by reason, as alleged, of one of the executors and trustees in this will, namely, Mr. Pitt, refusing to execute the same.

Under these circumstances it was prayed on behalf of the said Richard Hopkins Harrison and Francis Henry Thomas, by and with the special consent and approval of three of the six residuary legatees, that administration (with the will annexed) of the goods of the deceased might be granted to them, the said Richard Hopkins Harrison and Francis Henry Thomas, under the usual security—as the trustees, especially so appointed by the High Court of Chancery, of the estate and effects of the deceased in the place and stead of Joseph Pitt and the Rev. Charles Dewell, the execu-[345]-tors, and residuary legatees in trust, named in his will.

In order to found the application, it was principally alleged in the act of Court, duly verified by affidavits, on the part of the applicants, that a considerable part of the testator's property consisted of a leasehold estate of great value, held of the see of Gloucester, in want of immediate renewal, as depending on a single life; by reason of which, and other special circumstances also stated in the act, great loss and detriment to the estate were daily accruing; and still greater, probably, would accrue, in failure of the speedy appointment of a personal representative of the deceased.

In reply to this it was alleged, on behalf of the opposing parties, namely, the three other residuary legatees, that it was incompetent to the Court, by law and the practice of the Court, to grant the administration, at this time, as prayed, against their sense and consent. And it was further alleged that a consent on their part to a grant of administration to Messrs. Harrison and Thomas, jointly, was only withheld, in consideration that neither the master's report had been confirmed by the Lord Chancellor, nor had the conveyance therein specified been actually executed, so as to vest in those gentlemen the trust premises.

The single topic urged by counsel in support of the prayer of the petition was the loss and detriment, actual and probable, accruing and to accrue to the estate, for want of an immediate personal representative of the deceased. The counsel for the objectors submitted that these must be, at least in great part, obviated by the circumstance of there being an existing receiver to the estate—and brought to its view the difficulties which might probably arise from the Courts [346] decreeing the grant to pass to the proposed administrators, before the trust estates should have become actually vested in them, by virtue of the assignment directed by the Lord Chancellor. Suppose, it was said, that circumstances (of which there are some disclosed in the act on petition itself, that render this no very improbable supposition) should occasion any variation in the order of reference to the master, or any pause, even, as to the propriety of confirming the master's report. The Court might be placed in a situation of great difficulty by acting precipitately on the master's report, in either of those events.

Court. With every possible disposition to afford the parties all the assistance in its power with respect to the management of this large estate, it is still, I think, incompetent to the Court to accede to the present application. Two gentlemen unobjected to, and therefore, I presume, very proper in themselves to take the administration, are nominated trustees by the master, under an order of reference made by the Lord Chancellor, which also directs that the trust premises shall be conveyed and assigned to them by the original trustees, so named in the will. But the deeds to that effect, as approved by the master, are still unexecuted—consequently, the trusts are still not vested in the new trustees—a previous step which I take to be absolutely necessary to entitle them as of right to the administration. It is alleged that Mr. Pitt, one of the original trustees, refuses, or declines, to execute the deeds of assignment, upon the ground of the testator's insanity at the time of executing this latter will; and of there being a former will in existence, of a different import. [347] This may, as suggested (appearing, as it does, in his answers in Chancery, given in subsequent to the order), occasion a variation in the order of reference to the master. But without entering into this consideration (or into that other, whether this be, or be not, such a "report" as requires to be confirmed by the Lord Chancellor,(a) in order to its full validity) I am of opinion, for the reasons already assigned, that this application is premature, and that I am bound to reject it. In no case of such substituted trustees would the Court be justified in decreeing administration to them, without the consent of all parties beneficially entitled to the trust property, until the trusts are actually vested.

Motion refused.(b)

[348] HOWELL v. METCALFE AND SANDERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1824.—Where securities are required to justify in ordinary course, the Court will not dispense with this, even partially, but under very special circumstances.—If the Court decrees a general grant, but, under special circumstances, requires the securities to justify only as to a part of the property, it will not allow separate bonds; so that other securities than those who justify in the requisite amount shall enter into the common administration bond, in the double amount of the whole property.

Sir Theophilus John Metcalfe (the party deceased) died in the month of August, 1822, having, a short time before his decease, stated that "he had left his will in China," but without saying who were his executors, or to whom he had bequeathed his property. The deceased had been resident many years in China, and came to this country in 1820, for the benefit of his health, meaning to return to China.

(a) It had been said, in argument, that it was not the practice of the Court of Chancery to confirm such reports—and that the master's "report," in this case, was one that required no confirmation.

(b) But on the caveat day following, administration was decreed jointly to Mr. Harrison and Mr. Thomas; the deeds of conveyance and assignment being then certified to have been executed by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dewell, the original trustees.

On this caveat day the deeds so executed by the old trustees were stated to have been executed by one only, Mr. Harrison, of the new trustees; there being two parties to these deeds, the old and the new trustees, as settled by the master. The Court directed the grant not to pass till the actual execution of the deeds by Mr. Thomas, the other trustee; who was said, as accounting for the delay, to be resident at Hereford, but to be perfectly willing and ready to execute them.

Under these circumstances administration, limited to certain purposes, of the goods of the deceased, until his will, or an authentic copy thereof, should be transmitted to this country (or his intestacy be ascertained) was decreed to two persons, Edmund Larken and William Monson, Esqrs., by this (the Prerogative) Court, in the month of December, 1822 (see 1 Add. 343, 345), which administration had ceased and determined some time back; a copy of the said will having actually been forwarded to this country.

The deceased by his said will appointed his brother (now Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe) of Hydrabad, Charles Magniac, and George Sanders, Esqrs., both of Canton, and the said Edmund Larken, Esq., his executors—and his daughter Eliza Metcalfe, a minor, aged about sixteen years at the time of his death, residuary legatee.

In March, 1823, a bill was filed in the high Court of Chancery, wherein the said minor, by David Howell [349] (party in the cause), was plaintiff, and the said Edmund Larken and William Monson were defendants—and by an order made in the said cause Mr. Howell was appointed guardian of the person and property of the minor until she attained her age of twenty-one years.

In the month of March, 1824, letters of administration (with the said copy of the will annexed) of the goods of the deceased were granted, by authority of this Court, to the said David Howell, limited to the purpose only of transferring all sums of money due and payable to the deceased, from the governor and company of the bank of England, from the London dock company, from the company of merchants trading to the East Indies, and from the Globe insurance company respectively (see 1 Add. 343), into the name of the accountant general of the Court of Chancery. But,

This last administration had also since ceased and determined, viz. on the arrival of Mr. Magniac, one of the executors, in this country. Mr. Magniac, however, subsequently died here; but without having taken upon himself the probate, or having in any manner interfered in the trusts of the said will: and of the other executors, two were still in India, and the third, Mr. Larken, had renounced the probate and execution of the will.

Under these circumstances a decree had been extracted at the instance of the said David Howell, Esq., calling upon the executors in India to accept or refuse probate of the copy of the said will aforesaid—otherwise to shew cause why letters of administration (with [350] such copy annexed) of the goods of the deceased should not be committed and granted to the said David Howell, Esq., as the guardian of the said Eliza Metcalfe, and for her use and benefit—limited until she should attain her age of twenty-one; or until the original will and codicil should be transmitted to this country; or until the arrival here of the said executors, both or either of them.

That decree was now returned into Court, duly executed by a service on one of the pillars of the Royal Exchange, &c.—and no appearance being given, and the facts as above stated being duly verified by exhibits and affidavits, the Court was moved—in the first instance, to decree administration according to the tenor of the said decree—but in the event either of its declining so to do, or of its requiring, in that case, that the securities should justify—then, to decree letters of administration to the said David Howell, Esq., limited for the purpose only of "receiving and collecting the outstanding personal estate and effects of the deceased; and from time to time, when so received, of investing the same in the name of the accountant general of the Court of Chancery; and further, for the purpose of duly administering the estate and effects of the deceased, according to the trusts of his said will, by and under the directions of the said high Court of Chancery."

The Court, as not thinking itself authorised to dispense with the securities, justifying, in the event of its decreeing administration according to the tenor of the decree, was pleased to decree letters of administration, &c., to [351] Mr. Howell, limited, as prayed in the other alternative, on his exhibiting an inventory, and giving the usual security.(a)

Motion granted.

(a) The administration so decreed was not, however, extracted in consequence of a caveat entered on behalf of certain parties interested under the will of a third party (Mr. Pattle, see p. 53, ante) of whom the deceased, whilst living, was one of the acting executors; to compel Mr. Howell to take a general grant, to which he was entitled, instead of the limited one so decreed, on the principle of the inconvenience which [352] TUCKER v. WESTGARTH AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1824.—Where it is discretionary in the Court to grant administration to either of two claimants, it always decrees it, cæteris paribus, to that claimant who has the greater interest in the effects to be administered.

(On petition.)

This was a question between two claimants as to a grant of administration not within the statute 21 Henry VIII. c. 5. It was determined by the Court, as such questions usually will be, in favour of that claimant whose interest in the estate to be administered proved to be greatest.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Thomas Atkinson, the party deceased, died in the year 1804, having made his will, of which he appointed his then wife, Mary Atkinson, executrix, during widowhood. By this will he bequeathed the principal part of his property to his widow for her life; and, after her death, to his daughter Isabella—and upon the death of this last, without children, he bequeathed it over to his nephews and nieces, the children of his three sisters. The residue of the testator's property was undisposed of by his will.

The widow took probate of the will, but married again, leaving goods unadministered; and died. Her (second) husband is since also dead—and Thomas [353] Tucker, party in the cause, is an executor in, and has taken probate of, both their wills. He, Tucker, then, is the representative of the widow's interest, indeed, in the effects of Thomas Atkinson, the first testator; but not of Thomas Atkinson, the first testator himself; of whose unadministered effects he now claims administration, with his will annexed.

The other claimants, and other parties in the cause, are five persons, nephews and nieces of the testator, children of his three sisters, and whose interest, as substituted legatees in his will, has actually accrued by the death of the daughter Isabella subsequent to that of the mother, without issue. They are also the daughter's first cousins, and next of kin.

None of the claimants were next of kin to the deceased at the time of his death. Consequently this administration, not being within the statute, is one upon which the Court must exercise its own discretion. In the exercise of which discretion it generally looks to which of the claimants has the greater interest, and decrees the administration accordingly—though other considerations may undoubtedly concur.

would accrue to them from such limited grant, in prosecuting any claims which they might have against the estate of the deceased, as executor of Mr. Pattle. Mr. Howell on this abandoned the limited grant, and agreed to take a general grant, provided the Court would dispense with the securities justifying, save as to the property (said to amount to about 10,000l.) not in the hands of the accountant general of the Court of Chancery. And on the first session of Hilary Term, 1825, a motion to the Court to that effect was granted. A still further difficulty, however, afterwards occurred, in consequence of the sureties produced by Mr. Howell, who were willing to justify to the amount of the property out of the Court of Chancery (the 10,000l.), refusing to subject themselves to the usual penalty, under the common bond, in the requisite amount, viz. in the amount of 140,000l., the deceased's whole personal estate being valued at between 60 and 70,000l.: and the Court, on the by-day after Hilary Term, was thereupon further prayed, either to dispense with sureties altogether, as to the property in the name of the accountant general; or, that separate bonds might be allowed, so that other sureties than those justifying might enter into the common bond. The Court, however, declined acceding to either of these prayers as in direct violation, either, of its ordinary practice—observing "that it had gone as far as it could for the accommodation of the parties." Upon this the grant seems to have been altogether abandoned.

Mr. Howell, however, as prochein amy of the minor, Miss Metcalfe, had filed a bill in Chancery against two of the surviving executors of the will of the deceased: and proceedings in that suit were stayed by there being no legal representative of the deceased to be made a party to the suit. Accordingly, on the first session of Easter Term, 1825, the Court, on this statement, duly verified, was moved (and was pleased) to decree letters of administration of the goods, &c., of the deceased, to a nominee of Mr. Howell, "limited to the purpose only of answering to the said suit, in the Court of Chancery:" which limited administration was afterwards extracted.

In the present case, upon every consideration, the next of kin of the daughter, and not the representative of the wife, have the superior title to the administration. They have a greater interest in the undisposed-of residue—they are substituted legatees in the will—add to which, that the original testator never intended his wife to continue his personal representative after a re-marriage; a circumstance which throws some little additional weight into the scale.

I decree administration as prayed to the next of kin of the daughter; but as their affidavits contain some [354] imputations on the other party, not founded upon any thing which appears in their "act," I think that, upon this consideration only, they are not entitled to full costs. Hence I shall condemn Mr. Tucker in 10l. nomine expensarum; and not in full costs, as I should otherwise have done; thinking his opposition to the present grant utterly unfounded.

MONTEFIORE v. MONTEFIORE AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1824.—An allegation, propounding an imperfect paper, rejected; as insufficient, if true, to sustain the paper propounded.—In what sense, and to what extent, the Court assumes an allegation to be true, in considering whether it be admissible.—The difference, what, between a mere unexecuted testamentary paper and a testamentary paper which is also imperfect in other respects. The legal presumption is against the validity of either: but it is infinitely stronger, and more difficult to be repelled, against the validity of an imperfect paper of the latter, than it is against that of an imperfect paper of the former description. What it is which the Court requires to repel the legal presumption against a paper of either description.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

This was a cause or business of proving, in solemn form of law, the last will and testament of Abraham Montefiore, deceased—promoted by Henrietta Montefiore, the relict, and the sole residuary legatee named in the said last will of the deceased, against the three executors of a former will. The admissibility of the allegation propounding this last will had been debated on a preceding Court day; and was the question that now stood for sentence.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This suit is brought in a spirit of perfect amity between the parties, for the purpose of taking the opinion of the Court upon the validity of a testamen-[355]-tary paper, propounded as the will of Abraham Montefiore, deceased. I have taken time enough to consider the matter maturely; both as the property at stake is very large; and as the Court has received an intimation that the parties are disposed in this instance to abide by its decision, be that decision what it may. I have therefore, again, in the interval between this and the last Court day carefully considered all the circumstances of the case: but my opinion with respect to it has never wavered; or been different from that which I originally entertained.

The cause at present stands merely upon the admission of the allegation propounding the paper: but should the Court reject that allegation, there is an end of the cause itself. For the principle upon which the Court rejects any allegation is its inadequacy (assuming its truth) to make out the case laid in it. If the Court, then, rejects this allegation, it must be that it thinks it insufficient, assuming it to be true, to sustain the paper which it propounds as a will: so that in that event, as already said, there is, of course, an end of the cause. The cause must proceed, indeed, should the Court admit the allegation, in order to this being proved: as it only assumes an allegation to be true for the purpose of determining whether it be admissible—its final avail and efficacy in the cause obviously depending upon whether, and to what extent, the allegation is proved, after being so admitted.

In assuming, however, an allegation to be true for the purpose of determining its admissibility, the Court only assumes to be true those facts pleaded in it capable of satisfactory proof; and not, by any means, all the several averments which may stand in the allega-[356]-tion; which, in effect, are mere inferences deduced somehow or other from those facts. The averments in a plea are to be taken for true, so far only as the facts pleaded justify inferences to the effect of those averments; which, whether they do at all, and if so, to what extent, it is for the Court to determine. For instance, in this sort of allegation, "intention," on the testator's part, to do so and so is always averred—but such averment goes for nothing, unless the Court can infer that the testator's intention was, as averred, from the facts pleaded. So when again, in a plea of this same description, the testator's capacity at the time of doing the testamentary act is averred, as it always is; the truth of that averment is only assumed by the Court, even in deciding upon the admissibility of the plea, to what extent it thinks that the facts and circumstances of the transaction, as pleaded, warrant an inference that he was of capacity at such time; and so, in other matters.

Having premised these observations, it becomes proper to consider the paper propounded itself—both with respect to its form, and with respect to its effect or substance. Upon the result of these considerations the legal presumptions in, and the whole view to be taken of, the case very much depend.

Upon the face of the paper it is, in point of form, a very imperfect paper. It is neither written by the deceased himself, nor signed, nor dated; no executor is appointed in it: it has no formal or other words of conclusion: two letters appear written as beginning a new sentence; and with these it abruptly terminates. A paper more imperfect, in point of form, can hardly be imagined.

[357] The term "imperfect" as applied to an instrument of this description is carefully to be distinguished from the word "unexecuted." Not every "imperfect" paper is "unexecuted:" nor is every "unexecuted" paper "imperfect," except only in a certain sense of that term. For instance, a testamentary paper may be finished and complete, looking to the body of the instrument, as purporting to dispose of the testator's whole property, and so on—still, however, if unexecuted, as, for instance, by wanting the deceased's signature, it is, in a certain sense of the word, though in a certain sense of the word only, an imperfect paper. But in applying the term imperfect to the present paper, the Court means that it is imperfect in every sense of the word: it is one that on the face of it was manifestly in progress only; it is unfinished and incomplete, as to the body of the instrument, as well as "unexecuted;" all which the paper itself propounded, which is in these words, clearly implies.

"I leave my son, Joseph Montefiore, Worth Park Farm—And my son, Nathaniel, Brighton Farm—And all my other property I leave and bequeath to my dear wife Henrietta Montefiore—This is my last will and testament. I w———"

The legal principles as to imperfect testamentary papers of every description vary much according to the stage of maturity at which those papers have arrived. The presumption of law, indeed, is against every testamentary paper not actually executed by the testator; and so executed, as it is to be inferred, on the face of [358] the paper that the testator meant to execute it. But if the paper be complete in all other respects that presumption is slight and feeble, and one comparatively easily repelled. For intentions, sub modo at least, need not be proved in the case: that is, the Court will presume the testator's intentions to be as expressed in such a paper, on its being satisfactorily shewn that its not being executed may be justly ascribed to some other cause; and not to any abandonment of those intentions so expressed, on his, the testator's part. But where a paper is unfinished as well as unexecuted (especially where it is just begun, and contains only a few clauses or bequests), not only must its being unfinished and unexecuted be accounted for as above; but it must also be proved (for the Court will not presume it) to express the testator's intentions in order to repel the legal presumption against its validity. It must be clearly made to appear, upon a just view of all the facts and circumstances of the case, that the deceased had come to a final resolution in respect to it, as far as it goes: so that by establishing it, even in such its imperfect state, the Court will give effect to, and not thwart or defeat, the testator's real wishes and intentions, in respect to the property which it purports to bequeath, in order to entitle such a paper to probate, in any case, in my judgment.

Upon these principles it follows that against the instrument set up in the present case, from its very form, the presumption of law to be repelled is a strong presumption. The task of repelling it—the onus probandi—in the case of this, as of every imperfect paper, rests, it need scarcely be observed, upon the party setting it up.

[359] In its effect this instrument has peculiar features which render the task so imposed on the party who propounds it a pretty difficult one. It not only sets out with devising real property in a different course from that in which it would descend by law (and so far, it is clear that it can have no operation); but it disposes at once of the whole personal property; giving it all (above four hundred thousand pounds) to the widow; and excluding all the testator's children (who in legal succession would be entitled to two-thirds) from any part of it. Legal presumption, as well as rational probability, are strong against the testator having finally conceived any such intention.

There are two modes, nearly opposite, in each of which, however, testamentary instruments are not uncommonly drawn up: the one (perhaps the most common of the two) is to give, at the outset, the several legacies; and, at the conclusion, to dispose of the residue: the other is, in the first instance, to bequeath the whole property; and subsequently to except out of it the several legacies, &c., which the testator may chuse to bequeath as deductions from that whole. Now in the present instance, all the personalty being given to the wife, at the outset, in exclusion of the children, unless the Court can be satisfied that, so far as relates to the disposition of the personalty, this paper is complete, and that it was the testator's full and final intention to subject that personalty to no deductions whatever, either in favour of his children, or other, it would be impossible, I think, consistently with the ordinary principles acted upon by this Court, or with common sense and common justice, to establish this paper as the deceased's will. If the instrument is (as it clearly [360] is) in legal construction one in progress merely, and unfinished as to the body of the instrument, the legal presumption surely is, that had the deceased not been prevented from finishing it, he would have gone on to provide for his children in a subsequent part of the instrument. I cannot assent to the proposition contended for by one of the counsel, that if a testator dies while the instrument is in progress, that instrument, "so far as it goes," be its contents and effect what they may, must be valid. I know of no principle to that broad extent ever laid down; nor was any authority cited in support of it. The rule which I take to operate in the case of every unfinished paper is this: can the Court infer that, by pronouncing for it, it will carry into effect what it collects, from all the circumstances of the case, to have been the deceased's wish? In that event it will be its duty to pronounce for it—but surely not if it sees reason to believe that by so doing it will defeat or counteract, instead of giving effect to, that wish.

Hitherto the Court has been considering this paper taken singly, and not in connection with any other testamentary papers left by the testator. Such, however, there are—papers before the Court. There is a former executed will; of which this unfinished paper, if established, will be, in effect, not a partial but a total revocation: for the two are not such that the Court can pronounce for them, as it sometimes can pronounce for papers in parallel cases, as "together containing" the will of the testator. It has been said that at all events the deceased intended to die testate; and that he intended to revoke his former will; and the Court has been urged from this to pronounce for the unfinished [361] paper. Testate the deceased must die—for if the paper propounded be invalid the executed will must operate. And, as to the revocation of the former will; the question is not so much whether the deceased can be taken to have intended to revoke his former will, simply, as it is, whether he can be taken to have intended that this unfinished paper should be substituted for, and should operate in lieu of, and in preference to, that former will. The question is not a question between the former will and an intestacy—it is between the two instruments; between the former will and this paper in its obviously incomplete, imperfect state. The former will being an executed instrument the "præsumptio juris, et de jure," is that he intended it to operate, unless he actually cancelled or destroyed it, or made another valid instrument which will have the effect of revoking it.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the facts pleaded in this allegation, I will make one other general observation, applicable to questions of this nature (not unimportant, too, in its bearing upon the particular case), which is this. In considering whether a plea of this description be admissible, the Court is bound to keep in view the extent and effect of the paper which it propounds—and to couple these, all along, with its history, as given in the plea. Now what this part of its duty suggests to the Court as with reference to the present immediate question is this. The paper propounded going, in effect, to revoke an executed will, and to put an immense property in a course of distribution which is very far from being an "officious" one; the allegation, to be admissible, must make out a case of full and entire "capacity" in the testator, at the [362] time when the paper was framed. Nor will it be sufficient, in order to this, for the plea to make out that he was of capacity to answer a few (common) questions, or to make a few (casual) remarks, or even to conceive and express some (loose) wishes and ideas, as to altering his will, and so on—it must satisfy the Court that he was equal, and alive to, and comprehended, the full import of what he was doing at the time; seriously important as what he actually did must be admitted to be: in short, as Lord Coke expresses it, that he was "capable, at the time of the transaction, of making disposition of his 'estate,' with judgment and understanding." And in determining whether the allegation should, or should not, satisfy the Court in this particular it must look, not to mere averments, but to the facts pleaded—such averments, as already said, being good only so far as they are warranted by the facts pleaded; which last are all of the allegation that the Court assumes to be true.

I now then proceed, subject to these general considerations, to consider the facts of this case as they are stated in the present plea: and they appear to me to raise a question of so little doubt and difficulty that it is principally for the satisfaction of the parties that I am induced to enter into a detailed statement of them.

The allegation in the two first articles furnishes, in substance, a history of the testator and of his executed will. It pleads that Abraham Montefiore died on the 25th of August last [1824], at Lyons, in France, on his way home to this country, leaving a widow, one daughter by a first wife, and two sons and two daughters by a second wife (his now widow and relict), [363] all minors, and the youngest daughter born after May, 1820, the date of the executed will. This will, with two codicils, is all in the deceased's hand writing; and it is to the following effect. It is a complete will as to personalty—it is a will that, obviously, was not intended to act upon real property; as it makes no mention of such and is attested by a single witness: the necessary inference from which is that the testator meant that his real estate should descend to his eldest son. Of his personalty it disposes as follows—25,000l. to each of his children, except to the daughter by his first wife, whom it bequeaths only 15,000l., as the testator had settled about 10,000l. on her previous to his second marriage. The residue, with the exception of certain legacies of no very large amount, it bequeaths to the widow; whom it appoints (jointly with four other persons) executrix. What the residue might amount to at that time does not appear.

This will as I have described it remains uncancelled and unrevoked unless it be revoked by the paper now in question. It does appear, however, that the deceased at an intermediate time (pleaded in the latter end of 1822 or at the beginning of 1823), intending (so pleaded) to make a new will, wrote certain papers which are before the Court, marked D, E, and F. They contain a mere outline or rough sketch of a new will; they are loosely written and with various erasures; trustees were apparently intended to be, but none are appointed, and the residue is undisposed of in either of them. Previous to writing these papers, however, I should observe, namely, in August, 1822, the deceased is pleaded to have invested stock of the value of about 10,000l. sterling in the names of each of his four [364] younger children—placing them, therefore, upon an equality in this respect with the eldest, the daughter by the first wife. It is also pleaded that he had a child born in February, 1823, which died shortly afterwards. These papers, D, E, and F, themselves were laid aside and abandoned, so far as appears: and they are not suggested even to be of any legal validity.

It may not, however, be improper to consider whether the disposition contemplated by the deceased at that time, as appears from those papers, raises any thing of a probability in favour of the present disposition. In my opinion it does quite the reverse. It appears from these that the testator's intention then at least was not to give every thing to his wife absolutely and to consider his children provided for by what he had secured to them in his life time, but to limit his wife to a certain income for life; and to leave at her death a certain sum only (100,000l., three per cents.) at her disposal. And as the testator had not proceeded in the draft will, contained in papers D, E, and F, so far as to a disposition of the residue, it is almost necessarily to be inferred that the residue of his property was intended by the testator to be given among his children.

These different instruments, then, and the previous history, though rendering it highly probable that the deceased would alter his will of 1820 generally, yet lay no foundation of probability in favour of the particular disposition (purported to be carried into effect by means of the paper now propounded) of the whole personalty to the widow.

It is further to be observed that no previous testamentary declarations are suggested to have been made by [365] the deceased, tending to support the probability of any intended alteration of his will. He is pleaded to have been long in a declining state: yet no dissatisfaction with his existing will appears to have been expressed by him at any time in confidence to his friends, or otherwise; still less is any thing of an intention, in the event of his making a new will, to bequeath the whole of his vast personal property to his wife absolutely. Nothing, indeed, of a testamentary character, so far as appears, was either said or done by the deceased, from the time of his writing those loose papers in the beginning of 1823, which have already been spoken of, until within a very few hours of his death.

This brings me, then, to a consideration of the circumstances pleaded in the fifth article of this allegation, upon which alone the validity of the instrument propounded, if to be supported, must rest. It seems proper that the Court should read this fifth article in order to render the observations that it may have to make on the history contained in it fully intelligible.

[Here the judge read the fifth article of the allegation; (a) and partly in the course, and partly at the conclusion of the reading, observed to the following effect:—]

(a) The fifth article of the allegation was in the following words:—"That the said deceased being on his return to this country, as in the first article of this allegation is pleaded, and having been for many months previous in a declining state of health, became, on the night of the twenty-fourth day of August last, considerably worse, and about eight o'clock in the evening of the said day, about five hours preceding his death, fully sensible of his danger, he addressed himself to Louis Mazzara, a person who accompanied the said deceased on his journey, and said 'Mazzara, you must promise me that my body shall be transported to London after my death:' that thereupon the said Louis Mazzara promised the said deceased that his directions should be complied with; that the said deceased then said, 'I wish something to be given to poor William: this young man is very clever, and it may assist him,' meaning and intending thereby, William Woodley, his, the deceased's, servant; and he, the said deceased, spoke of giving the said William Woodley one thousand pounds, but gave no further directions as to the same, but enquired of the said Henrietta Montefiore, his wife, what the said William Woodley received per annum: that shortly after the premises just before pleaded a physician who was to pass the night with the said deceased arrived and almost immediately after ——— Martins, another physician, also visited the said deceased: that the said deceased thereupon called to him the said ——— Martins the physician and the aforesaid Louis Mazzara, and taking them both by the hands, addressed them in the French language, to the following purport and effect. 'My friends, I take you for witnesses that I made about four years ago'—that the said deceased then stopped and asked the said Louis Mazzara what the word 'will' was in French: that the said Louis Mazzara informed him that it was expressed by the word 'testament;' that the said deceased then said, 'yes, yes,' 'testament,' 'four years ago I made a will,' and addressing himself to the said ——— Martin, said 'yes, I made a will, but I do not wish it any longer, I do away with it, and I wish to make another.' And the party proponent doth further allege and propound that by the aforesaid expressions, he, the said deceased, meant and referred to the paper writing being the will, bearing date the third day of May, 1820, more particularly pleaded and referred to in the second article of this allegation, and that by the expressions he then used he, the deceased, meant to declare his intention to revoke the said will: that the said deceased then continued. 'I leave to my son Joseph, the farm at Worth Park; and to my son Nathaniel, the farm at Brighton:' that the said deceased was proceeding further to express his intentions with respect to the disposition of his property, when he was interrupted by the said ——— Martins, who observed, that it would be better to write down all that the said deceased dictated: that the said deceased thereupon replied, Mr. Martin is right; Mazzara, take paper and write down that. That the said Louis Mazzara having accordingly procured paper and set himself to write, in the presence and hearing of the said two physicians and William Woodley, desired the said deceased to repeat what he had before said respecting his two sons: that the said bequests were written down by the said Louis Mazzara in French, in the very words and being the very paper marked B; that the same was then read over by the said deceased himself, who, after having considered it for a short time, directed the said William Woodley to write it in English. That the said deceased

[366] The deceased is here then pleaded (as already said) to have been for many months previous in a declining state of health: and to have become "considerably worse" on the night of the 24th of August—and then [367] it is at eight o'clock in the evening, within five hours of his dissolution, that this transaction commences. Now it is highly probable, I think, a priori, on the face of this statement, that his capacity was impaired, and that [368] his mind was wandering even at the commencement of this transaction; a considerable time was occupied in its progress; and the deceased is admitted to have been in extremis before its actual termination. He begins with, not any expressed wish concerning the disposition of his property, but with a desire that his body after his death should be conveyed to England. Nor even after this does he advert to any intention of altering his will—but merely to "doing something" for a servant who was in attendance on him and whom he talks of [369] leaving 1000l. A physician who is to pass the night with him arrives, and soon after a second physician—when the deceased, then for the first time (taking one of these, and his friend Mr. Mazzara, by the hand) alludes to his former will, and says, "that he does not wish it to stand, &c." Now, that some wandering notion to that effect came across his mind at this time must be conceded; but that the deceased can be taken, from this part of the history, to have proceeded like a person in the full possession of his understanding, setting about making a new will, I am not at all disposed to admit. The deceased then begins expressing his wishes, "I leave my son Joseph, Worth Park farm, &c.;" but it is not the deceased who proposes that such, his wishes, shall be committed to writing—that is suggested by Martins, one of the physicians. The then dictated to the said William Woodley, and pursuant to such dictation the said William Woodley wrote in English the very words contained in the testamentary paper marked C, brought into and left in the registry of this Court for safe custody, on the part and behalf of the said Moses Montefiore, and now annexed to the affidavit of the said Moses Montefiore, and pleaded and propounded on the part and behalf of the said Henrietta Montefiore, except the words, 'This is my last will and testament;' which were added by the said William Woodley, of his own accord, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned: that after the said William Woodley had written the said paper, save and except the words, 'This is my last will and testament:' the said deceased had prayers read, and after the prayers were over the said William Woodley, under the impression that the said deceased had nothing more to add to the last mentioned paper, wrote the words, 'This is my last will and testament.' That the said William Woodley then read over the whole of what he had so written audibly and distinctly to the said deceased, who approved thereof, and then desired to be raised up in bed: that the said deceased was accordingly raised up in bed, and on the said paper writing being placed before him he made an attempt to take a pen and to write something on the said paper himself; but from his great bodily weakness and a convulsive seizure he was incapable of so doing; that the said deceased then requested to have some wine, which having taken, he desired that the paper so written by William Woodley should be again read over to him, which being accordingly done, he again asked for the pen, but the said deceased becoming more and more exhausted, and being, from continued convulsions, quite incapable of writing, he appeared to wish to say something, and uttered in English the word 'and' or 'I wish;' but at that very moment he was seized with a violent spasm, which affected the organ of speech, that he uttered several French and English words, the whole purport of which could not be comprehended by the persons who surrounded his death bed, but which evidently had reference to the paper written as hereinbefore pleaded by the said William Woodley, and which, together with the pen he repeatedly (after he had become speechless) made signs to have brought near to him: that the attention of the said deceased was entirely fixed to the said paper, and to the last moment of his life he shewed signs of wishing to do something to it. And the party proponent doth allege and propound that the said Abraham Montefiore the deceased was at and during all and singular the premises, of perfect, sound, and disposing mind, memory and understanding, and talked and discoursed rationally and sensibly, well knew and understood what he said and did, and what was said and done in his presence, and was fully capable of giving instructions for his last will and testament; although from bodily weakness he was incapable of fully executing the same. And this was and is true, &c."

deceased, however, assents; and directing Mazzara to procure a pen and ink, and take them down in writing, repeats his wishes as to the Worth Park and Brighton farms to Mazzara in the French language, which he understood so imperfectly as even to be at a loss for the French word for a testament or will. Mazzara takes down in French these purported devises of the Worth Park and Brighton farms; which the deceased, after reading over, directs his servant, Woodley, to write down in English.(a) The French paper is abandoned upon this—and Woodley writes the paper in question, from the deceased's [370] dictation—purporting to devise the real estates as above; and giving the personal property to his wife. Prayers are then read to the deceased, at whose suggestion does not very clearly appear from the plea—at the conclusion of which he, Woodley, thinking the deceased had nothing more to add, writes the words "This is my last will and testament," now appearing at the foot of the paper. The instrument itself is then read over to the deceased, who attempts to get up and sign it; but is prevented from so doing by a convulsive seizure—attempts to sign, that is, this imperfect paper; which it is hardly possible to suppose that the deceased, if he had had any degree of capacity at the time, could have thought that he had arrived at the conclusion of—being, as it is, without any provision for his children; without any legacy whatever, even to Woodley, although his intention to "do something" for Woodley seems to have first drawn his attention to the subject of his will; and without any appointment of either executors or trustees. And as to the writer of the paper, so far was he from thinking it concluded (although he had thought so, and under that impression had written the words "This is my last will") that he begins a new clause; he writes the letter "I," and a "w," the initial letter of the word "wish"—but he can make out nothing as to the wish of the deceased—who becomes, in effect, speechless at that time, though he still attempts to articulate, and soon after actually expires.

Now, looking at all the circumstances here stated, I am, in the first place, by no means satisfied that the deceased was of full capacity during any part of this transaction—or that the whole is not rather to be ascribed to the vague wanderings of a mind that had [371] survived its disposing powers, than to one in the full exercise of thought, judgment, and reflection. In the second place, I am by no means satisfied that, assuming for argument's sake, the deceased's full mental capacity at the inception, and even during the whole progress of this testamentary act, it had arrived at maturity as far as it goes: I am by no means satisfied that it was not (I much more incline to think that it was) his intention, having bequeathed the whole of the personalty to his wife, in the first instance, to make out of it provisions for his children, and probably other deductions; in manner as, I have said, is not uncommon with testators. But if such were his intention, to pronounce for this paper would be to defeat, and not to carry it into effect—the paper itself purporting to bequeath the whole property (the personalty) to his wife absolutely. What the deceased's precise testamentary views may have been I can only conjecture—he might probably have meant some distinction in favour of his second son: he might probably have meant to place his youngest daughter, who was born after the date of the executed will (which will must operate in the event of the Court pronouncing in effect against the paper now propounded by rejecting this allegation), upon an equal footing with her elder sisters. The Court indeed has no power of carrying these testamentary intentions of the deceased, if such they were, into full effect—the widow, however, may, if so disposed, as she is the residuary legatee under the executed will—and that the residue is so large in amount as to put this amply within her power, admits of no question.

The Court being of opinion that all the circumstances [372] pleaded in the allegation will not be sufficient, if proved to sustain the paper propounded, rejects the allegation.

(a) The paper so written by Mr. Mazzara was before the Court; and was in these words:

"Les derniers voluntiers de M. Abraham Montefiore ont été de laisser la ferme de Worth Park, a Joseph. A Nathaniel, Brighton ferme, et."

MONTAGUE v. MONTAGUE. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1824.—In a cause of divorce, where the alleged marriage is denied to be valid, the Court may probably permit third parties who have estates expectant, inter alia, upon the issue of such alleged marriage being illegitimate; and who consequently are interested in the question of its validity; to be cited to "see proceedings" in the cause, so far as relates to the marriage.

(On motion.)

This was a cause of divorce, instituted by the wife against the husband, by reason of adultery.

In the libel, as on this day brought in, on the part of the wife, the marriage of the parties at Gretna Green, according to the laws of Scotland, was very especially pleaded (a)[1]—and the prayer of the libel, in the first instance, was that it might be pronounced a good and valid marriage, agreeably to the laws and customs of Scotland, in order to found the sentence of separation further prayed in the libel.

The husband was now said to be tenant for life of large real estates; entailed or limited under the will of an uncle—first, to his own issue male; and on failure of such issue male (as also, in the then further event, of his not disposing of the said estates, either by deed or will), secondly, to his two sisters, Miss E. A. W. Montague, and a Mrs. Crawford. The parties to the marriage pleaded were also said to have issue living three children.

Under these circumstances it was submitted that, as the sisters had an expectant estate on the children [373] of the marriage pleaded being illegitimate, they had an interest in the validity or invalidity of the alleged marriage. It was therefore prayed (principally it should seem in anticipation that the husband's possible defence might be a denial of the marriage) that the sisters should be cited to "see proceedings" in the cause, so far as related to the marriage pleaded to have been had between the parties.

In support of the motion the counsel for the wife principally relied on the precedent in the case of Chichester v. Donegal (see 1 Add. 5); which they maintained was a case not to be distinguished from the present, in point of general principle. They also contended that, as no objection was raised, or was meant to be, on behalf of the parties proposed to be cited by the one party principal, the wife; it was scarcely competent to the other party principal, the alleged husband, to be heard, in objection to the issue of a decree of the nature of that now prayed.

On the contrary, it was insisted, on the part of the husband, that the application, notwithstanding the alleged precedent, was actually unprecedented—that of Donegal v. Donegal (1 Add. 5) being a suit of "nullity of marriage;" in which suit the marriage is the principal, or rather the sole, point at issue; whilst in a suit like the present, the marriage, though necessary to be pleaded and proved, is a point merely incidental, or preparatory only, to the principal issue in the cause. It was monstrous, too, as they held, to imagine that a sentence either for or against the marriage in such a suit would have the slightest obligatory effect on third [374] parties, though cited to "see proceedings" relative to it. Consequently that such a decree, in the end, would be unproductive of any benefit to the wife or children—whilst its issue in the meantime would be extremely injurious to the husband; by the introduction, namely, of additional parties into the cause, who might probably at least much protract and impede, and to his infinite cost and vexation, any determination of the preliminary question. At all events, that the motion was premature; and founded in statements not duly verified.

The Court said that it was disposed to reject the application at present, as made on mere verbal suggestions with respect to family settlements, &c., before an issue given, and even before the admission of the libel, in the cause. At the same time, especially as with reference to and under sanction of, a proceeding similar to that now prayed in the cause of Donegal v. Donegal, it should probably be inclined to accede to it, if duly repeated, in a proper stage of the cause—especially in the event of the husband's giving a general negative issue to the libel, and consequently denying the marriage.

Motion (at present) rejected.(a)[2]

[375] MONTAGUE v. MONTAGUE. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1824.—A valid marriage between parties may be had, by their consent per verba de præsenti, in Scotland, such parties being respectively above the age of pupillage, without either banns or license, and without the intervention of any religious ceremony.—The public cohabitation of parties as husband and wife, in Scotland, is presumptive proof that they are validly married; and becomes conclusive evidence of such, their marriage, in the event of its not being distinctly proved that "they did not intend" to contract matrimony.—A certificate so purporting to be, of a Gretna Green marriage, is not pleadable, quâ certificate, as in proof of that marriage; but it may be, as a constituent, wholly or in part, of the marriage; accompanied by averments (to be sustained by evidence) of such being its effect, in and by the law of Scotland.

(On the admission of the libel.)

This was a suit of separation, â mensa et thoro, by reason of adultery, instituted by Margaret Green Montague, the wife, against the husband, George Conway Montague.

The first article of the libel pleaded—that, by the laws, immemorial usages, and customs of Scotland, a valid marriage between a man and woman may, by their consent per verba de præsenti, be contracted by them in that kingdom; such man and woman being respectively above the age of pupillage; (a)[1] without any banns published or licence had; and without the intervention of any religious ceremony—and, that the acknowledgment by the parties of each other as husband and wife, and their public cohabitation as such, is, by the laws, usages, and customs aforesaid, presumptive proof that such parties are validly married; and the same is taken to be conclusive evidence of their marriage; unless it be distinctly proved that they did not intend to contract marriage—and, that no consent of [376] parents or guardians is necessary to the validity of a marriage between persons both above the age of pupillage, by the laws, usages, and customs aforesaid.

2. That, in the months of August, September, &c., 1803, all, some, or one of them, G. C. Montague, then a bachelor, aged twenty-seven years, and free from all matrimonial contracts and engagements, paid his addresses to M. G. Wilson, then a spinster, aged seventeen years, and free from all matrimonial contracts and engagements—that they, the said parties, mutually agreeing to become husband and wife, went to Scotland, for the purpose of intermarrying there—and, on the 29th day of December, 1803, in the presence of divers credible witnesses at Gretna Green, in the kingdom of Scotland, mutually acknowledged each other to be husband and wife, and were validly joined together in matrimony, according to a form of celebrating marriage occasionally used in the said kingdom; (a)[2] and, that the marriage so had and celebrated was, and is, a valid marriage, according to the laws, immemorial usages, and customs of Scotland.

5. The fifth article of the libel pleaded that the parties consummated their said marriage, and lived and cohabited together, in Scotland [at Edinburgh], as husband and wife, till the end of March, 1804, [377] during which time they constantly owned note appended at the foot of the next case.] But the project of citing the sisters to "see proceedings" seems to have been abandoned by the wife—as the motion, at present, rejected by the Court, was not repeated on the part of the wife; although the judge had intimated, as above, his probable intention of acceding to it, if it had been repeated.

(a)[1] "Which, by the law of Scotland, is the age of fourteen years in males, and twelve years in females." These words were inserted after the word "pupillage," on an objection taken that the libel should have stated what the age of pupillage is by the law of Scotland.

(a)[2] For these words "according to a form of celebrating marriage, occasionally used in the said kingdom," were substituted in the libel, as reformed "by Joseph Paisley, who, upon that occasion, read, in the presence of the said G. C. Montague, and the said M. G. Montague, formerly Wilson, the office for matrimony contained in the liturgy of the Church of England, as by law established." It had been objected that the original pleading was too indefinite; and that the party was bound to describe the form.

and acknowledged each other as husband and wife; and were commonly accounted, reputed, and taken to be such by and amongst their friends, acquaintance, neighbours, and others. And,

8. The eighth article pleaded that, at the time of the marriage of the parties pleaded as above, he the said G. C. Montague "obtained a written certificate (a) of his said marriage from Joseph Paisley, the person who celebrated the same at Gretna Green aforesaid, which said certificate,(b) he the said G. C. Montague preserved, and had frequently shewn to divers persons of credit and reputation, upon one occasion as lately as the month of May, 1823;" and that "the said certificate (c) was still in the custody, power, or possession of the said G. C. Montague."

Of this libel the first and second articles were objected to, in certain particulars, which produced a reform of the articles in those particulars, under the direction of the Court, as specified in the margin. The fifth was unopposed. But the main objections were addressed to the eighth article, as pleading, sub modo, a certificate, inadmissible in evidence. In support of this objection the husband's counsel chiefly relied on a late cause, that of Nokes v. Milward,(d) in which a similar certificate had been rejected; and repeated and re-adduced the principles and authorities adverted to by the learned judge in that cause, in support of his [378] rejection of the certificate. Upon these grounds they contended that this article of the allegation was altogether inadmissible.

For the wife it was submitted, in answer to this, that the certificate in the case of Nokes v. Milward was pleaded, alio intuitu; not as the constituent, in any sense, of a marriage, but in proof of a marriage otherwise constituted; in which character they admitted it not to be pleadable. But where pleaded, either wholly or in part, as a constituent of the marriage at issue (accompanied with an averment, to be sustained by evidence, of such being its effect in, and by, that law, which was ultimately to determine its validity), as in this instance, they maintained it to be clearly pleadable; and to have been so held, impliedly at least, by the learned judge, who determined the cause of Nokes v. Milward itself. Here the acknowledgment of each other as husband and wife by the parties, and their public cohabitation, as such (pleaded in the fifth article, which was not objected to), was pleaded, in the first article, to be, of itself, a valid marriage by the laws and customs of Scotland. Non constat but that this certificate was, it most probably was, an acknowledgment of each other, by the parties, as husband and wife, of the most authentic character; and so, of itself, not the proof, but the actual constituent, in part, of a marriage between the parties; in the event of their cohabitation as husband and wife being proved, as pleaded in the fifth article, and of the laws and customs of Scotland being also proved, as pleaded in the first article of the libel. So that, granting it to be inadmissible quâ certificate, it was clearly an instrument pleadable in this last character; and being expressly so pleaded in the [379] possession, or under the control, of the other litigant, it was competent to the party to plead it, on general principles, as in the article of the allegation, now objected to.

Court—Sir Christopher Robinson. I am quite of opinion, on the principles and authorities adduced, that the paper referred to in this article of the allegation is inadmissible quâ certificate, and that it ought not even to be so styled in the pleadings. But taking it to be, what it may not improbably amount to, a declaration, under the hands of the parties, of their mutual acknowledgment of each other as husband and wife, would it not be admissible in that character, in conjunction with the facts, and the law pleaded in this allegation? I think that it would; and, consequently, that this article of the plea, with a slight alteration, for the reason suggested, in the form of pleading, is entitled to stand. Should the instrument, on its production by the husband, not turn out to be what I have said that it probably is, the counsel for the husband will have the benefit of insisting upon this, or any other, topic in favour of the husband, arising from the appearance of the instrument, in a future stage of the cause; as permitting it to be pleaded in this form determines nothing with respect to its ultimate effect in the cause.

[380] THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH against THE MARCHIONESS OF WESTMEATH. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1824.—The Court, if prayed, will direct its officer to attend with the papers in a cause, at the trial of an indictment preferred by one of the two litigant parties, against certain witnesses examined on behalf of the other, for a conspiracy to sustain, by false oaths, the case of that other. And, upon their conviction ensuing, it will permit this to be pleaded, in exception to the testimony of such witnesses.

[See further, 1826, 2 Hagg. Ecc. Supp. 1.]

(On motion.)

This was a cause of restitution of conjugal rights, promoted by the most noble George Thomas John, Marquess of Westmeath, against the most noble Emily Ann Bennett Elizabeth, Marchioness of Westmeath.

In answer to the libel, which was in common form, her ladyship gave an allegation pleading cruelty and adultery, which produced a second allegation on behalf of the marquess. Evidence had been taken on these several allegations; and stood "for publication," at the prayer of both parties.

The proctor for the marquess now brought in an affidavit, made by his lordship, and prayed the judge to direct certain exhibits annexed to his allegation to be attended with in Dublin, on the first of January ensuing, for the purpose stated in such affidavit, viz. to be produced at the trial of an indictment preferred by his lordship, in Dublin, against certain parties, witnesses in the cause, for a conspiracy, to sustain the commission of adultery (alleged in the cause) by the said marquess, with a certain female in Ireland.

[381] The Judge, after decreeing "publication," directed that the exhibits should be attended with by the officer of the Court as prayed—and, at the same time, at the prayer of the proctor of the marchioness, further directed that such other papers and evidence in the cause as might be deemed requisite should also be produced by the said officer at the same time and place.(a)[2]

(a)[1] To this plea, as reformed, a general negative issue being given on the part of the husband, it became incumbent on the wife, in the first instance, to prove her libel, so far as related to the marriage pleaded and propounded in the cause. This she, accordingly, proceeded to do—and the question at issue between the parties, so far as [380] regarded the marriage propounded, came to a hearing in Trinity Term (8th July), 1825; when the judge held that the marriage was proved to have been had, as pleaded, and was also proved to be, as pleaded, a good and valid marriage by the laws of Scotland—whereupon he pronounced, decreed, and declared the said parties to be lawful husband and wife.

(a)[2] The papers, generally, in the cause were accordingly attended with, in Dublin, by the officer of the Court, as severally prayed by the parties. Of the result it is sufficient to say (so far as respects the suit depending in this Court) that, on the first session of Trinity Term [1825], the proctor for the marquess brought in an allegation (which was admitted by the Court) pleading "that no faith or credit was due to the depositions of three witnesses (by name) examined on the allegation, wherein the said marquess was charged to have committed adultery with a certain female, named Ann Connell—and further pleading that, in the month of November preceding, the said marquess had preferred a bill of indictment, in Dublin, against the said three witnesses, and others, for conspiring and combining together to maintain and establish by false oaths that he, the said marquess, had committed adultery with the said female—that on trial the said three witnesses were found guilty; that, thereupon, one of the said three witnesses was sentenced to pay a fine of 20l., and each of the other two a fine of one mark; and further, that all three were sentenced to be imprisoned in his majesty's gaol of Newgate, in Dublin, for eighteen calendar months."

A copy of the record of conviction (pleaded to be a true copy, &c.) was exhibited, annexed to this allegation.

The principal cause in which these proceedings were had is still unheard.

Had the bill of indictment been preferred in this country, the object of this motion

[382] ORME v. ORME. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1824.—The Ecclesiastical Court can only interfere, in the way of restitution, where matrimonial cohabitation is suspended. The single duty which it can enforce by its decree in a suit of this nature is that of married parties "living together:" it cannot attempt to enforce any in super-addition to this. Hence, it is incompetent to the wife to sue the husband, or the husband the wife, for "restitution of conjugal rights," pending cohabitation.

(On the admission of the libel.)

This was a suit, brought by the wife against the husband, for restitution of conjugal rights.

The libel was in common form, mutatis mutandis, save and except in the fourth article, which pleaded that "the said Robert Orme (the husband), being unmindful of his conjugal vow, had, ever since his arrival in England, in the year 1821 (as pleaded in a former article), without any lawful cause, withdrawn, and still did withdraw, himself from bed, board, and mutual cohabitation with the said Margaret Orme (the wife); and had refused, and still did refuse, to render conjugal rights to her—and that the said Margaret Orme, though allowed by the said Robert Orme to reside in the same house with him, was denied access to his person and bed; and refused common necessaries for her support and maintenance."

In objection to the admission of the libel it was said that this was an attempt to enforce matrimonial intercourse, as distinguished from matrimonial cohabitation, for which there was no precedent—that Courts never interfered in the way of restitution but where matrimonial cohabitation was suspended; that the only restitution of conjugal rights to the wife by the husband, or vice versâ, which an Ecclesiastical Court could make by its decree in a suit of this nature, was by compelling them to cohabit; consequently, that it was incompetent to married parties to sue either the other [383] as for restitution of conjugal rights, they, the parties, already cohabiting. The words of the decree, in such suits as the present, are that the husband shall "take the wife home and treat her with conjugal affection:" there is no instance of a decree in such a suit that he "shall treat the wife with conjugal affection;" she, the wife, being at home. The only remedy which the law affords to either of two married parties, in case of ill treatment by the other, is a proceeding for a separation â mensa et thoro, as by reason of cruelty: and if the conduct of the party complained of fails to amount to legal cruelty, the complainant, however harshly or injuriously treated, is still without legal redress.

On the other hand, it was submitted that, though the Court had no means of regulating matrimonial intercourse in minor points, where the great duties of matrimony were performed, still, that it had authority to interfere in the description of the case laid in the libel; where no one of those duties was fulfilled by the party complained of, save and except that of mere cohabitation, or living in the same house, with the complainant. And this was attempted to be made out by reference to a proceeding of the Court of Arches in a late cause, that of Gill v. Gill,(a) in which the dean refused to dismiss a husband who had taken his wife home, in obedience to a decree of the Court, in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, made in the usual form, as above, on the distinct ground of his non-compliance with that other part of the decree which enjoined him to "treat her with conjugal affection." Hence, [384] it was inferred that the Court might enforce the latter, notwithstanding the subsistence of the former: if the Court can regulate matrimonial intercourse after cohabitation restored, why not as well, it was said, before it is suspended?

Judgment—Sir Christopher Robinson. I think the objection taken to this libel is well founded; it sets up a case either altogether without the jurisdiction of the Court, or one, at least, very far transgressing those bounds of interference to which it has restricted itself in modern practice. The parties are admitted to be actually cohabiting; and, being so, it is, in my judgment, quite incompetent to the Court to interpose between them in the manner, and upon the grounds, now prayed. No instance of a libel, so framed as the present, in a cause of restitution of conjugal rights is even pretended on the part of the wife. The case of Gill v. Gill, cited, I might, probably, have been attained by a "subpœna duces tecum" served on the officer of the Court without any special application to, or order of, the Court itself.

presume, as the nearest, is very far from being strictly in point. The husband had been decreed there in the usual form (that suit commencing by a libel in the usual form) to "take his wife home, and treat her with conjugal affection;" and, moreover, to "certify his obedience to the decree on a given day:" as the usual and necessary preliminary step to his dismissal from the effect of the original citation. On that day a certificate was tendered by the husband; in objection to the receipt of which the wife prayed, and was permitted, to be heard "on her petition:" and it clearly appearing in the result, namely, on the facts disclosed in that petition, fully sustained by affidavits, that although the wife had taken herself home (for so it appeared) in the absence [385] of the husband, still, that the husband on his return, though without actually ejecting her, had treated her in a manner certainly evincing any thing but "conjugal affection," under circumstances, the particulars of which were specified by the wife in her petition, and constituted, as there laid, a case of great hardship, the Court did refuse then to dismiss the husband; but directed him to certify over, as above, on a future day; when his certificate not being objected to, he was, ipso facto, dismissed. But this is far short of a precedent for the institution, de novo, of a suit for restitution of conjugal rights on grounds, similar to the present, of the wife not being treated by the husband with conjugal affection—the cohabitation of the parties neither being, nor ever having been, suspended, that I am aware of. Matrimonial intercourse may be broken off on considerations (of health, for instance, and there may be other) with which it is quite incompetent to this Court to interfere. As to that other charge of the wife being "denied common necessaries" by the husband, this, however proper in the libel, in a cause of divorce by reason of cruelty, is improper and unprecedented in the libel in a cause of this description. The precedent sought to be established would lead to an infinity of suits, in no one of which the Court could embark with any reasonable prospect of satisfying or doing justice between the parties—and, so thinking, I hold that I am bound to reject the libel.

Libel rejected.

[386] NOKES v. MILWARD, FALSELY CALLING HERSELF NOKES. Consistory Court of Rochester, Michaelmas Term, 1824.—In a cause of nullity of marriage, the alleged fact of marriage, of the legal nullity of which a declaratory sentence is prayed, must be duly proved; in which part of his case, if the plaintiff fails, it is the duty of the Court to withhold its declaratory sentence of nullity; how clearly soever all the several facts may be established in evidence upon which, had the marriage itself been established by similar evidence, a sentence declaratory of its nullity might well have been founded.—This, at least, is the rule where the plaintiff and defendant respectively are the alleged contracting parties.

This was a proceeding to annul a marriage, by reason that one of the two contracting parties, the female, was another man's wife at the time of its celebration. But the Court refused to pronounce a declaratory sentence of nullity, as thinking the marriage, in respect of which a sentence to that effect was prayed, not duly proved.

Judgment—Dr. Swabey. This is a suit in which Mr. John Nokes, of the parish of Woolwich, in the county of Kent, and diocese of Rochester, is the plaintiff, and a female described in the proceedings as "Rosa Milward, wife of Luke James Milward, falsely calling herself Rosa Nokes, wife of the said John Nokes," is the defendant. The plaintiff's object in the suit is to obtain a sentence declaratory of the nullity of a fact of marriage alleged to have been had between him and the defendant, in Scotland, in the month of October, 1822; she, the defendant, then (and still) being, as pleaded, the wife of Luke James Milward.

The libel, the only plea which has been given in in the cause, and none of the witnesses upon which have been cross-examined, first pleads that the defendant, [387] then Rosa Ward, widow, was lawfully married to Luke James Milward, then a bachelor, in the parish church of Islington, in the county of Middlesex, on the third of October, 1821. A copy of the register of the said marriage is then exhibited; and the signatures thereto, Rosa Ward and Luke James Milward, are alleged to be of the proper hand-writing, respectively of the parties so married. It is also pleaded that the said parties consummated their said marriage; and cohabited, were reputed, and mutually acknowledged each other, as husband and wife until in or about the month of July, 1822. The libel then pleads that at or about that time the wife separated herself from the husband, and went to reside at Margate; where she assumed the names and description of Rosa Haden, widow: by which names, and under which description, she was introduced to, and formed a connexion with, Mr. John Nokes, party in the cause; and that, subsequently, she the said Rosa Milward was married to the said John Nokes, in manner as pleaded, at Gretna Green in Scotland, in the month of October, 1822, living the said Luke James Milward—of the nullity of which alleged marriage, as I have already said, it is the plaintiff's object in this suit to procure a declaratory sentence.

Now that the present defendant is the identical female so married to the said Luke James Milward, as pleaded in the libel; and that the said Luke James Milward was living in, and subsequent to, the month of October, 1822, the date of her alleged marriage, de facto, with the plaintiff in the cause, as also pleaded, it may be sufficient to state once for all that I am satisfied [388] upon the present evidence. But, in my judgment, something still remains to be proved, in order to found the sentence prayed. Where the sentence prayed is a sentence declaratory of the nullity of an alleged marriage, that alleged marriage itself, at least in ordinary cases, surely requires especially to be proved. If then the plaintiff has failed in this part of his case, namely, in the proof of that marriage of the nullity of which he prays a sentence, it is still the duty of the Court, in my judgment, to withhold its sentence of nullity; how clearly soever all the several facts may be established in evidence upon which, had the marriage itself been established by similar evidence, a sentence of nullity might well have been founded.

Let us see then, first, what, in particular, are the pleadings as to the alleged fact of marriage between the plaintiff and defendant in this cause; and, secondly, what is the proof.

The libel pleads (art. 4) that a marriage between the defendant (then, and still, Rosa Milward, wife of Luke James Milward, but passing by the names and description of Rosa Haden, widow) and John Nokes, the plaintiff, was had and solemnized, or rather prophaned, at Gretna, in the parish of Springfield in the shire of Dumfries, and in that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland, on or about the 24th day of October, 1822; and that they the said parties then and there acknowledged each other as husband and wife respectively, in the presence of divers credible witnesses, who, together with the said parties, signed their names to a "certificate" of the said marriage. And it then pleads (art. 5) a certain paper writing or exhibit, marked B, [389] annexed to the libel to be, and contain, that identical "certificate."

Such are the pleadings as to this essential part of the case. And here it may be convenient that the Court, as in the first instance, should dispose of the exhibit, purporting to be, and contain, a "certificate" of this marriage, before it proceeds to consider the proofs, if any, furnished by witnesses examined in support of it.

I would first, however, observe that the pleadings themselves as to this essential part of the case are in the highest degree vague and unsatisfactory. It is first pleaded that a marriage was had or prophaned between the parties—a marriage—but what kind or description of marriage; whether by or without the intervention of any, or if of any, of what, religious ceremony, and whether valid or otherwise by the law of Scotland, and so on, the very pleadings are silent about. It is then pleaded that the parties mutually acknowledged each other as husband and wife in the presence of witnesses, at this place, Gretna; which acknowledgment, the Court has been told of itself constitutes a valid marriage, by the law of Scotland. But the Court knows nothing of this, at least judicially; nor can take counsel's word, which is all that it has for this. It should have been so pleaded; accompanied with an averment, to be sustained by evidence, that such was its effect by the law of Scotland. It could hardly be that evidence taken upon a plea so constructed in this part of it as the present could amount to any such proof of the marriage sought to be annulled as would justify this Court in proceeding, as by its sentence, to annul it. But to the proofs.

[390] The exhibit in question, marked B, is in these words:

B.

Kingdom of Scotland.
County of Dumfries.
Parish of Gretna.

These are to certify, to all whom it may concern, that John Nokes, from the parish of Chatham, in the county of Kent, and Rosa Haden, from the parish of St. Maries, in the county of Nottingham, being both here now present, and having declared to me that they are single persons, but have now been married conformable to the laws of the Church of England, and agreeable to the kirk of Scotland.

As witness our hands at Springfield, this 4th day of October, 1822.

Witness me, DAVID LANG.
Witness, Jane Rae. JOHN NOKES.
John Ainslie. ROSA HADEN.

Now that a certificate of this description is any proof whatever of the marriage which it purports to certify, the Court has still to learn. It would have rejected this fifth article of the libel with its accompanying exhibit altogether, had the libel itself been submitted to it in the outset of the cause: and although, from this circumstance of the libel not having been objected to by counsel for the defendant, the certificate in [391] question remains an exhibit in the cause, and claims as such to be noticed by the Court; still the arguments of the plaintiff's counsel have failed to induce the Court to regard that certificate as any proof whatsoever of a marriage between this plaintiff and the defendant. Even the certificate of the King himself under his sign manual is, it is well known, no evidence of a mere fact (a)[1] (much less is the certificate, so styled, of a private individual, without any designation of character or office which is the description of this exhibit), on the broad principle that "in judicio non creditur nisi juratis." It is to be remembered all along that this certificate is exhibited as a proof of the alleged marriage; not, in any sense, as a constituent of it—which precludes any consideration of what might have been its effect if introduced, eo intuitu, into the cause. If this exhibit was meant to have been offered to the Court as a constituent, either wholly or in part, of the marriage in question, it should have been pleaded to have been such, as I have said, in quite another form; accompanied with an averment, to be sustained by evidence, that such was its effect by the laws, customs, and usages of Scotland.

It is upon this same principle that certificates tendered in proof of irregular marriages had in this country (for instance, of Fleet marriages, which, though irregular marriages, were still valid marriages, prior to the marriage act of 26 Geo. II. c. 33), have often been rejected by Courts of Common Law.(b)[1] And the Court, in the course of the hearing, referred, though not [392] by name, to a case in 1763, in which a certificate of a Scotch marriage, pleaded in proof of that marriage, as in this instance, was rejected by Dr. Bettesworth, sitting in the Consistory Court of London.

The name of that case I have since ascertained to be Owen, the Mother, and Testamentary Guardian, of Small v. Spence.(a)[2] In that case, which, like the present, was a suit of nullity of marriage, Dr. Harris objected to the certificate of Dr. Grant being received in proof of a marriage certified to have been had between the minor and the defendant, at the Red Lion Inn, in Edinburgh; contending, that no such certificate was admissible as evidence, on the principle already explained. It was said in answer to this by Dr. Hay that the minor had signed it, and that the certificate would be proved to have been actually given. The Court, however, sustained the objection taken by Dr. Harris, and rejected the exhibit; admitting the rest of the allegation to proof.

The Court has been furnished, indeed, with an earlier case, that of Wescombe v. Dods,(b)[2] in which [393] a certificate of this description should seem to have been

(a)[2] Consistory of London, 2nd of July, 1763, before Dr. Bettesworth.

(b)[2] Consistory of London, Easter Term, 1748. In this cause a libel was given in on the 13th of May, 1748, by William Wescombe, bachelor, against Rebecca Dods, spinster, alleging that she falsely reported herself to be contracted in matrimony with him.

On the first session of Trinity Term, 1748, an allegation was given in by Rebecca Dods pleading in substance—

Art. 1. That in October, November, and December, 1740, William Wescombe paid his addresses to her.

2. That they were married 26th of March, 1741, in the house of James Dow, admitted by the Consistory Court of London. But the cause of Wescombe v. Dods was a "jactitation cause" (not a suit of nullity of marriage, to which description of cause, not improbably, different considerations may apply in this particular); and the libel in Wescombe v. Dods might, like that in the present cause, have been admitted to proof unopposed by counsel. What weight or effect, if any, was attached to it by the Court at the final hearing of that cause does not appear. True it is, again, that in the case of Compton v. Bearcroft,(a) a suit, like this, too, of nullity of marriage, a [394] certificate perfectly similar to the present was annexed to the libel, as urged by the plaintiff's counsel: but the libel in Compton v. Bearcroft was opposed by counsel for the defendant, and was rejected by the Court, in toto; so that its being annexed to the libel in that case is no proof whatever of the admissibility of such a certificate in evidence.

The Court, having thus disposed of the "certificate," will now proceed to consider what is the proof by any witness who can depose of his own knowledge to the fact of any marriage whatever (whether good or otherwise by the law of Scotland) having been celebrated in Scotland between the parties to this suit; which, by the libel, is pleaded to have been had in the presence of "divers witnesses," to this, however, the single witness examined is John Ainslie; and what is the effect of his testimony?

This witness, Ainslie, says, in substance, "that he was, and still is, a postboy at the Bush Inn, at Carlisle—that one morning, about eighteen months before, as nearly as he can recollect the time, he was desired by the ostler to get ready a chaise and pair, to proceed with a lady and gentleman, who had arrived at Carlisle that morning by the London mail, to Gretna, meaning to Gretna Green, in the parish of Springfield, and shire of Dumfries, in Scotland, distant about eleven miles from Carlisle—that accordingly he prepared a chaise, [395] in which a lady and gentleman, neither of whom he had ever seen before, were by him, the witness, driven to Gretna, and alighted at a small inn, called the Queen's Head, kept by one James Rae—that he, the witness, went with his horses into the yard, where the landlady, Mrs. Rae, presently came and desired the ostler, in his presence and hearing, to 'go for the parson'—that shortly after he saw one David Lang, whom he had known for many years, as officiating 'on similar occasions,' arrive at the inn, and accompanied him into a room near the kitchen, where they sat down together and had a good deal of talk—that the parson, Lang, was then summoned by the landlady to the 'gentleman up stairs,' where his, the deponent's, presence was also required in about three-quarters of an hour or an hour after by the said landlady, whom the witness followed accordingly into a room up gardener, at Castlebarns near Edinburgh, in presence of ——— Dow, spinster, Margaret King and others, by David Patterson, a minister of the Established Kirk of Scotland, according to the ceremony of marriage of the said Established Presbyterian Scotch kirk, of which the said Rebecca Dods was a member.

3. Article three exhibited, in supply of proof, a certificate under the hand of the said David Patterson, and pleaded the hand-writing of Patterson; and that it was the usual form of certificates of marriage, solemnized by ministers of the Scotch kirk, and the identity of the parties.

4. Pleaded consummation at the house of George Blyth.

5. Pleaded confessions of the husband to George Blyth and others.

6. The birth and baptism of a child.

7. That the husband soon left the wife.

8. That shortly afterwards he wrote her a letter, subscribed "your loving husband."

9. Exhibited that letter.

10. That married women in Scotland are addressed (as in that letter) by their maiden names.

11. Was the formal concluding article.

This allegation was signed, THOMAS SALUSBURY.

(a) Arches, 16th February, 1767. Delegates, 4th February, 1769. The certificate, pleaded in the 7th article of the libel, was as follows:—"This is to certify that I married, after the manner of the Church of England, Edward Bearcroft and Maria Caroline Compton, at Dumfries, 13th March, 1760.

"R. JAMIESON, Minister of the English Chapel, at Dumfries.

"(Witness) Thomas English, Thomas Huddleston."

one pair of stairs, in which he found David Lang, and the lady and gentleman whom he had driven from Carlisle—that, the room door being shut, Lang desired the lady and gentleman to stand up; and the deponent and Mrs. Rae also standing up, then proceeded to repeat (or apparently to read from a book in his hand) something, of which the deponent can only say that a part was like what is read by clergymen in solemnizing marriages in churches in England—that during the same, Lang, the parson, placed a ring on one of the lady's fingers, at the tip, which the gentleman applied his hand to and slipped further down the finger—lastly, that at one part of the ceremony the said lady and gentlemen respectively acknowledged each other as husband and wife." The witness then speaks to his having signed the certificate (a part of his evidence [396] which the Court will dispense to itself with reciting, as being disposed to reject the certificate altogether, further than merely to observe that it is extremely slight and unsatisfactory; especially in that the deponent, who describes himself as a poor "scholar with respect to reading or writing," is unable to depose any thing specific as to the signature of that instrument by the parties to the alleged contract; (a)) after which, [397] having received orders to get his horses ready, he put to and drove the said lady and gentleman back to the Bush Inn at Carlisle. The deponent says that he has seen no more of either of the parties until quite recently; when a person, a stranger to him, and whom he did not recollect ever to have seen before, came to him at Carlisle and introduced himself as Mr. John Nokes, whom he, the deponent, had driven with a young lady to Gretna Green about eighteen months before, and bespoke his attendance in London to be examined as a witness in this cause. The deponent afterwards states himself to have seen the same person two or three times here in London; and he speaks to his belief of the identity of that person with the gentleman of whose marriage at Gretna Green, in 1822, he has previously been deposing, and with Mr. John Nokes, party in this cause.

Such, in substance, is the testimony of the single witness who can depose of his own knowledge to any fact of marriage between the parties in the cause: and it is, in my judgment, obviously of itself far short of furnishing any such proof of a marriage as will sustain the prayer of the libel that it may be pronounced null and void. Nor is this lack of primary evidence at all compensated for by any secondary proof in the cause; as of consummation, cohabitation, mutual acknowledgments, &c. For even granting such secondary proof to be admissible in the case, which is very doubtful (it being a case brought inter vivos, and by the one against the other contracting party), save only in corroboration of other and more direct testimony—namely, that of persons present (there being persons still living vouched [398] to have been (a) This part of the witness's deposition was—"That, after the ceremony was over, Lang, the parson, said to Mrs. Rae and deponent, 'Here, you will sign the certificate' (pointing to a paper writing which the witness had before said that he observed lying on a table when he first entered the room) on which deponent and Mrs. Rae subscribed their names as witnesses; which he so did, without reading the same—that he believed it at the time to be a certificate of the marriage of which he has before deposed; but he does not recollect whether the parties, or either of them, signed the said certificate in his presence, or whether their names (as sometimes happened on similar occasions) appeared already on the certificate when the deponent signed his name thereto—and they, the deponent and Mrs. Rae, having, as witnesses, subscribed their names to the said certificate, Lang, the parson, lapped it up and gave the same to the lady." And, at the conclusion of his deposition this witness, after verifying the certificate, as by the signature, "John Ainslie" being of his hand-writing, says "that he does not recollect whether it was subscribed in his presence by the parties" purported to have been married.

Upon this evidence it should seem that the paper in question would have been no proof, strictly taken, of a written acknowledgment of each other by the parties as husband and wife in Scotland: for non constat when or where it was so subscribed by the parties, though the signatures "John Nokes" and "Rosa Haden" were proved by other evidence to be, respectively, in the hand-writing of the parties. Consequently, it should seem that it would not materially have assisted the proof of an acknowledgment by the parties of each other as husband and wife in Scotland; even supposing this to constitute a valid marriage by the law of Scotland, which, that it did, was not pleaded even, nor was the Court at all judicially informed.

present) at the alleged fact of marriage—yet still, of the little of such secondary proof as appears in the cause, the whole is extra-libellate, and so, strictly speaking, is no proof; for with the taking leave by the parties of the postboy on their return to Carlisle the part of the plaintiff's case as laid in the libel absolutely ends. No consummation, no cohabitation, no mutual acknowledgments beyond such as are alleged to have formed a part of the ceremony are averred in the plea; so that the whole, I repeat, of what little is said by the witnesses as to either of these particulars, incidentally, is extra-libellate. And here, again, with respect to these omissa in the pleadings, the Court may observe by the way that, although a fact of marriage celebrated in England, in facie ecclesiæ, by a priest or minister in holy orders, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England; and perhaps a Scotch marriage, howsoever contracted, may be good, though it should not have been followed by consummation, or cohabitation, or mutual acknowledgments of each other by the parties respectively as husband and wife; yet it recollects no case where these have been omitted to be pleaded, except the present, from whatever cause, in regard to the second marriage only—as to which it should seem that they ought especially to have been pleaded, in order that the defendant might have the opportunity (whether she availed herself of it or not) of making that species of defence suggested by the nature of her case, from the almost total absence of any proof by witnesses who could speak to the alleged fact of marriage from their own personal knowledge—the only evidence, probably, [399] after all, as to such a marriage upon which the Court would have been justified to itself in pronouncing that alleged fact of marriage null and void.

Upon this view of the case, the Court, I think, is bound to pronounce that the plaintiff has failed in proof of his libel; and, consequently, is bound to dismiss the defendant. It is first necessary, however, to advert briefly to one or two cases, cited by the counsel for the plaintiff, in which an Ecclesiastical Court has proceeded to a sentence of nullity without full proof of the marriage declared null by its sentence—being supposed precedents by which they have recommended this Court to be guided in disposing of the present suit; in the event of its not conceiving the marriage in question so established in evidence as to justify it in declaring that marriage to be null and void, upon higher and more legitimate grounds.

The cases cited were those of Heseltine v. Murray, Fust v. Bowerman, and Watson v. Faremouth; in each of which, the Court in which the suit was depending pronounced a marriage, therein pleaded, to have been void, if any such were had; plainly in the absence, as appears by the sentence itself, of full, at least, proof of the marriage.

Such are the cases cited. But there is one feature of dissimilarity between each of those cases and the present that bars any reasoning from the one to the other, in this particular, in my view of them. It is this. In no one of those suits were the plaintiff and defendant, respectively, as they are in this suit, the alleged contracting parties; for the marriage sought to be impeached, in every one of them, was not only a marriage to which the party complainant was, personally, not [400] privy; but it was a marriage, the particulars of which, in all probability, were studiously concealed from the party complainant by the defendant; and this, expressly in order to defeat the object of the suit, namely, a sentence annulling that marriage. Consequently, it would have amounted at once, in effect, to a defeazance of the suit, to have required strict proof of the marriage sought to be annulled from the complainant in any one of those cases—a special consideration, which accounts for the hypothetical form of the sentences in all those cases, but is, in no degree, applicable to, or would justify a sentence in that form, in a case circumstanced like the present.

In the first of those suits his late majesty, acting by his procurator general, was the plaintiff or complainant (a)—the object of the suit being, to obtain a [401] sentence

(a) Heseltine v. Lady Augusta Murray.

This was a suit brought by letters of request, from the judge of the Consistory Court of London, in virtue of which, Heseltine, the King's proctor, prayed a citation, on the 20th of January, 1794, against Lady Augusta Murray, in a cause of nullity of marriage.

An appearance having been given for the party cited, a libel was afterwards brought in, and admitted, pleading the statute of 12 Geo. III. c. 11, rendering any descendant of the body of King George II. incapable of contracting marriage, under the age of declaratory of the nullity of the marriage, de facto, of his present Royal Highness, the Duke of Sussex, with Lady Augusta Murray, the defendant, as [402] had in violation of the Royal Marriage Act. In Fust and Bowerman, the wife, de facto, was a lunatic; and the marriage was sought to be avoided, on her behalf, and by her committee. And the case of Watson v. Faremouth (a cause of nullity of marriage by reason of incest) was, at the promotion of a party having a civil interest in the husband's estate, liable to be defeated in the event of his marriage not being impeached, with effect, during the joint lives of himself and his wife, de facto, the contracting parties. Now in either of those suits, I repeat, to have exacted strict proof of the marriage from the complainant would have been at once to defeat the suit: so that, in each of those cases, the nature of the decree is accounted for by the special circumstances of the case. And the decree, consequently, in no one of them, furnishes a precedent, by which the Court, in my judgment, should be guided in disposing of the present case.

The Court has been prayed, indeed, to rescind the conclusion of the cause for the purpose of receiving additional pleadings and proofs as to this asserted fact of marriage —in support of which prayer it has been told that the complainant is a young man, now, or lately, in his clerkship to his brother, an attorney, and one whose means are probably small. But the plaintiff is not one for whose relief an Ecclesiastical Court is bound to go out of its way, as it appears to me upon several considerations. For instance, in cases of a similar description, an allegation has commonly appeared [403] twenty-five, without the royal consent declared in council, and pleading the birth and descent, of Prince Augustus Frederic (now Duke of Sussex), and that no royal consent had been given to his marriage; and further pleading that, on the 4th of April, 1793, Prince Augustus Frederic being under twenty-one years of age, a marriage, or rather a shew or effigy of marriage, was, in fact, had or solemnized, or pretended so to be had, or solemnized, in the house of Lady Dunmore, at Rome (but by whom the party proponent was unable to set forth), between the Prince and Lady Augusta; that they shortly after came to England, and on the 4th of December, 1793, were married by banns in the parish church of St. George, Hanover Square; and that both the marriages were void, for want of the royal consent, by virtue of the statute aforesaid.

Two exhibits were pleaded, viz. an extract from the baptismal register of his royal highness, and an extract from the marriage register of St. George's, Hanover Square.

The law of Rome, or the validity or invalidity of the marriage by that law, was in no manner whatever pleaded in the cause. The libel was settled by the present Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott, King's Advocate).

Lady Augusta's proctor declared that he confessed the statute 12 Geo. III. to be a public act: and also confessed the two marriages pleaded in the libel; but, otherwise, contested suit negatively.

There was no direct proof of the marriage at Rome; but Lady Dunmore deposed that she believed (because she was so assured by her daughter Lady Augusta, and also by a letter from the Prince) that they were married in her, Lady Dunmore's, house, at Rome, by a clergyman of the Church of England in full orders.

Extract from the interlocutory, pronounced by Sir William Wynne (dean of the Arches), 14th July, 1794.

"And the judge did also pronounce, decree, and declare, that in respect to the fact of marriage, or rather shew or effigy of marriage, pleaded in the said libel to have been had, or solemnized, or pretended to have been had, or solemnized at the house of the Right Hon. Charlotte Countess of Dunmore, in the city of Rome, on the 4th day of April, 1793, there is not sufficient proof by witnesses that any such fact of marriage, or rather shew or effigy of a marriage, was, in any manner, had or solemnized at the said city of Rome, between his said Royal Highness, Prince Augustus Frederic, and the Right Hon. Lady Augusta Murray, spinster, the party cited in the cause; but that if any such marriage, or rather shew or effigy of a marriage, was in fact had or solemnized at the said city of Rome, between the said parties, the said pretended marriage was, and is, absolutely null and void, to all intents and purposes in law whatsoever."

The sentences in Fust and Bowerman [Arches, Delegates, 1789] and Watson v. Faremouth [Arches, 1811] were in a similar form, mutatis mutandis, and for similar reasons. For the last of these cases, see 1 Phillimore, p. 355, 357.

in the libel that the complainant has withdrawn from all further cohabitation with the defendant from the time when he discovered the alleged invalidity of his marriage. The fact may have been so in the present instance; but there is no proof to that effect, nor even any plea. Again; if no impediment to the plaintiff's marriage with the defendant was known, or supposed, at the time, to have existed, why was their marriage to be celebrated in Scotland? The parties were both majors; and that the plaintiff, prior to that time, had introduced the defendant to his mother and brothers as his intended wife, is in evidence in the cause; so that no motive, as of concealment in that quarter, can be probably suggested. Upon the whole, should I err in refusing to pronounce a declaratory sentence, upon my impression from the proofs before me, the party may still be able, namely, on appeal, either to amend his case by pleading and proving new facts, if he shall be so advised, or to obtain a revision of it (if that be preferred) on the present evidence—but from the result of that evidence, I feel myself called upon to pronounce that the plaintiff has failed in proof of his libel; and to dismiss the defendant.

[404] BRUCE v. BURKE. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1825.—A party who has once prayed publication, though stopped by an asserted allegation, is not at liberty to produce further witnesses upon his plea, as a matter of course—that is, not without special ground laid, and by leave of the Court—in the event of such asserted allegation not being actually filed.

(On motion.)

Court. Where publication of the evidence taken in a cause has been prayed by one of two litigant parties, the mere assertion of an allegation by the other is not sufficient, per se, to re-open the term probatory to that one; no such asserted allegation being filed by, and, consequently, no new term probatory being assigned to, the other litigant. A party therefore who has once prayed publication, though stopped by an asserted allegation, is not at liberty to produce and examine a further witness, or further witnesses, upon his libel or allegation, as matter of course—that is, not without special ground laid, and by leave of the Court—in the event of such asserted allegation not being actually filed.

In the particular case—a cause of nullity of marriage by reason of a former marriage—there being no affidavit in support of the prayer to examine a fresh witness on the part of the defendant, who had formerly prayed publication (which publication, however, was stopped [405] by an asserted further allegation on the part of the plaintiff; she, the plaintiff, now declaring that she gave no further allegation and praying, in her turn, publication of the whole evidence in the cause), the Court refused leave to produce and examine the proposed witness on behalf of the defendant, and ordered publication to pass.

BURGOYNE v. FREE. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1825.—"Letters of request" from a bishop's "commissary" go in the same course with the "appeal"—that is, not to the diocesan, but to the metropolitical, Court; the Court of Arches.

[See further, p. 414, post; and 2 Hagg. Ecc. 456, 663.]

(On protest.)

This was a cause of office (a) promoted by Montague Burgoyne, Esq., against the Rev. Edward Drax Free, D.D., rector of the parish of Sutton, in the county of Bedford, and archdeaconry and commissaryship of Bedford. The citation issued under and in virtue of request made to the dean of the Arches by "the worshipful Richard Smith, A.M., commissary of the Hon. and Right Rev. Father in God, George, by divine permission, Lord Bishop of Lincoln, in and throughout the whole archdeaconry of Bedford, in the diocese of Lincoln lawfully constituted."

An appearance was given for the party cited under protest: and

It was contended on his behalf that the letters of request signed in this cause lay properly not to the Court of Arches, but to the diocesan Court at Lincoln—so that a citation issued in virtue of such letters of request was not compulsory on the party cited—for the following reasons:—

[406] Letters of request ordinarily lie where the appeal lies, and for this reason.

(a) For offences of what description, see the next case.

The judge who signs them by so doing waiving or remitting his own Court (which is all that he can do), the jurisdiction which, generally speaking, at once alone attaches, is that of the appellate Court. Thus from all peculiars [i.e. places exempt from episcopal jurisdiction] both appeals and letters of request lie at once to this, the metropolitical Court: for it is the jurisdiction of this Court that, at once, alone attaches in those cases. For instance, where an archdeacon, who has a peculiar, waives or remits his Court, there is no other Court which can take cognizance of the cause than this, the Court of Arches; to which accordingly (being also the appellate Court) letters of request undoubtedly lie. So, again, from Courts which are not peculiars, but subject to the diocesan, letters of request, generally speaking, go in the same course with appeals, for the same reason. Thus where an archdeacon, who has no peculiar, waives or remits his Court, the jurisdiction that immediately attaches is that of the diocesan Court; to which Court, accordingly, letters of request lie (being here also, again, the appellate Court) repeatedly so decided. In short, where the inferior ordinary waives or remits his Court, the appellate Court, generally speaking, is alone competent to take cognizance of the cause: and this it is which has given rise to the notion—a notion, generally speaking, perfectly correct—that letters of request go in the same course with appeals; or, in other words, that the inferior ordinary must make request or instance of jurisdiction to that judge into whose Court the cause must have been appealed, had he himself proceeded in it in the first instance.

[407] But if letters of request from a commissary lie to the diocesan, and not to the Court of Arches in this instance, it should seem that they lie in a different course from the appeal. For by the statute of appeals, 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12, the appeal from a bishop's commissary, it should seem, lies to the metropolitan. But what then? Where is the authority for saying that letters of request must universally, and under all circumstances, lie where the appeal lies. No authority whatever can be cited for that position. On the contrary, it is obvious, from the following considerations, that in this particular (the present) instance, though the appeal may lie to one Court, the letters of request must lie to another.

By the canon law, beyond all doubt or question, the appeal from a commissary lies to the diocesan, and not to the metropolitan. This may be proved by a host of authorities. Maranta, for instance, after stating "Quod a sententia vicarii seu substituti non appellatur ad substituentem, puta episcopum, ex quo fit idem tribunal, sed appellatur ad superiorem substituentis," immediately adds that this rule only applies in the case of a vicar general, "quia ille dicitur habere ordinariam jurisdictionem quam habet episcopus. Secus, si esset aliquis deputatus vicarius particularis, in una causa tantum, vel in uno loco particulari diœcesis qui dicitur vicarius foraneus seu ruralis" (the precise definition of a modern commissary), "quia tunc dicitur iste vicarius habere delegatam jurisdictionem; et ab eo potest appellari ad episcopum, vel ad alium substituentem, seu ad vicarium generalem." (a)[1] So Lyndwood, speaking of official principals, says an official principal is he "qui habet idem consistorium cum episcopo deputante"—[408] whence (a)[2] he adds—"à tali officiali non appellatur ad ipsum episcopum sed ad eum ad quem appellari debet ab ipso episcopo—ab officiali vero foraneo" [that is, from a commissary], "ad ipsum episcopum appellatur."(b) And, not to multiply instances, these doctrines are adopted nearly in the same words by Aylyffe, in his Parergon, p. 165.

It perhaps may be conceded on these authorities that, by the canon law, the appeal from a commissary lies to the bishop. The statute of appeals, however, 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12, seems to say that the appeal from a commissary lies to the metropolitan. This expression "seems to say" is adopted from Gibson for the following reason:—The statute of appeals, as clearly appears, both from the preamble and the purview of that statute, was simply meant to prevent appeals to the See of Rome, out of the realm, and not at all to alter the course of appeals within the realm. And by the word

(a)[1] Spec. Aur. vi. ii. 381. See also iii. v. 14, 15.

(a)[2] That is—"Ne ab eodem ad seipsum appellatio interposita videatur"—as the bishop and chancellor have both but one auditory; in the language of the canon law, "faciunt idem consistorium." It is manifest that no such absurdity resulted from an appeal lying from the bishop's commissary to himself or his chancellor, which is the same thing—and by the canon law, most unquestionably, the appeal did so lie.

(b) Lynd. Oxf. edit. pp. 80 and 105.

"commissary" in that statute most probably was meant and intended the bishop's chancellor or chief commissary (c)[1] (often styled his commissary simply [409] in acts and instruments at that time), and not a commissary in partibus such as the commissary of Bedford, who signed these letters of request. But be that as it may—admit that by practice and on the authority of the case of Cart v. Marsh [Strange, 1080] the appeal, even from such a commissary, lies to the Court of Arches and not to the diocesan Court, what is that to letters of request? There is not only no authority, as already said, for the position that letters of request must lie where the appeal lies; but the contrary is even plainly directed in this instance by the "Bill of Citations," 23 Hen. VIII. c. 9. For the "Bill of Citations," after providing that none shall be cited out of their dioceses, under great pains and penalties, but in particular cases (one of such cases [see the fifth reservation] being in case of letters of request), adds "that such letters of request shall still be governed by the canon law." Consequently, if by the canon law, that is, before and independent of the statute of appeals, appeals lay from the commissary Court to the diocesan Court, and not to the metropolitical Court, letters of request still lie to the diocesan and not to the metropolitical Court; for the statute of appeals, at least, has made no alteration in the law as to letters of request.

And this course of making request is precisely con-[410]-sonant to the general principles of the canon law for this further reason. The bishop's vicar-general or chancellor, which is the same thing, is an ordinary. The bishop's commissary is not an ordinary, but a mere delegated judge,(a) who is bound by the canon law to keep strictly within the terms of his commission, which is "stricti juris et extraordinariæ jurisdictionis, neque extendi potest ultra quod stricte comprehensum in rescripto. Quicquid igitur in rescripto non est expressum, pro omisso habetur." (b) Here the commissary's patent, by the way, giving him no power to sign letters of request, it may be questionable, at least upon principle, whether it be competent to him by the canon law to make request at all. But if it be, he must make it to the diocesan. For being, as already shewn, a delegated judge, he is bound by the canon law as such, if for no other reason, to make request to him only who deputes him. The canon law is express to this. Thus Alciat, for instance [Praxis, p. 40], "Judex delegatus semper ab eo debet quærere,(c)[2] a quo delegatus est"—a position repeated in nearly every practical book of authority as one that admits of no question.

[411] In short, the true principle (the only principle of universal application) as to letters of request is, that the judge who signs them, by so doing, merely waives or remits his own court: it being constantly added to this, that "he hath no power to give or appoint a Court." Consequently, there being still within the diocese a superior

---

(c)[1] The term "chancellor" not occurring in the statute at all—so that, if by the term "commissary" was not meant his "chancellor," the statute is silent as to where the appeal from the bishop's "chancellor" lies altogether. The words of the statute are, "from a bishop or his commissary to the archbishop"—And this, says Gibson [Cod. 1036], commenting upon these very words, for the reason given in the canon law, namely, lest (having both but one auditory) the appeal might seem to be made from the same person to the same person, if it lay to the bishop. Gibson plainly, then, by this word "commissary" in the statute understood the bishop's "chancellor:" for though a bishop's chancellor or chief commissary has "idem consistorium cum episcopo deputante," his commissary in partibus, as already shewn, has not—so that if the word "commissary" in the statute is understood of a commissary in partibus, Gibson's reason is inapplicable altogether.

(a) Vicarius, generalis dicitur ordinarius—secus vicarius specialis datus in una terra diœcesis, vel in certâ parte causarum tantum, quia ille est delegatus, non ordinarius, judex: Maranta, iv. v. 14.

Officiales principales vices episcoporum generaliter tenent, et ideo ordinarii sunt censendi: secus tamen æstimo in officialibus foraneis, etiam episcoporum: hi tantum delegati judices. Lynd. p. 80. Nor, he says, does it make any difference in this respect that they are delegated "ad universitatem causarum," so long as they are restricted to a certain part only of the diocese. And see to the same effect, Ayliffe, Par. p. 165.

(b) Gail, Praxis, 68.

(c)[2] That is—ad eum referre causam—or, to make request to him.

Court competent to take cognisance of the cause, be what it may, after and notwithstanding request made by a commissary, a compulsory citing out of the diocese by the metropolitical judge, merely in virtue of such request to him addressed (rightly or wrongly) by a commissary, is against the "Bill of Citations" and radically faulty: it not being open to the commissary by his mere signature to pass over his diocesan; (a)[1] and to send up the subject, against his will, out of his own diocese, to the metropolitical Court, in the first instance. The "Bill of Citations" has for its great object the ease of the subject in two particulars—to save him expense and charges and to give him a double appeal. The object of the statute has been so judicially expounded: and the subject has also been judicially said to be entitled to the most favourable interpretation of that statute.(b)[1] But the [412] sole interpretation of the statute which can avail to defeat this protest must be an unfavourable one: and to the prejudice of the subject in both those particulars as to which the "purpose of the statute was to provide for his ease." (a)[2] Admit, however, that a commissary may sign letters of request to the metropolitan, especially at the instance of a promovent, ante litem,(b)[2] for this reason, that the promovent might have cited the party into the diocesan Court at once without any letters of request from the commissary, where, as admitted in this case, the chancellor has a concurrent jurisdiction with the commissary in places within the commissary's more immediate jurisdiction. Admit that this may lay even a good foundation for the commissary's signing letters of request to the metropolitan. But the question still occurs, what is the true effect of a citation issued by the metropolitical Court, in virtue of such letters of request? It should seem clearly to be only this. It may, very possibly, be sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the metropolitical Court, if the party appears and submits. On this very same principle it is that an appeal may be good "omisso medio." Thus Maranta, after laying down that appeals must be made "gradatim," and that "appellatio non valet omisso medio," [413] adds that this does not hold [non procedere] "quando fieret appellatio omisso medio et non opponeretur: tunc enim procedit appellatio, et valet processus; quia videntur partes consentire, et jurisdictionem prorogare" (Aur. Spec. vi. 11, 368, 373). So here, if letters of request are signed by a commissary to this Court, and "non opponerentur, valet processus." But if they are opposed "non valet processus"—a citation issued in virtue of them is not compulsory; nor is it competent to this Court to enforce them, by putting the party in contempt for not giving an absolute appearance to the citation.

In reply to this it was contended—that the uniform course of request had been from a commissary to the metropolitan—that no instance could be cited of an objection ever taken to this; and that the practice, so acquiesced in, had become settled law; and was not liable to be altered or defeated on the grounds and for the reasons now suggested. That in truth and substance the Court would provide better the ease of the subject by strictly maintaining this practice than by sanctioning any abandonment of it—the effect of which might be the introduction, in many instances, of a third Court, before the suitor could arrive at a final decision of his cause, namely, by the Court of Delegates—that the subject had an appeal, though his cause was heard in the first instance in the Court of Arches; and that this was sufficient: as the law (granting it to have been otherwise, at one time even judicially expounded) discounten-

(a)[1] In support of this, the case of Hodges v. Hodges [Arches, 1791] was cited, in which the letters of request signed by Dr. Heslop as commissary for the archdeaconry of Buckingham were counter-signed by Dr. Beaver as chancellor of the diocese. But the Court held that this might have been done, in that instance, ex majori cautela, and did not infer it to be actually necessary.

(b)[1] See Jones v. Jones, Hob. 185. It is there, too, expressly said that a commissary cannot refer a cause to the archbishop, but only to his diocesan. This long after the statute of appeals. And of all the common law reporters, Lord Ch. J. Hobart seems to have been the one best acquainted with ecclesiastical proceedings.

(a)[2] Jones' case, ub. sup.

(b)[2] For it is to be remembered that by the canon law request or instance of jurisdiction may be made by an inferior to a superior judge, in any part of the cause, if he thinks fit; as well as at the instance of a plaintiff or promovent ante litem, or before the instituture of the suit. Thus Durand [de rel per.]: "Judex referre potest causam quandocunque sibi videbitur expendiens—ante litem; in medio litis; vel quandocunque." And Alciat to the same effect [Praxis, p. 141]: "Quoties expedit, ex justa causa et necessaria, fit relatio."

anced double appeals ; deeming such double appeals really inconvenient to suitors, and not any benefit—finally, that suits of this nature were more fitly instituted in the Court of Arches (where the [414] assistance of counsel was to be had) than in any diocesan Court; in no one of which were the aid and advice of civilians (at least immediately) attainable. And

The Court, as inclining to this view of the subject, generally, for the reasons stated above, overruled the protest, and ordered the defendant to appear absolutely.

BURGOYNE v. FREE. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 1825.—Articles against the defendant (a clerk) for incontinence, among other offences of ecclesiastical cognizance, admitted to proof (though no incontinence was charged within eight months before the commencement of the suit), notwithstanding the statute 27 Geo. III. c. 44—it being held by the Court that this statute only applies to suits against laymen for mere incontinence, in order to the infliction of penance ; and not to suits against clerks for general unfitness to discharge their clerical functions (such general unfitness to be inferred from this of incontinence, among other offences) ; in order to their suspension or deprivation.

[See in King's Bench, 1826, 5 B. & C. 400, 765. Referred to, Oliver v. Hobart, 1826, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 46.]

(On admission of the articles.)

This was a cause of office promoted by Montague Burgoyne, Esq., against the Rev. Edward Drax Free, D.D., for incontinence, profaneness, irregularity in the performance of divine offices, and other offences of ecclesiastical cognizance.

Upon the admission of the articles, an objection was taken for the defendant to the admission of those articles (the 4th to the 13th inclusive) charging the defendant with several acts of incontinence with different females. These charges commence, it was said, in 1810—fifteen years ago—the last act charged is in the beginning of May, 1823—the citation issues in the middle of October, 1824. Consequently, it is incompetent to the Court to put the defendant on his answer to such charges, under the statute 27 Geo. III. c. 44, which expressly provides, that "no suit shall be brought [415] in any Ecclesiastical Court for fornication or incontinence, after the expiration of eight months from the time when the offence shall have been committed." Hence it was prayed that the Court would reject the articles in question, from the 4th to the 13th inclusive—and so dismiss that part of the charge altogether respecting the fornication or incontinence, objected to the defendant.

In answer to this it was argued on behalf of the promovent, that the act would appear from its title—"an act to prevent frivolous and vexatious suits"—to be inapplicable to the present proceeding—that it could only be taken to apply to suits commenced against laymen for mere incontinence or fornication : and not to grave charges against a clerk, of general unfitness to discharge his clerical functions, for sundry offences—some of such, among many other, being the offences of fornication or incontinence.

In reply to this, again, it was contended on the defendant's part that the purview of the act was general—"no suit shall be brought, &c."—and that no rule of interpreting statutes was better understood than this : that although the preamble (including the title) of an act may be called in to open or explain the act ; still, that it shall not be to restrain the operation of enacting clauses which have general words from that full latitude which the clauses expressed in such general words of themselves and without any such reference to the preamble of the act would plainly import—that the act, on the face of it, implies no distinction between clerks and laymen in this particular ; and that to argue clerks protected from suits for mere fornication or incontinence, after the expiration of eight months, by [416] the act ; and yet to be liable at any time to suits for unfitness to discharge their clerical functions, such unfitness to be inferred from their having been guilty of fornication or incontinence, notwithstanding the act was absurd : that if the mere insertion of other charges was to render it competent to the Court to proceed at any time against clerks for fornication or incontinence, the statute might be so easily evaded, namely, by the insertion of one or two other offences, how frivolous or unfounded so ever, in the articles of charge, as to render it, in its application to clerks at least, altogether nugatory—that the act by its very title respects vexatious as well as frivolous suits ; and that suits of this nature, out of time, against either clerks or laymen (after a lapse of five or of ten or, as in this case, of fifteen years), whether frivolous or not, are vexatious, on that ground only—that in proportion as such offences are more penal in clerks than in laymen, some limitation, in point of time, as to suits for such offences is perhaps more necessary in the instance of clerks than it is in that of laymen—lastly, that the statute had constantly received the interpretation now contended for in practice, to this extent at least; that opinions to that effect had repeatedly been given by (possibly every) counsel of (any) standing at the bar; (a)[1] [417] and that no suit similar to the present, under similar circumstances, had been attempted to be instituted in the long interval between the passing of the act and the present day. If the Court had any reasonable doubt, the defendant was said to be clearly entitled to the benefit of that doubt, so as to be dismissed from this part of the charge.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. The question raised by this objection is a new question, and it is one not unattended with some doubt and difficulty. On the one hand, the title of the act, which may be looked to for its object in the case of this as of other statutes, would seem to imply that it was for the protection of individuals (laymen) from suits for fornication, in order to the mere infliction of penance after a limited time: and the particular occasion of the passing of the act which the Court recollects to have been, certain suits against laymen for fornication long after the alleged commission of the offence then lately depending in an ecclesiastical Court in the west of England, and the proceedings in which were the subject of pretty general comment at that time, infers this again to have been its true object. Hence I am strongly disposed to think that the legislature in passing this act had no intention to interfere at all with suits instituted for the correction of clerks; or, in other words, to prevent suits like the present against clerks, in order to their suspension or deprivation for incontinency among other offices, though [418] no actual incontinence should be chargeable upon the particular defendant within eight months from the commencement of the suit. On the other hand, however, the words of the enacting clause in themselves, and without reference to the preamble of the act, certainly are sufficiently broad, as contended, to render it incompetent to the Court to entertain the present suit, so far as the charges of incontinence are concerned. Upon the whole, however, after the best consideration that I have been able to give to the subject, the statute appears to me so clearly to have been framed, alio intuitu to that for which it is invoked, that I shall admit the articles objected to; leaving it to the defendant to appeal, if he thinks proper, to a tribunal, of which judges of the common law are necessarily a component part; (a)[2] or if he prefers that course, to apply for a prohibition to one of these Courts whose peculiar province it is to construe acts of parliament—any one of which is, of course, more able than this Court to put a right interpretation on the statute, on which alone the objection taken to these articles avowedly rests.(b)

(a)[1] See too the case of Schultes v. Hodgson, ante, vol. 1, page 321, where the incontinence charged on the defendant (a clerk in orders, like this defendant, and proceeded against in a similar suit, in order to the infliction of a similar penalty) was expressly pleaded to have been committed "within eight calendar months from the commencement of the suit." In the case of Schultes v. Hodgson, indeed, the articles were admitted where the suit commenced in the Consistory Court of Sarum; it only came to this Court, the Court of Arches, by appeal. It was not therefore cited in the argument, by way of "authority;" but merely as illustrative of the construction that had been generally put upon the statute.

(b) The defendant, in the following Easter Term, moving the Court of King's Bench for a prohibition, a rule was made to shew cause why the Court of Arches should not be prohibited from holding suit as to the charges of incontinence objected in these articles. Upon "cause shewn," the Court of King's Bench directed that the plaintiff (the defendant in this Court) should declare in prohibition. And here at present (September, 1825) the matter rests.

(On appeal from the commissary of Surry's Court.)

This was a question respecting the appropriation of a pew in a parish church by faculty; in which the law respecting the appropriation of pews by faculties; and the principles by which ordinaries should be governed in disposing of applications for the issue of such faculties, especially as with reference to the circumstances of the times, were fully entered into; and were stated by the Court at large in its judgment.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a question respecting the appropriation by faculty of a certain pew, in the parish church of Lingfield, in the diocese of Winchester and county of Surry, to Thomas Lane, the respondent in this Court. Mr. Lane originally applied for this faculty to the commissary of Surry, within the limits of whose jurisdiction Lingfield is situate. Accordingly a citation issued from the commissary of Surry's Court in June, 1821, calling upon the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners of the said parish of Lingfield in special, and all others having or pretending to have any right, title, or interest in the premises in general, to appear and shew cause why a license or faculty should not issue for confirming and appropriating the use of the said pew to Mr. Lane and his family, so long as he and they should continue parishioners and inhabitants of Lingfield—with the usual intimation.

[420] An appearance was given to this citation as well by the minister and churchwardens as by a Mr. Kelsey, a parishioner of Lingfield, both as opposing the grant: and two several allegations were filed nominally on the part of both, but really on the part of Kelsey only: it being the purport of those allegations to set up an exclusive right to the pew sought to be appropriated in Kelsey, as appurtenant to a mansion in the parish called Batnors, which he, Kelsey, had then recently purchased. In point of fact the minister and churchwardens took no step in the cause during its pendency in the Court below, beyond that of a mere appearance to the citation; and which step they seem to have taken only as conceiving, somewhat erroneously indeed, that they were bound to appear to the citation. Kelsey's second allegation, I should say, was responsive to a plea filed by Lane in answer to the first; in which not merely Kelsey's asserted prescriptive right to the pew was denied, but in which the pew was claimed as already appertaining to Lane, in virtue of his connection with the former proprietors of Batnors, even though no faculty should issue as prayed. The question, so far, then, was a question of right between Lane and Kelsey; the minister and churchwardens neither interfering (except as already stated) nor being called upon to interfere. From the rejection in part of Kelsey's second allegation by the Court below, an appeal, as from a grievance, was prosecuted to this Court; which sustained the judgment of the Court below, but retained the principal cause at the prayer of both parties. But the question here, in substance, is quite another question to that which was depending in the Court below: this Court having disposed at once of any legal title to [421] the pew set up on either side in pronouncing its judgment upon the merits of the appeal. For it clearly appeared to this Court, at the hearing of the appeal, that, for reasons presently to be stated, neither of these parties had, though both were asserting it, any legal right whatever to the pew in dispute. The question here then became, and still is, not any question of right; it is merely whether the Court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, shall or shall not proceed to appropriate this pew by its license or faculty, ex gratia, to the respondent, upon the grounds stated in and pursuant to the tenor of the original citation. From the instant of the question assuming this shape, namely, from the hearing of the appeal, it became the duty of the minister and churchwardens (Kelsey withdrawing from the suit) to lay before the Court the facts necessary to guide its discretion upon such a question. This they have done through the medium of two allegations (the second, again, responsive to a plea filed by Lane in answer to the first); and it now becomes the duty of the Court to state whether, upon a review of all the facts and circumstances brought to its notice in the evidence taken upon these allegations, this is or is not an application on the part of Mr. Lane proper to be acceded to.

It appears, then, by this evidence that Mr. Antony Faringdon, in the occupation at that time of a house and estate in the parish of Lingfield, called Batnors, of which he was also the proprietor, somewhere about the year 1709 made certain presents to the church; in return for which the parish conceded to him and his family the exclusive use and possession of a certain pew in the church, being the identical pew which [422] is the subject of the present proceeding. This is verified in part by the following order of vestry made in the year 1709, extracted from the parish books under that year.

"Memorandum.—In the year 1709, when the parish church of Lingfield, in the county of Surry, was new beautified, and a great many new pews added, it was agreed between the then churchwardens, parishioners, and Antony Faringdon, Esq., for and in consideration that the said Antony Faringdon, Esq., presented an altar cloth, and Mrs. Elizabeth Faringdon, wife of the said Antony Faringdon, presented a silver salver, for the use of the communion; that therefore the said Antony Faringdon, Esq., should have and hold for his own use, and the use of his family, a certain seat or pew adjoining the pulpit stairs."

Batnors continued in the possession of the Faringdon family from 1709 to 1820; when a Mr. James Faringdon, its then proprietor, and the great grandson of Mr. Antony Faringdon, the first grantee of the pew, if he may be so called, sold the estate to Mr. Kelsey. Such was the origin of Mr. Kelsey's supposed claim. Now to that of Mr. Lane. Mr. James Faringdon, it seems, has two sisters—the one, unmarried; the other, the wife of Mr. Lane, who, I should say, is an attorney in London. Up to 1820 the Faringdons are admitted to have had the exclusive use of the pew; in which, from the time of his marriage in 1807, Mr. Lane of [423] course sat with his wife occasionally as a visitor at Batnors; but I presume as a visitor only. In 1816, indeed, some repairs were done to the pew apparently at the expense of Mr. Lane: but he, Lane, at that time was the actual mortgagee, and was in treaty for the purchase of Batnors.

Upon the sale of Batnors to Kelsey, in 1820, the question as to the (supposed) ownership of this pew, to which I have already adverted, immediately arose. Kelsey claimed it as an appurtenant to the mansion; obviously without any legal foundation —as the facts stated, the order of vestry, &c., are conclusive against any annexation of this pew to Batnors by prescription; a title the only legal foundation of which is immemorial usage. On the other hand, Mr. James Faringdon maintained, upon equally untenable grounds, that the pew was still absolutely and exclusively his—claiming it as the immediate descendant and representative of Mr. Antony Faringdon, the first donee; in which capacity, and not as the mere owner of Batnors, he insisted that the right had all along vested in him. Accordingly, he both claimed to occupy the pew exclusively, during his continuance for about nine months, in the parish, after leaving Batnors; and upon finally quitting it, affected to convey or assign his interest in the pew to his brother-in-law Mr. Lane; he, Lane, having purchased twelve or fifteen acres in the parish, upon which he had began to build a house at that time, which has since been finished, and which he now inhabits. Such was the origin of Mr. Lane's asserted title, persisted in (like that of Kelsey) up to the hearing of the appeal: as also, indeed, that the pew was his, in right of his wife, in virtue of her descent from [424] Mr. Antony Faringdon, independent of any conveyance or assignment from his brother-in-law Mr. James Faringdon; for this also was set up in the allegation filed on his part, in the commissary of Surry's Court. I need scarcely say that, upon this shewing, Lane had no right to the pew any more than Kelsey. The last person who had a vested right to the pew of any description was Mr. James Faringdon: but even his right was a mere possessory right; as such it was liable to defeazance by the ordinary, and by the churchwardens as officers of ordinary, even during his continuance in the parish: it ceased and determined ipso facto upon his ceasing to be a parishioner; when the pew reverted to the parish at large, and became as liable as any other pew in the church to the disposal of the ordinary and of the churchwardens again, in the first instance, still as officers of the ordinary. However, Mr. Lane and Mr. Kelsey mutually assert their right to the pew, from the time of Mr. James Faringdon quitting the parish in January, 1821; but without any legal step taken till the month of June in that year—when Mr. Lane applies to the ordinary (the commissary of Surry) for a faculty appropriating to him (or rather confirmatory to his alleged title to) the pew in question. The subsequent proceedings, both in the Court below and in this Court, and the true state of the question here, have already been stated. It only remains to add, that Mr. Lane still insists that the faculty prayed should issue ex gratia, though he no longer claims it ex debito justitiæ, as, partly at least, in the first instance; submitting also, that it may issue as prayed, without any prejudice to the parish. The minister and churchwardens deny this; maintaining that a grant of the [425] faculty prayed (of the validity of Mr. Lane's pretensions to which they leave the Court to dispose) would be manifestly inconvenient —as with reference, this, to the increasing population of Lingfield, and even to the present want of accommodation for those who are authorised and disposed to attend divine service at its parish church. Such have been the several proceedings up to the present time—such are the cases severally undertaken to be made—and such is the whole question of which the Court has now finally to dispose.

The general law with respect to pews and sittings in churches is little understood; erroneous notions on this subject are current, at least, in many parts of the country, and have led to much practical inconvenience. It is necessary that the Court should briefly advert to these topics, in order to dispose intelligibly to the parties of the question at issue.

By the general law, and of common right, all the pews in a parish church are the common property of the parish: they are for the use in common of the parishioners, who are all entitled to be seated, orderly and conveniently, so as best to provide for the accommodation of all. The distribution of seats rests with the churchwardens as the officers, and subject to the control of the ordinary. Neither the minister nor the vestry have any right whatever to interfere with the churchwardens in seating and arranging the parishioners, as often erroneously supposed: at the same time the advice of the minister, and even sometimes the opinions and wishes of the vestry, may be fitly invoked by the churchwardens; and, to a certain extent, may be reasonably deferred to in this matter. The general duty of the churchwardens is to look to the general [426] accommodation of the parish, consulting as far as may be that of all its inhabitants. The parishioners, indeed, have a claim to be seated according to their rank and station; but the churchwardens are not, in providing for this, to overlook the claims of all the parishioners to be seated, if sittings can be afforded them. Accordingly, they are bound, in particular, not to accommodate the higher classes, beyond their real wants, to the exclusion of their poorer neighbours; who are equally entitled to accommodation with the rest, though they are not entitled to equal accommodation; supposing the seats to be not all equally convenient.

Such, then, are the general duties of churchwardens in seating and arranging the parishioners in their several parish churches. But the actual exercise of their office in this particular is too frequently interfered with by faculties appropriating certain pews to certain individuals, in different forms and with different limitations; and by the prescriptive rights to pews which these faculties have been the occasion. Faculties of this description have certainly been granted in former times with too great facility; and by no means with due consideration and foresight. The appropriation has sometimes been to a man and his family "so long as they continue inhabitants of a certain house in the parish." The more modern form is to a man and his family, "so long as they continue inhabitants of the parish," generally. The first of these is, perhaps, the least exceptionable form. It is unlikely that a family continuing in the occupation of the same house in the parish shall be in circumstances to render its occupation of the same pew in the church very [427] objectionable. The objection which applies to the other class of faculties is, that they often entitle parishioners to the exclusive occupancy of pews of which they themselves are no longer in circumstances to be suitable occupants at all, whatever their ancestors might have been. A third sort of faculty not unusual after churches had been new pewed, either wholly or in part, appears to have been a faculty for the appropriation of certain pews to certain messuages or farm houses; the probable origin (the faculties themselves being lost) of most of those prescriptive rights to particular pews, recognized as such, at common law—the parties claiming which must shew the annexation of the pews to the messuages, time out of mind; and the reparation from time to time, of the particular pews, by the tenants of such houses or messuages, in order to make out their prescriptive titles. Some instances there are, too, of faculties at large; that is, appropriating pews to persons and their families without any condition annexed of residence in the parish. But such faculties are, so far at least, merely void, that no faculty is deemed either here, or at common law, good to the extent of entitling any person who is a non-parishioner to a seat even in the body of the church. As to an aisle or chancel, that, indeed, may belong to a non-parishioner; for the case of an aisle, or chancel, depends upon and is governed by other considerations. But whenever the occupant of a pew in the body of the church ceases to be a parishioner, his right to the pew, howsoever founded, and how valid soever during his continuance in the parish, at once ceases and determines; though the contrary is very often supposed; as, for instance, that he may sell or assign it, or let it [428] to rent as part and parcel of his property in the parish. So again of pews annexed by prescription to certain messuages, it is often erroneously conceived that the right to the pew may be severed from the occupancy of the messuage: it is no such thing; it cannot be severed: it passes with the messuage; the tenant of which for the time being has also de jure, for the time being, the prescriptive right to the pew. The result, upon the whole, however, of these faculties is, that in many churches the parishioners at large are deprived, in a great degree, of suitable accommodation by means of exclusive rights to pews, either actually vested in particular families, by faculty, or prescription, or at least, and which is the same thing as to any practical result, supposed to be so vested. I add this last because, in very many instances, these exclusive rights are merely supposititious; and would turn out upon investigation to be no rights at all. In this very case, for instance, there are two claims as of right set up to this identical pew, neither of which it now seems is legally valid; I mean Kelsey's asserted prescriptive right, and that of Mr. Lane, derived through the Faringdons; whose right itself was a mere possessory right, that actually ceased and determined upon Mr. James Faringdon ceasing to be a parishioner in 1821.

With this experience of the mischief that has resulted from a too lavish grant of these faculties in former times, it is the duty of the ordinary to prevent its recurrence by proceeding in this whole matter with the utmost prudence and circumspection. It is especially this, incumbent upon every ordinary looking to the times—with which he is bound to keep pace, in all matters appertaining to his jurisdiction, so far as the [429] same is compatible with his positive duties. Faculties of this sort might issue, a century or two ago, without much or without any impropriety; the issue of which at the present day would be in the highest degree improper. The population of the country, throughout, has immensely increased of late, and is still increasing. Dissent from the church, too, especially among the lower classes, has also increased—and partly, no doubt, from the lower classes being indifferently accommodated with church room, and even being precluded, in many instances, from attending divine worship in their parish churches at all. It is to remedy this want of church room, which is much felt generally, that parliament has granted the vast sum of a million and a half, expressly for building new churches. By aid of this parliamentary fund ninety-eight churches have already been built—accommodation has already been provided for 150,000 persons—and the present applicants for similar accommodation, by means of similar aid, are probably as many more. Large funds have also been raised, in the way of voluntary contribution, by a society for enlarging churches: 370 parishes have been assisted, accordingly, at an expence of 80,000l.; and 110,000 additional sittings in churches have actually been provided. The funds, too, of that society are failing, though new calls upon them are still being made. In the actual expenditure of the funds to which I have just alluded, attention has been paid in both instances to the accommodation of the poor, no less than to that of the higher and middle orders of society. In the new churches to be built by aid of the parliamentary funds, a fifth at least of the room was positively to consist of free sittings for the [430] poor, by an express provision of the legislature: practically, and in fact, a third of the room, taking the new churches throughout, has consisted of free sittings. Of the additional sittings again to be provided by aid of the church-enlarging society, it was a condition expressed that one half should be free sittings. But here again, practically and in fact, the proportion of free sittings to the other has been still greater; for of the 110,000 sittings actually provided, 80,000 are free sittings; about three-fourths of the whole. These are strong features of the times in this particular—of the want of church room generally, and of the propriety of affording additional church room, especially to the poor; and they are not to be overlooked by ordinaries, when applied to on occasions like the present, for obvious reasons. With respect to the poor, indeed—every possible reason exists why no concessions should be made at all likely to infringe upon the due accommodation of the poor in their several parish churches. It is to be presumed that they are the persons most in want of religious instruction; and their title as such in particular to receive it is expressly recognized by the divine founder of Christianity Himself. If disabled from receiving it, by want of room in their parish churches, they are almost driven to seek it in places of dissenting worship—a circumstance exceedingly to be deplored; although they are clearly entitled, and should freely be allowed, to resort to such places of worship if they prefer it; provided, that is, they are really dissenters in opinion from the doctrine or discipline of the church.

Following then the times, and taking all these circumstances into due consideration, a strong case [431] should be made out to induce the ordinary, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to appropriate any pew, by faculty, to a particular parishioner and his family at the present day. True it may be that, at the particular time when the faculty is applied for, its issue may not be generally inconvenient: the parishioners at large may be sufficiently accommodated after and notwithstanding its issue. But in this even, the most favourable case, there are obvious reasons for inducing the ordinary to entertain such applications with a good deal of reserve. For instance, additional room may be soon, or at some time, wanted, suggesting the propriety of new arrangements in the church: but such future arrangements may be formidably obstructed by the actual issue of the faculty then prayed; being, as it is, if once issued, good and valid, even against the ordinary himself. This consideration alone might well induce the ordinary to pause, when applied to for a faculty of this nature, though no present inconvenience should seem to result from its concession to the applicant.

What then, in the first place, is the case set up by Mr. Lane to induce the ordinary to grant him, ex gratiâ, the permanent and exclusive possession of this particular pew? I say ex gratiâ; for as to any claim of right that he has abandoned. It appears to me by no means a strong case. It is founded, merely, upon his connexion, by marriage, with a family, one of the members of which, more than a century ago, presented the parish with a pulpit cloth and a silver salver, said (the latter) to be still in use. But in return for this, in itself no very splendid benefaction, the head and representative of that family has had the exclusive use [432] and possession of this pew, perhaps the best in the church, for more than a century, until the sale of Batnors, the family mansion, in 1820. The parish account with the family, on the score of that benefaction, seems to me to be fairly balanced. Mrs. Lane's claims, as a descendant of the original donee of the pew, are of the very weakest description. She married, and quitted Lingfield in 1807; and she was domiciled with her husband in London, having no connexion whatever with Lingfield, except as an occasional visitor at Batnors for fifteen years. At the expiration of that time Lane becomes a parishioner: but he is a new settler, a novus homo, to all intents in the parish: it is extremely doubtful even whether he was a parishioner at the time when the citation issued which is the foundation of this whole proceeding: he is the tenant of a house scarcely begun to be built at that time: he is entitled, most undoubtedly, to suitable church room for himself and his family; to the best which the circumstances of the parish will afford him, without prejudice to other parishioners. But as reasons for inducing the ordinary to allot him, ex gratiâ, the exclusive and permanent possession of this particular pew by a faculty, the case set up on his part would, under any circumstances of the parish, be, in my judgment, extremely feeble.

But how, secondly, is the parish circumstanced in this particular? What, I mean, is the population of the parish in proportion to the number of sittings in the church, and is it an increasing or a diminishing population? These are necessary enquiries, previous to any grant of a faculty of this description; but they are most necessary, and the result should be most [433] satisfactory in favour of such an applicant to ensure the success of his application. The size of the pew, too, and the proportion of the number of sittings in the pew to that of the applicant's family are also to be taken into the account. It remains to state the result of the evidence on these several particulars; which I think decisive against the application.

In the first place, then, this pew is one of the largest in the whole church, in point of capacity—it appears, I think, that there are only three pews in the church as large, and that there are none larger. It is capable of holding ten or twelve persons, according to Lane's own witnesses; and twelve or fourteen, according to several witnesses examined on the part of the parish. Mr. Lane's family, however, consists of six persons only, including a Miss Faringdon, the wife's sister, and said at present to be domiciled with Mr. Lane.

Next, as to the capacity of the church to accommodate all the parishioners. The parish church of Lingfield appears to be an old collegiate church, with three chancels as they are called, or, more properly, aisles: the number of pews in these aisles is twenty-three—but the aisles themselves, and the pews in them, are the mere private property of three several parishioners, who keep them in repair; and the sittings in these aisles are not open in any sense to the general accommodation of the parishioners. The number of pews in the church is sixty-six; capable of containing, according to the evidence, from six to eight persons each on an average. But the population of Lingfield is fixed at 1770, and the number of families at 325, by authentic documents. Consequently, there are nearly five times as many families as there are pews in the body of the church; and the [434] pews in the body of the church (the only part of it in question), to contain the whole population, should be capable of holding twenty-seven instead of seven persons each. Hence, though sittings in the church may not be necessary for the whole population; and though it may not be necessary again that each family should have a separate pew, yet still the result is that there can be no superabundance of church room; which Mr. Lane undertook to shew, but in which, in my judgment, he has failed. The same inference results from the present arrangement of the church, as I collect it from the evidence. Every part of the body of the church is filled with pews; nor do I understand that there is any accommodation for the lower classes out of the pews but certain benches in the aisle, appropriated in part at least to a Sunday school. This is a large agricultural parish; the labourers, however (many perhaps aged and infirm), should seem to have no free seats with backs, to which they can resort with convenience to attend divine worship in the church. It also appears that several heads of families (respectable farmers) sit together in one pew: their wives and families (in one instance to the number of seven) in another separate pew. This again suggests that the parish is driven to shifts for want of church room. It is a matter of feeling with many to perform their religious duties by the sides of their wives and families. It is matter of practical benefit, so far as may be, to indulge this feeling. Parents, in that case, are more attentive, as setting an example to their children; who are likely to be, and undoubtedly in many instances are, benefited by that example. As a matter, therefore, both of feeling and practical advantage, families should be [435] seated together in church where this can be done; and its not being done in this instance suggests, like all the rest, that this parish church of Lingfield is, even at present, unequal to the fair general accommodation of the parishioners.

But a subject of enquiry, not unimportant, still remains. Is the population of this particular parish an increasing or a diminishing population? For this is obviously a material consideration. Now upon this head the Court is left in no doubt. It appears by the evidence of Sir Thomas Turton, an old parishioner, and Mr. Lane's own witness, that in about thirty years the population of Lingfield has nearly doubled itself; increasing in that time from 900 to 1700 persons. It is still, too, a rapidly increasing population, as results both from the evidence and from the strong probability of the thing. I allude as well to the easy distance of Lingfield from the metropolis as to the several villas, &c., said to have been recently built, and to be now building, in the parish. The very situation indeed of Lingfield, independent of any evidence, renders it utterly improbable, that whilst the population of the country throughout is, as it is, on the increase, that of this particular place, of all others, should be on the decline.

Upon the whole, then, I am of opinion, for the reasons stated, that the present is by no means an application which the ordinary would be justified in acceding to: taking into consideration the merits (so to call them) of the applicant, and the circumstances of this parish in the particulars to which I have just been adverting. And this I do, without at all meaning to say that no possible case may arise in which a faculty of this description might be issued [436] with great propriety, even in these times. For instance, a parishioner might well possibly entitle himself to such a faculty, by contributing liberally to the enlargement, or even the new pewing, of his parish church; in order to furnish additional accommodation for his fellow parishioners, and especially free seats for the poor—a matter this which may soon be called for in this particular parish of Lingfield, and would perhaps be very proper, even now, upon some considerations which have already been stated. A benefactor of this description might have strong claims to a faculty of the kind now prayed. But even the claims of such benefactors should be duly weighed by ordinaries; and the indulgence sought by them should be fettered with all due restrictions and limitations. For instance, in allotting them by faculty good or even the best sittings; ordinaries should be careful at the same time not to afford them a too great proportion of room, or one exceeding their real (actual and probable) wants, to the exclusion of other parishioners: for that would be justifiable under no circumstances. In short, I repeat that it is the ordinary's duty, keeping pace with the times, to proceed in this whole matter at the present day with the utmost care and circumspection.

In respect to costs, of which something was said in the argument—the Court is disposed to make no order upon costs in favour of either party. Of the original litigants, both were in error. From the time, indeed, of the appeal heard, when the Court intimated its opinion that Mr. Lane had little chance of obtaining a faculty, but in the event of the circumstances of this parish being just the reverse of what they appear to the Court to be on the evidence, I think that Mr. Lane [437] should have desisted from his application. From that time, too, it became the duty of the minister and churchwardens, the parties cited specially, and particularly of the latter, ex officio, to put the Court in possession of those facts and circumstances necessary to guide its discretion in the premises; and upon which it has just decided that this application is not one of a nature fit to be acceded to. But, in the hope of promoting conciliation, and with a view to give a triumph to neither party, I am not disposed to accompany the refusal of a faculty, in this instance, with any decree against Mr. Lane for costs. As to the costs of the opposition, those, I am clearly of opinion, should be borne by the parish from the time of the hearing of the appeal. Up to that time the opposition proceeded upon the ground of a particular parishioner's (Kelsey's) asserted right to the pew; a question in which the parish had no concern whatever. I must presume it to have been matter of indifference to the parish to which of these parties, if to either, this pew of right exclusively belonged. Up to that time the parish then may reasonably decline; and leave the costs of the opposition to be defrayed by Kelsey alone.

The churchwardens may possibly wish to know what the Court would recommend to be done on their part with respect to this pew, now ascertained to be at their disposal. Certainly not to seat either Lane or Kelsey exclusively in the pew. Their claims to be seated in it perhaps are pretty equal. Lane, from his marriage into the Faringdon family, may have contracted a something of attachment to the pew, not improper to be gratified to a certain extent and within reasonable limitations. Kelsey, on the other hand, as the now proprietor of Batnors, the owners of which, for [438] the time being, have exclusively occupied this pew for more than a century, may have just reason to complain (at least probably in his own opinion, and in that of many of his fellow parishioners) if actually and altogether dispossessed of it. Not that there are not certain grounds of expediency which would excuse or even justify the churchwardens in declining to seat either of these parties in this particular pew. There are doubtless parishioners whose claims to be seated in it are superior to those of Mr. Lane, a new settler, abstract from his connexion with the Faringdons; which has nothing to do with his being seated in this pew, de jure at least. And with respect to Kelsey—generally speaking, most undoubtedly churchwardens act more correctly in allotting vacant pews to such parishioners as have the best claim to them in point of standing in the parish and general respectability, rather than to those who happen to succeed as tenants of the houses inhabited by the late occupiers of those pews. The occupancy of pews being thus altered from time to time, according to circumstances, is the best provision against the birth or growth of those prescriptive rights to pews, as in certain families, or annexed to certain messuages, the existence of which I have said is so injurious to the general interests of the parishioners. But the present proceedings may have rendered this unnecessary as a measure of precaution in the present instance. Supposing it not to be, and that no other good objection applies to the proceeding now about to be recommended, I see no reason why the present churchwardens should decline allotting this pew to Mr. Lane and Mr. Kelsey jointly or in common. It is sufficiently roomy, according to all the evidence, to accommodate both families. But should [439] the parties in question unfortunately be on such a footing as to render their common occupancy of one and the same pew grating to the feelings of both, or either, it may not, perhaps, under the circumstances, be quite improper that the churchwardens should convert this into two pews. Each of such pews would be capable of holding five or six persons. Mr. Kelsey might be seated in the one of these pews, and Mr. Lane in the other. To this it should seem that there could be no reasonable objection; although of the exact state of the parish in all its details the Court is not in possession of sufficient information to be enabled to form a very decided opinion on this part of the case. It can only, therefore, in conclusion, recommend the churchwardens generally to act impartially in the premises between these and all parties; subject to the principles just laid down. In the performance of this part of their duty they will be assisted by the advice, though they are not governed by the authority, of the minister.

CAMBIASO v. NEGROTTO. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1825.—Quære whether, even on grants of administration to foreigners of the property of foreigners generally, the administrator is not compellable to give bond here in England, with two sureties, British subjects, for the due administration of the effects.

(On motion.)

In this case administration with the will annexed of a Genoese subject had been decreed to the committee of a lunatic, the residuary legatee named in the said will [440] (there being no executor), for his use and benefit. The parties interested in the effects apparently were all Genoese subjects; all resident at Genoa. A question however had been mooted whether the committee were not compellable to give bond with two sureties, British subjects here in England, for the due administration of the effects, in the usual penalty, namely, in the double amount of the effects to be administered; such sureties to justify (this being also, in the particular case, further requisite). And the Court had expressed itself as strongly inclined to doubt whether a mere bond given at Genoa, with Genoese sureties (parties wholly out of its reach and control), would be that "sufficient bond," which the ordinary is required to take on grants of administration, by statute 22 and 23 Car. II. c. 10.

Some arguments had been addressed to the Court by counsel on a preceding Court-day against the necessity of compelling the administrator to give bond, &c. here, at least in the present case; which was under special circumstances: (a) as with reference to which,

The Court now said that it should dispense with sureties being found in this country in the particular instance: intimating at the same time considerable doubts whether it ought not to require this in cases of foreign grants generally.

[441] BROGDEN v. BROWN. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1825.—Lucid intervals are much easier to be proved, as they are much more likely to occur, in cases of delirium than in those of (proper) insanity. And proof of much less capacity is sufficient to sustain a testamentary paper of an "officious" character procured through unsuspected agency than is necessary to sustain a testamentary paper of an opposite description in those particulars, one or both. The rule that where capacity is at all doubtful there must be direct proof of instructions only applies, with any degree of stringency, where the instrument is "inofficious;" and obtained through parties whom it purports, materially, to benefit.

This was a question respecting the legal validity of a testamentary paper, propounded as the last will and testament of Mary Jones, deceased. It was opposed as by reason that the deceased was not of testamentary capacity at the time when the paper was executed. The circumstances of the case are fully stated in the judgment: in which the Court distinguished cases of delirium from those of (proper) insanity; especially in respect of the much greater ease with which a lucid interval is proveable in a case of delirium than in one of (proper) insanity. At the same time, the Court also distinguished between the much greater proof of capacity which it is necessary to sustain an "inofficious" testament; and the much less which is sufficient to establish a will consonant with the testator's natural affections and moral duties; especially being either his own sole act, or one, his coadjutors in which are parties who themselves take no benefit under it.

(a) For instance, the party deceased had died testate: so that the bond was not exacted by force of 22 and 23 Car. II. c. 10. The party too had been dead upwards of seventeen years: so that the creditors probably were all satisfied. Lastly, the committee was the lunatic's eldest son, so appointed by the Courts of Genoa; who probably had taken bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, &c., &c.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The Court has been reminded, not improperly, that it has no power to make wills for parties—in other words, that, however consonant to reason and justice any paper propounded as a will may be, in the Court's view of it, it must still appear to be, in substance and effect, the very act and deed of the deceased, and of no other person or persons whatsoever, acting in the name and on the behalf of the deceased, how well [442] soever intentioned, to be entitled to probate as that for which it is propounded, namely, a valid will. To this as a legal principle the Court readily subscribes. Assuming the instrument now propounded to be intrinsically of the character described in the Court's view of it, is there, or is there not, sufficient on the evidence to satisfy the mind of the Court, under all the circumstances, that the factum of that instrument is justly to be ascribed to the alleged testatrix in the cause herself? This is the question, and the sole question, to which the Court has to address itself.

Mary Jones, the alleged testatrix, died on the 13th of June, 1823. The will propounded bears date on the 12th June, the day preceding, on which very day the deceased lost her only child, a daughter, aged about ten years. The mother and child had sickened with the same disorder on the same day, about ten days preceding; which terminated in the deaths of both on the 12th and 13th days of June, as I have just said. She had been a widow some years.

The deceased left a father, John Brown, party in the cause, the (nominal) opposer of the will; being the only person entitled to her personal estate and effects if dead intestate in law. She also left a brother, Edward Brown, and a sister, Ann M'Gregor —not, however, of course, parties entitled in distribution, as a father was and is still living. Mr. Brogden, who propounds the will as sole executor, is a brother-in-law, having married a sister pre-deceased. The widow, Ann Brown, of John Brown, a brother also pre-deceased, is an attesting witness to the will. The father of the deceased is far advanced in life, and, to say the least, of very doubtful capacity. He appears to have been [443] repeatedly under superintendence as a person non compos mentis. From June, 1819, to June, 1823, when his daughter died, he was so placed in lodgings at Hatfield. It is only upon that event that he is removed to the house of his son, Mr. Edward Brown, in the neighbourhood of London; plainly, I think, by way of colour, and merely in order to the present suit. The real instigator of that suit is the son; though it is necessarily instituted in the name of the father; he being the sole person who has any apparent interest to establish an intestacy.

Next, as to the contents of this will. It is a will under which Mr. Brogden, the sole executor, and who propounds it as such, takes no interest and derives no benefit whatever. It bequeaths the property to him in trust for the father, to the extent of 45l. per annum; the surplus interest or produce, if any, to the brother and sister in equal division: and the principal to the same brother and sister, also in equal division, on the death of the father. The only property not so disposed of is 50l., which Mr. Brogden is empowered by the will to distribute to such persons as he chuses to remember on behalf of the testatrix. Such is the will. Of Mr. Brogden, who propounds it, it may be sufficient to say, without entering into particulars, that his conduct to this whole family from his first connection with it—to the father and to each of the children, and to no one of them more than to this Edward Brown, his real opponent on the present occasion—has been more than merely upright or honourable; it has been generous and benevolent in a very uncommon degree. He was also the sole executor in trust of a will made by the deceased in 1822, in favour of her child; in [444] which, as in that now propounded, he had no interest and took no benefit. It was necessary to say thus much of the character and conduct of Mr. Brogden, being such as I have described, for the following reason:—This circumstance, and that of his being a party purely disinterested in the event of the suit, are material features in a cause of the shape and complexion which this cause has assumed. It is difficult to conceive fraud, or circumvention, both of which are imputed in this cause, to a party, where there is not only no apparent motive for these, but where the whole conduct of the party to whom they are imputed so strongly negatives the imputation, as it clearly appears by the evidence to do in the present instance.

The ground of opposition taken is that the deceased, at and about the whole time when the will purports to bear date, was delirious; and was rendered incapable thereby of making and executing a will, or of doing any other act of that or the like nature, requiring thought, judgment, and reflection. That she was at times delirious for the last three or four days of her life (a period covering the whole transaction of this will) I may say at once is indisputable upon the evidence.

The case then set up in opposition to the will is confessedly one of delirium, as contra-distinguished from fixed mental derangement, or permanent proper insanity. Now the two cases, however similar in some respects, are still distinguished, each from the other, in several particulars; and in no one particular more than in the greater comparative facility of proving a lucid interval in the one, than in the other, case. A principal reason of this is the following:—In cases of [445] permanent proper insanity the proof of a lucid interval is matter of extreme difficulty, as the Court has often had occasion to observe, and for this, among other reasons; namely, that the patient so affected is, not unfrequently, rational to all outward appearance, without any real abatement of his malady: so that in truth and substance he is just as insane in his apparently rational as he is in his visible raving fits. But the apparently rational intervals of persons merely delirious for the most part are really such. Delirium is a fluctuating state of mind, created by temporary excitement; in the absence of which, to be ascertained by the appearance of the patient, the patient is most commonly really insane. Hence, as also indeed from their greater presumed frequency in most instances in cases of delirium, the probabilities, a priori, in favour of a lucid interval, are infinitely stronger in a case of delirium than in one of permanent proper insanity: and the difficulty of proving a lucid interval is less, in the same exact proportion, in the former than it is in the latter case, and has always been so held by this Court.

It appears by the evidence that, on Tuesday, the 10th of June, [1823], the deceased, then for the first time conceiving herself seriously indisposed, sent a message to Mr. Brogden earnestly requesting to see him immediately. He came to her about five or six o'clock. The deceased received him with evident satisfaction; and they were left alone together for about two hours. After he was gone she told the witness who deposes to this, a Miss Bromhead, that she should now die happy—that she had made provision for her dear little girl, whom Mr. Brogden had promised to educate at home, without sending her to a [446] school, of which she expressed a great dislike; and that she "knew she could rely on his word."

In the evening of Wednesday the deceased was visited by Dr. Uwins; both her own condition and that of her child having at that time become extremely alarming. On the following day a second physician, Dr. Cholmely, was also called in. He saw the deceased (the mother) about four o'clock: but the child was dead; having died about two o'clock on that day. That event was attempted, or affected, to be concealed from the mother; but she must have known it; and there are plain indications in the evidence (quite independent of those certain ones, to be collected from the tenor of the instrument now propounded) that she was fully aware of it.

Now the evidence of Dr. Uwins is to this effect. He says that "on the Wednesday evening, and on the morning of Thursday, the deceased was clearly capable of any business: she was of sound mind, and capable of giving instructions for, and making and executing, her will, though in a state of high nervous irritation" (produced, as he had before deposed, rather by anxiety for her child, than by the degree of fever then upon her). When the deponent again saw her on that day, in company with Dr. Cholmely, namely, about four o'clock, he "considers it to be doubtful whether she was capable of doing so or not: his opinion rather is that she was not: there was increase of fever: delirium shewed itself decidedly: she could, and did, answer questions rationally and sensibly when her attention was fixed; but there was a confusion in her mind and an inclination to ramble when her attention was not excited and fixed by questions addressed to her." [447] He says that when he saw her once or twice (he forgets which) afterwards, "she was quite delirious and clearly incapable:" but he adds that he cannot depose to her incapacity at intervals between his visits: "it is not improbable that she might have had lucid intervals," though she was delirious and irrational at the particular period or periods of his visit or visits to her.

The evidence of Dr. Cholmely, an opposing witness, is on the whole less favourable: but he saw the deceased only once, for about a quarter of an hour, in the afternoon of the 12th, at which time her agony as to the state, or rather for the death, of her child was probably at its height. He, indeed, conceives her, at the time of his visit, to have been "quite incapable of any complicated act; undoubtedly of any thing that required fixed attention, or any exercise of mental faculty." Yet even Dr. Cholmely admits that "her attention being strongly roused, she could command it so as to answer simple questions;" and there is nothing whatever, even in his evidence, to negative the probability of a lucid interval of fully sufficient length to cover the whole transaction, the history and real character of which is about to be investigated.

But the Court has also the evidence of a third medical practitioner, Mr. Rolls, to this part of the case; and to what does that amount? In brief, to this—that her delirium was solely produced by those severe paroxysms of bodily pain suffered by the deceased, from time to time, during the last three days of her life; and that this effect subsided with the cause—so that the one was, at no time, scarcely perceptible, but [448] when the other was in actual operation. This deponent fortifies his opinion by references to much that was said, and even to some things that were done, by the deceased during the last forty-eight hours of her life, inferring her perfect capacity: and, although of an inferior rank in the profession to the two other medical gentlemen, of whose evidence I have already disposed, yet I am to recollect that Mr. Rolls is by no means the witness whose testimony should weigh least with the Court upon this particular question, for the following reason:—He had been acquainted with the deceased for years; and seems to have attended her throughout the whole of her last illness with uncommon assiduity: whereas Drs. Uwins and Cholmely were perfect strangers until their introduction to her under the distressing circumstances just alluded to; and were much less likely, therefore, to form a true estimate as to the real state of her mind and its capacity to the act in question, than her apothecary, Mr. Rolls.

Such, then, is an outline of the general evidence as to capacity: next for that to the act itself; I mean, as to the factum of this will.

It appears by this evidence that on the evening of Thursday Mr. Brogden again called on the deceased with a will which he had prepared for her to execute, from instructions which she is pleaded to have given him on the preceding Tuesday. It is proved that he was again left alone with the deceased for more than an hour; and it is pleaded that, at this interview, he received instructions for the new will—that which he had brought with him being necessarily abandoned in consequence of her daughter's death: and that Mr. Brogden went into another room and prepared a will [449] accordingly; which is admitted to have been presently executed by the deceased, as I shall state in the sequel, and to be the identical paper propounded.

Now, Mr. Brogden being party in the cause, and the sole person present at the giving of the instructions pleaded, the fact of any instructions being given is one plainly incapable of any direct proof. But instructions may be presumed, from the conduct of the party to whom they are pleaded to have been given, and from that of the several other parties engaged in the same general transaction at the time without any direct proof; and this, if any, is precisely the case in which that presumption may safely be acted upon. The rule that where capacity is at all doubtful there must be direct proof of instructions, only applies, or at least only applies with any degree of stringency, where the instrument is inofficious, or where it is obtained by a party materially benefited; or, a fortiori, where it is both. It has really no application to a will prepared by an agent, purely disinterested, and whose character for perfect integrity and benevolence stands so high as that of Mr. Brodgen: and of which at the same time the dispositive part is so just and so proper, so consonant to the deceased's natural affections and moral duties, that it speaks for itself, and carries, upon the face of it, its own recommendation. Such an alleged will, if suggested, the Court may readily presume that the alleged testator would acquiesce in, and adopt, if not wholly deprived of consciousness: and mere acquiescence and adoption in such a case would so compensate for any want of direct evidence of instructions given, a priori, that proof of these alone, in conjunction [450] with proof of almost any, whatever, glimmering of capacity at the time of the execution, would be good to support the will; and would sufficiently indicate mind and volition to justify a Court of probate in pronouncing for it as a genuine and valid will, in my judgment.

The application of these principles to the case before the Court will render the conclusion at which it is bound to arrive upon it inevitable. In the evidence as to general capacity, I have already said that there is nothing whatever to negative the probability of full capacity, at least at intervals; quite the contrary. I come then to the act of execution—and what does the evidence as to that suggest; or at least the only part of it upon which the Court can place the slightest degree of reliance? It furnishes full proof of mind and volition on the part of the deceased; and as fully negatives all suspicion of any unfairness, on the part of Mr. Brogden, in the whole conduct of the transaction. The preparation of the will being completed, he returns with it to the deceased's bed-room: it is then and there read over to the deceased (an admitted fact) in the presence of this Edward Brown, the brother of Ann Brown, the sister-in-law, and of a young woman in the deceased's service, named Robson, the two last attesting witnesses. The deceased is sitting up in bed, without support; in great affliction, no doubt, but perfectly calm, and with nothing whatever in the evidence, entitled to one jot or tittle of belief, to suggest to my mind any appearance even of wandering or delirium at that time. The will is then put before her, which she subscribes in her usual form, with a dash below: and [451] with the attestation of the instrument by Robson and Mrs. Ann Brown the transaction terminates. Of these attesting witnesses, Robson, the one, speaks to full capacity. The deposition of the other, Mrs. Ann Brown (as well as that of Mr. Edward Brown, a present, though not an attesting, witness), tells a different story: but in the conduct at the time and long after of both these witnesses (of the attesting witness especially) the Court has evidence of the same tenor with that furnished, both by the conduct at the time, and by the present testimony of Robson, too firm to be shaken by any opinions which they now venture, pretty unreservedly, to express that the deceased, at the period of this transaction, was delirious and incapable. As to Ann Brown, she is a witness deposing against her own act: she attested the will, not taken by surprize, but with a perfect knowledge, I must presume, of the true tenor and import of that attestation, and of what the Court is bound to infer from it; as well as from her conduct in the premises, as it appears in the evidence long after. For instance, both this witness and Edward Brown were not only present at the reading over, and actual execution, of the will, but they were both present at a second reading of the will after the deceased's funeral: still no objection whatever on the score of that incapacity of the deceased which they now both depose to was intimated by either of those persons, at either of those occasions; or, I repeat, till long after, that I am able to discover. Again, ten days after, Mr. Brogden is sworn as executor; no caveat in the goods of the deceased has been entered in that interval; all parties are acquiescing. Ann Brown takes a donation, in the [452] nature of a legacy, as under the will.(a) As executor, Mr. Brogden administers the effects; converts the property; contributes to the father's maintenance. At last, however, probate is prevented from actually issuing, by a caveat: and Mr. Edward Brown, dissatisfied, as it should seem, at the executor's not chusing to suffer him to appropriate a chest full of china and other articles, to which he had, or laid, some claim, thinks fit to institute this suit in the name of his lunatic, or at least imbecile, father; in which he is himself (in effect produces himself as) a witness to the deceased's incapacity; against the uniform tenor, as already explained, of his whole conduct persisted in up to that time; from which the Court is bound to infer that the deceased had capacity, and that the will is valid. As for his sister-in-law and fellow witness, Mrs. Ann Brown, what may have induced her to take a similar part upon this occasion it would be useless to conjecture. Not only is her present deposition neutralized, to say the least of is, by her prior conduct in the premises, but she is directly and positively contradicted as to facts which she has deposed to (one in particular) in a manner which, with the rest, leaves her unworthy of the slightest belief. She says that in the course of the day on which the deceased died, she, the witness, having mentioned to Dr. Uwins that the deceased had made a will on the preceding evening, he, Dr. Uwins, replied, "Oh, that's of no more use than a piece of brown paper: " this in the presence of Mr. Rolls. Now, Dr. Uwins positively denies having made any observation of the sort, to any person whatever, at any [453] time, either in the presence or absence of Rolls; and he is as positively confirmed by Mr. Rolls, to this at least (the only feasible) extent—that no observation of the kind was ever made by Dr. Uwins in his presence.

Upon the whole I am quite satisfied that the institution of this suit, in the name of the father, is a mere scheme produced by an afterthought of the son—his object being to get possession himself of the deceased's property, and unincumbered with the trusteeship of Mr. Brogden. For the sake even of that father, the (nominal) opponent, I pronounce for the will: convinced as I am, that he is far better off in the hands of his trustee, Mr. Brogden, than he would be in those of his son, Mr. Edward Brown. With respect to costs—the son is fixed with the costs of opposing this will already: he admits upon an interrogatory that he has undertaken for these. The Court regrets that it has no power to condemn him in the costs to which the executor has been put, through his means of sustaining it. The father, indeed, the (nominal) party in the cause, it might condemn in these: but a sentence to that effect would be futile in itself; nor, I am sure, does the executor wish it. It is upon this consideration only that in pronouncing for the will I give no costs.

[454] COOPER v. GREEN. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1825.—In all cases of " process " served on a minor, the Court requires a certificate of its having been served in the presence of the natural or legal guardian of the minor; or at least in that of some person or persons upon whom the actual care and custody of the minor, for the time being, has properly devolved.

(On motion.)

This was a cause of business of accepting or refusing letters of administration (with the will annexed) of Leah Jones, deceased; or, otherwise, of shewing cause why the same should not be committed and granted to John Cooper, a creditor of the deceased; promoted by the said John Cooper against Eliza Green, spinster, a minor, the residuary legatee, there being no executor named in the said will. A decree to that effect had issued with the usual intimation; had been personally served on the minor, and returned into Court; and letters of administration were now prayed, pursuant to the tenor of that decree.

The Court signified that under the circumstances it required further information by affidavit, both as to the amount of the property, and also as to that, and the nature of the debt: intimating at the same time, that in all cases of process served on a minor it required to be certified of its being served in the presence of the natural or legal guardian of the minor; or, at least, in that of some person or persons upon whom the actual care and custody of the minor for the time being had properly devolved. The " certificate " in this case was of a " personal service " on the minor merely.

Accordingly it directed the motion to stand over generally.

[455] MARTINEAU v. REDE AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1825. —Before granting letters of administration to a creditor, the Court always requires an affidavit as to the amount of the property to be administered; where there has been no personal service of the usual citation on the parties entitled to the administration in the first instance.

(On motion.)

This was an application for administration of the goods of William Oxberry, deceased, at the suit of a creditor of the deceased to the amount of 1100l. and upwards. The whole property of the deceased was said to be under 1000l. in value: still, however, there was no statement on affidavit as to the amount of property exhibited. But

Per Curiam. This is not absolutely necessary where, as in this case, there has been a personal service of the usual citation on the parties entitled to the administration in the first instance—otherwise the Court always requires it.

Motion granted.

GIBBENS AND GIBBENS v. CROSS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1825.— A will is presumptively revoked by the testator marrying and having issue. That presumption, however (the strength of which varies according to circumstances) may be rebutted by evidence (strong in proportion) to shew that the testator meant it to operate, notwithstanding his marriage and the birth of issue: but such evidence, to be effectual, must satisfy the Court as to this, unequivocally. A formal codicil, subsequent, referring in direct terms to that identical will, would undoubtedly, as a republication of the will, be effectual to this.

This was the case of a will presumptively revoked by marriage and the birth of issue; in which the presumption was sought to be rebutted, by evidence tending to shew that the deceased meant it to operate.

[456] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased in this cause, George Cross, made a will bearing date the 14th of May, 1820, regularly executed and attested, by which he disposed of his whole property, real and personal, pretty equally, among his nephews and nieces. It is by one of these nieces, Mary Cross Gibbens, and her husband James Gibbens, the surviving executors, that this will is now propounded. The deceased at the time of making it was a widower without children; and the nephews and nieces, whom it purports to benefit, were his next of kin.

But in the month of December, 1820, the deceased intermarried with Mary Cross (the other party in the cause, contending for an intestacy in law), his present widow: and they had issue of their marriage, a daughter born on the 14th of February, 1822; and a son born on the 13th of January, 1824. About five weeks after this, namely, on Saturday, the 21st of February, in that year, the deceased was suddenly struck with apoplexy, so as to deprive him totally of his faculties, as well mental as bodily: in which state he continued till the following Monday, when he died.

Now the will, such as I have described it, is clearly revoked, primâ facie; for if a testator after making his will, marries and has issue, that will is presumptively revoked. Still, however, it is only presumptively revoked; and the legal presumption that it is, like any other legal presumption, is subject to be rebutted. The difficulty of rebutting it is greater or less, according to circumstances. In the present case, for instance, it is enhanced by the circumstance of there being two [457] children, issue of the marriage, one of them a son; especially as the will disposes both of real and personal property. The presumption to be rebutted is the ordinary legal presumption (for to have raised that, marriage and the birth of a single child would have sufficed), somewhat fortified: and the evidence to rebut it must be strong in proportion. It must satisfy the Court unequivocally that the deceased meant and intended this will to operate, notwithstanding that presumed change of intention, consequent upon his altered circumstances; with reference to which the law deems it to be revoked, primâ facie. It rests with the parties setting up the will to produce such evidence to the Court. The onus probandi is clearly upon them: for they are the parties undertaking to rebut the legal presumption as to its being revoked.

Now they have attempted to effect this, in the first place, by pleading disaffection to the wife—and witnesses are produced to this, and to certain declarations which are also pleaded, purporting that the deceased meant to abide by his former will. But of serious permanent disaffection to the wife there is no proof—the contrary, indeed, is pleaded on the part of the wife, and, I think, is fully proved. Again, of declarations to abide by his former will, the principal, and spoken to by a witness eighty years of age after an interval of six months, turns out to have been words of mere heat and passion, produced by a transient quarrel with the wife; by no means inferring any thing like a deliberate intention on the part of the deceased to carry his threats into effect. On the contrary, there are declarations infinitely more likely to be sincere, and infinitely less likely to be misrepresented, utterly inconsistent with [458] any intention on the part of the testator to adhere to the will now propounded. These are spoken to by the medical man who attended the wife on the occasions of both her confinements; and by his attorney, to whom the deceased repeatedly expressed, in substance, an intention to make a new will; as in the month of September, 1823, and in that of January, 1824. Looking, then, to the state of his affections, as it appears on the evidence, I see no reason for concluding it at all likely that the deceased should prefer his nephews and nieces to his wife and his children —and with respect to testamentary declarations, the evidence is such as to satisfy my mind that they fortify and confirm, instead of weakening or impugning, the presumption said to be rebutted.

But this effect, again, is sought to be ascribed to a codicil made, it is said, a few days after the birth of his first child. This has been argued to amount to a republication of the will, so as to leave no doubt of the testator's intending it to operate. Now had the deceased proceeded on that day to execute a formal codicil, referring in direct and express terms to this identical will, the Court, I admit, must have so considered it, and would have been bound to pronounce the presumption adverse to the will effectually rebutted. But I am inclined to think, for several reasons, that no such legal effect can be ascribed to it. In the first place, it is an extremely imperfect paper, unattested, and with blanks unsupplied the body of it; although the deceased, supposing it to have been written in February, 1822, survived the making of this codicil two whole years. But, secondly, and principally, its reference to the identical will now propounded [459] is extremely equivocal. It begins, "This is a codicil to my will dated the 18th of February, 1822." Now the reference here (18th February, 1822) should seem to be to a will of that date, and not to signify that the codicil was made on that day—especially as a date 1822 (generally) appears at the foot of the codicil. This, undoubtedly, is the grammatical construction of the phrase; for the substantive will (not codicil) is that which last immediately precedes the date in question. True it is that no will of that date appears: but it is far from improbable that a will of that date, or something in the nature of a will, was actually made by the deceased. He had a daughter born on the 14th of February in that year. It is very probable that he soon after made a will to provide for that daughter; and that the codicil in question had reference to that will, and not to the will of 1820, now propounded. At all events, the reference of the codicil in question to the will now propounded is equivocal; and it is not, therefore, sufficient, in my judgment, to amount to a republication of that will so as to rebut the presumption that he had intentionally abandoned it—fortified as it is, instead of being weakened, or detracted from, by what appears in the evidence as to the state of his affections, and even as to his testamentary declarations, in my view of their effect. The circumstance of this codicil being found in the same envelope with the will of 1820 by no means unequivocally proves that it was deposited there, in order to its being considered a part of that will. It has various bends and folds, and so has the envelope; which renders it probable that it was not deposited there, in contact with that will, immediately, and in the first instance.

[460] Lastly, there is a third testamentary paper before the Court, every way imperfect, indeed, and without date or signature, but not unimportant in the cause. As to the particular time when this was written, all which appears is, that it was subsequent to the birth of the daughter but preceded that of the son. It is not impossible that this was the "will" (so styled) meant to be referred to by the codicil, supposed to have republished the will of 1820. But be that as it may, this third paper, though inoperative per se, under the circumstances, notwithstanding the sudden death of the testator, is strong to repel the notion of any intentional adherence on his part to the will of 1820. For its object is to postpone the nephews and nieces to the wife and children; giving the bulk of the property to the wife and her issue in the first instance.

Upon the whole, if the legal presumption were the other way—did the law presume the will of 1820 to be adhered to, instead of presuming it, as it does, to be abandoned —I am of opinion that this third paper, coupled with the evidence as to the state of his affections, and as to his intention of making a new will altogether, would be almost sufficient to repel that presumption, and to compel the Court to pronounce for an intestacy. But the actual, legal presumption being as it is; and being, as it is, fortified and confirmed by the evidence, in every part, as well as by this third paper, I pronounce the will of 1820 to be revoked; and that this deceased is dead, so far as appears, intestate in law.

[461] IN THE GOODS OF DON FRANCISCO RIOBOO, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1825.—Administration, under certain limitations, of the goods of a foreigner decreed to the substituted attorney of his executors, with an official copy annexed of "extracts" (only) "from his will"—such extracts consisting of the beginning and ending of the will; and of two clauses therein; the one containing the appointment of executors; and the other a bequest of the testator's (only) property in this country.

(On motion.)

Don Francisco Rioboo, late of Lima, died several years ago in Lima, having made his will, bearing date the 15th of June, 1819, of which he appointed certain executors, who appeared to have taken various steps relative to the effects of the testator in the Courts at Lima.

The testator had remitted 40,000 dollars to two mercantile houses in London, at interest; each having received 20,000 dollars; in whose hands such sums, with interest, were still remaining.

An official extract consisting of the inception of this will—a clause therein (the 34th) being that bequeathing these 40,000 dollars—the appointment of executors—and the concluding part of the will, had been transmitted to this country; together with a power of attorney from the executors, and a substitution under it to Samuel Winter, Esq., of London, authorising him to recover from Messrs. Darthez Brothers, merchants in London, such sum or sums of money as might be in [462] their hands, belonging to the estate of the testator; and to take all needful measures for the recovery thereof, before all competent tribunals—Messrs. Darthez being one of the two houses, to each of which 20,000 dollars, as already said, had been remitted by the testator in his life time. No other property belonging to the said testator than the said 40,000 dollars, with interest, was in this country.

The extract, as above, from the said will, together with authenticated copies of the probate of the same granted by, and of several petitions and decrees relative thereto had before, the legal Spanish authorities at Lima were now exhibited: as also were the power of attorney and substitution to Mr. Winter, in the Spanish language, with notarial translations and affidavits in verification of the several facts stated in the case. Whereupon

The Court was pleased, on motion of counsel, to decree administration, with the said extract from the said will annexed, limited to the effects of the deceased in the hands of Messrs. Darthez, merchants, in London (and also further limited until the will itself, or a more authentic copy of the extract, should be brought into the registry), to Mr. Winter, as substituted attorney of the executors named in the same.

[463] WILLIAMS v. GOODYER. Consistory Court of London, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1825.—Quære, whether one who chides and brawls in a vestry room partly in and partly out of a church-yard incurs thereby the penalties of 5 and 6 Edward VI. c. 4, s. 1.—And quære, whether the gross abuse of a minister, while presiding at a meeting of his parishioners in vestry, be not an ecclesiastical offence, and punishable, as such, by the general ecclesiastical law: although it be not liable to be dealt with as a "chiding and brawling" within the statute of 5 and 6 Edward VI. by reason that the vestry was clearly not held in a consecrated place, i.e. within a church or church-yard.

This was a cause of office, promoted by the Rev. Theodore Williams, vicar of Hendon, in the county of Middlesex and diocese of London, against James Goodyer, a parishioner, for "quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, by words, at a vestry meeting, in the vestry room belonging to, and situate in the church-yard of, the said parish of Hendon"—and also for "using scurrilous and insulting language to the Rev. Theodore Williams, clerk, the vicar of the said parish, while presiding as chairman of the said vestry."

The articles, after pleading the statute of Edward VI. against quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, by words, in any church or church-yard—and also that, by the laws, canons, and constitutions ecclesiastical of this realm, all persons are bound to demean themselves orderly, soberly, and peaceably, in chapels, churches, and church-yards, upon pain of ecclesiastical censure—proceeded to charge Mr. Goodyer, specifically, with the offence (or offences) in question—expressly pleaded to have been committed at "a monthly vestry meeting, held on the 29th of October, 1823, in the vestry room belonging to, and situate in the church-yard of, the parish of Hendon, for the purposes of auditing the overseers' accounts, and other parish business;" at which Mr. Williams, as vicar of the parish, was in the chair.

[464] In answer to this, it was pleaded on the part of the defendant that the articles were false; at least in that part of them which alleged that the said vestry meeting was held in a room situate in the church-yard of the said parish of Hendon—for that, in truth and fact, "the articulate vestry meeting was held in a certain room, called the parlour, situate on the ground floor of an inn, alehouse, or public house, known by the name or sign of the Greyhound, that the said house is licensed as a public house—that the said room or parlour is constantly used by persons resorting to the said public house for entertainment or refreshment—that parish dinners for the said parish are, usually, had in the said room or parlour—that public ordinaries, or dinners, on Sundays, and on other days, are frequently held in the same—that balls and dances are occasionally given therein—and that no part of the said room or parlour or of the public house of which the same is a part is situated in the churchyard of the said parish of Hendon." The allegation also went into circumstances to shew that the true character of the transaction articulate was not that ascribed to it in the articles; and that the offensive expressions imputed to Mr. Goodyer, in answer to an observation of Mr. Williams, the vicar, were not meant to apply to that gentleman personally; but to some anonymous informant, upon whose authority the remark that provoked them was avowedly made.

A second plea on the part of Mr. Williams was now tendered, in reply to that of the defendant, pleading in substance—

That "the inn known by the name or sign of the Greyhound, situate in the parish of Hendon, was [465] formerly 'the church house,' and adjoins to, and the back of the same abuts on the church-yard of the said parish—that at various times subsequent to the year 1754 divers alterations and repairs have been made in the said inn; and, at some such times, considerable encroachments have been made on the said church-yard, parts of which have been taken into the said inn—particularly, that the room in the said inn, called the parlour, was enlarged, or built out, upon the churchyard of the said parish—and that at the present time the said parlour does encroach upon the said church-yard to the extent of thirty superficial feet or thereabouts." In part supply of proof, a plan of the church-yard of Hendon, taken by an experienced surveyor in the year 1754 at the expence of the then lord of the manor of Hendon, was annexed to the allegation—as also was a second plan of the same, taken also, as pleaded, by an experienced surveyor, in the present year 1825—and it was expressly pleaded that, on a careful comparison of the two, the encroachment of the parlour of the Greyhound inn upon the parish church-yard of Hendon, to the extent of thirty, at least, superficial feet, as before pleaded, subsequent to the year 1754, was distinctly apparent.

The admission of this allegation was opposed on the part of the defendant. It was said, it furnishes no answer to the case laid by the defendant. It admits that the meeting was held at a public house; in a room or parlour, constantly used by persons frequenting the said public house, in manner as, and for the purposes stated by, the defendant in his allegation; in doing which it admits the defendant's whole case. Granting the fact to be, as pleaded, that a part of this room or [466] parlour (a comparatively small part) is locally situate within the true boundary of the churchyard, it would fail to sustain this the original case as charged in the articles: nor would the defendant, clearly, be subject (it was said) to the penalties of brawling by words in a church-yard for any words whatsoever uttered in such a place, howsoever proved. It was also argued that no evidence upon the plea was likely to satisfy the Court as to the truth of the main fact pleaded: though it was admitted that the fact must be taken as true for the purpose of the argument: its relevancy being the sole point strictly cognizable by the Court in this stage of the cause.

In support of the allegation it was urged, on the other hand, that the fact now pleaded of a part of this room or parlour being within the church-yard, coupled with those other admitted facts of the house itself being church property, and this particular room or parlour being immemorially used as the parish vestry room, was sufficient to sustain the description of it contained in the articles; and to subject the defendant, if proved to have uttered there the words imputed to him, to the penalties of having chode or brawled in a consecrated place. It was also said that to disturb an incumbent while presiding at a meeting of his parishioners in vestry, in the manner charged in the articles, was an ecclesiastical offence by the general ecclesiastical law; although the vestry were not held in a consecrated place, or within a church or church-yard. But this last part of the argument, it should seem, rather went to the defendant's conduct, viewed in another light, and to the general merits of the case, than was applicable to the question immediately before [467] the Court, the admissibility of this particular allegation.

The Court said it should admit the allegation, if this were insisted upon, not deeming it so clearly irrelevant as if proved to be of no possible weight and efficacy at the final hearing of the cause. At the same time, it earnestly recommended that the case should be adjusted out of Court for the sake of both parties—looking to the difficulties which must attend its progress, and the uncertainty of what the result would be.(a)[1]

[468] ATKINSON v. ATKINSON. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1825.—A witness, upon cross examination, is compellable, if required by the ministrant, to produce all written communications addressed to him, the witness, by the solicitor or other agent of the producent relative to his examination as a witness in the cause.

[See further, p. 484, post.]

(By letters of request from the diocese of Winchester.)

(On motion.)

This was a cause of divorce or separation a mensâ et thoro by means of cruelty (a)[2] and adultery, promoted by Elizabeth Atkinson, of Alverstoke, in the county of Southampton and diocese of Winchester, against her husband, Thomas Atkinson.

The following interrogatory had been addressed to William Price, surgeon, a witness on the libel.

Let the witness, William Price, be asked—"Are you not well acquainted with Mr. Weddell? (b) Did not the said Mr. Weddell call upon you to become a witness in this cause? Has he at any time, and when, made suggestions or remarks to you, concerning the [469] ministrant, adapted to prejudice the ministrant in your esteem? Has he not told you that a tremendous and most disgraceful case would be established against the ministrant? On your oath, has not Mr. Weddell, either by letters (if by letters, let the witness be desired, if they are in his possession, to leave them with the examiner to be annexed to his deposition), or verbally, requested you to state, that you at one time attended the ministrant when afflicted with the venereal disease, or, that you might safely depose to that effect? Let the witness be desired to set forth all that passed between him and the said Mr. Weddell on the subject interrogate."

In answer to this interrogatory, the witness had deposed in substance.

"That he, the respondent, was well acquainted with Mr. Weddell—that Mr. Weddell did call upon him to be a witness in this cause—that he had expressed to the respondent, and stated reasons for it, a very unfavourable opinion of the ministrant; and that such opinions and reasons were certainly calculated to prejudice the ministrant in the mind of the respondent, whatever opinion he might have previously entertained of him; but that such, Mr. Weddell's communications, were private and confidential—that Mr. Weddell has expressed himself to the respondent as sanguine that the charges against the ministrant would be proved; but he, the respondent, forgets in what particular terms—that Mr. Weddell applied to the respondent, both verbally and by letter, respecting his becoming a witness: on such verbal application, he asked the respondent whether he, the respondent, had not attended the ministrant for a venereal complaint; but without, otherwise, requesting the res-[470]-pondent to state such to be the fact, or observing that he might safely so depose (a)[3]—the respondent has four or five letters which he received from Mr. Weddell on the subject interrogate, but he refuses to deliver them to the examiner, as desired by the interrogatory, or to state the contents of them, unless compelled so to do by the mandate of the Court—his reason for such a refusal is not a wish to benefit either party in the (a)[1] The parties to the suit, profiting by this advice of the Court, came to an amicable arrangement—and the suit itself was afterwards on the same court day dismissed by mutual consent. No costs were given on either side.

---

(a)[2] The Court, on the admission of the libel, had directed the articles charging cruelty to be struck out.

(b) Mr. Weddell was the producent's solicitor. It appeared in the cause that he had formerly been the solicitor of Mr. Atkinson; and was now employed by his wife against him. Mr. Weddell himself also was a witness examined on the libel.

(a)[3] The witness's deposition to this part of the case in effect was—that the complaint for which he had attended the ministrant was a gonorrhea—that such a complaint may originate from other causes, though it actually does originate in the one suggested in the libel in nine cases out of ten—lastly, that he, the witness, had made no inquiries at the time as to the manner in which it actually did originate in the instance in question.

cause—it merely proceeds from his considering that a delivery up of the said letters, unless by the directions of an authority that he is bound to obey, would be, on his part, an unjustifiable breach and violation of private confidence."

The Court was now moved by counsel to decree a monition against the witness Price—calling upon him to bring into, and leave in, the registry of the Court the letters so referred to by him in his deposition—such letters being communications from the solicitor of Mrs. Atkinson, and addressed to the witness upon the subject of his examination.

Court. I think that the witness is bound to produce the letters. If, upon cross examination, a witness is bound to state verbal communications between himself and the producent's solicitor relative to his examination; it seems to me that he is compellable, a fortiori, to produce written ones. Verbal communications may [471] have been misinterpreted by the witness, or may be mis-stated, through the witness's imperfect recollection of them, to the necessary prejudice of one of the litigant parties. Written communications speak for themselves; being independent of the witness's memory—and upon the tenor of such, in point of propriety or impropriety, the Court is able to put its own interpretation. The letters in question, I observe, are not suggested to be relative to confidential matters of any other sort: the witness expressly restricts them in his deposition to the subject interrogate, namely, that of his examination as a witness in the cause. Unless the letters are procurable from the witness by other means, let the monition issue, as prayed.

BRUCE against BURKE. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1825.—A marriage in Ireland in a private house at any hour of the day or night is valid, if celebrated by a person in holy orders, between two Papists, according to some Catholic ritual. A marriage so celebrated between two parties in a private house in Ireland alleged to be null by reason (a sure ground of nullity) that one of the said two parties was a Protestant. That alleged ground of nullity held not to be sustained: and consequently a second marriage, de facto, of that one of the said two parties, in the life time of the other, pronounced null and void.—It is competent to a party to set up the nullity of a first marriage in bar of a sentence prayed of the nullity of a second by reason of that first: though he is convict already of bigamy in respect of the said two marriages.

(By letters of request from the official principal of the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Winchester.)

This was a cause of nullity of marriage, on account of a former subsisting marriage, promoted on behalf of Mary Anne Bruce, against Tobias Burke. The defence set up was the alleged nullity of the former (an Irish) marriage; under the circumstances stated in the judgment.

[472] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit of nullity of marriage promoted and brought by Mary Anne Bruce against Tobias Burke—the alleged ground of such nullity being that he, the defendant, had a wife living at the time of his marriage, de facto, with the plaintiff or complainant. Most of the facts are indisputably proved. I mean the following. The double marriage of a Tobias Burke, first with Mary Butler in June, 1815, and secondly with Mary Anne Bruce, the complainant, in December, 1820, living the said Mary Butler, is indisputably proved. It is also indisputably proved that a Tobias Burke was indicted at the Old Bailey, in 1822, for having so feloniously, in the life time of a first wife, intermarried with Mary Anne Bruce, the present complainant—that he was convicted of the felony in the said indictment specified and sentenced to transportation for seven years—and that at the time of the issue of the citation in this cause he was and, I may add, still is, a convict on board the "Leviathan," a convict hulk lying in Portsmouth harbour. The identity of this Tobias Burke with Tobias Burke the party proceeded against in this suit, and of the second marriage in respect of which he was so convicted of bigamy, with that of which a sentence of nullity is now prayed, is also, I think, amply established. In addition to the substantive proofs of such double identity, I observe that the defence set up plainly admits it. For the defence set up is not a diversity in either; but that at the time of the first marriage the defendant, admitting his identity and that of his second marriage with the marriage now sought to be annulled, was a Protes-[473]-tant—his said first marriage being pleaded and proved to have been celebrated in a private house at Cashel, in Ireland, by a Popish priest, and to be a valid marriage, both parties being Papists, on the one hand (a)—and it being expressly pleaded and proved to be essential to the validity of a marriage so celebrated, on the other hand, that at the time of its actual celebration both the contracting parties should be Papists.(b)

[474] The first marriage, then, as I have just said, was celebrated at Cashel in June, 1815—and it is proved, and indeed admitted on all hands, to have been a valid marriage, if both parties were Papists. It is in the negation of this last particular, as to one of the parties, that the defence set up solely consists. Accordingly, the substance of the defensive plea is that Burke, the defendant, was born at Templederry, in the county of Tipperary, in the year 1794; and was baptized in that year by the then vicar of the parish, a priest, or minister, in holy orders, of the Church of Ireland—that in 1801 he was sent for education to a Protestant school in Templederry—that from 1807 to 1811 he was resident with a wine and spirit merchant, to whom he had been apprenticed in the first of those years, at Carlow—and that in 1811 he went to Dublin and there continued up to the period of his pretended marriage (so styled in the allegation) with Mary Butler, [475] in June, 1815. And the allegation expressly pleads that during the whole of the above period (but more particularly for the last twelve months anterior to the said pretended marriage) he, Burke, was and professed himself to be a Protestant of the Church of Ireland—attended divine service in churches of the Protestant communion—and conformed to the rules and ordinances of the Protestant establishment.

It thus appears, by his own plea, that Burke was a native of Tipperary, not far from Cashel; and that he had been resident in Dublin for some years prior to June, 1815. And it appears, by the evidence of a witness named Willis, that he had occupied and carried on business as a spirit dealer in a house situate in North King street,

(a) The libel pleaded that "by the law prevailing and established in Ireland in the year of our Lord 1815 and long before, in that part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, a marriage had and celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest, in a private house, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, between two persons, both of the Roman Catholic religion, was and is valid to all intents and purposes whatever in law." This article of the libel was deposed to in terms of positive affirmance by two gentlemen, barristers, each of whom had practised at the Irish bar. According to their evidence "there is no restriction of time or place as to Catholic marriages in Ireland—a private house is as good as a church and the afternoon or evening as any canonical hour." The marriage, however, must be "by a Roman Catholic priest, or a person in orders (for a Protestant minister will do as well), and according to the form of the Roman Catholic ritual," as it is expressed by one of those gentlemen. The other expresses it: "It may be celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest, or a priest of any other denomination. But it must be by the Roman Catholic form, or at least some form that unites the parties in the state of matrimony." The form of marriage as celebrated according to the ritual used in the Roman Catholic Church was stated at length by a witness examined on the libel, Mr. Henry, a Catholic priest, in answer to a special interrogatory addressed to him as to that particular.

(b) The defensive allegation pleaded art. 1. "That in and by an act of parliament, passed in the kingdom of Ireland, in the nineteenth year of his late majesty King Geo. II. c. 13, entitled 'an act for annulling all marriages to be celebrated by any Romish priest between Protestant and Protestant, or between Protestant and Papist, and to amend and make more effectual, an act passed in this kingdom, in the sixth year of her late majesty Queen Anne, entitled an act for the more effectual preventing the carrying away and marrying children against the wills of their parents and guardians;' it is, amongst other things, enacted in the words, or to the effect following, to wit—that every marriage that shall be celebrated after the first day of May, which shall be in the year of our Lord God, 1746, between a Papist and any person who hath been and professed himself to be a Protestant, at any time before such celebration of marriage; or between two Protestants; if celebrated by a Popish priest, shall be and is hereby declared absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes, without any process, judgment, or sentence of law whatsoever." No exhibit was annexed to, or witness examined upon, this article—the act in question being expressly so pleaded a public act and as such to be known and taken notice of by all judges and courts of judicature.

Dublin, from the month of March, 1814, to that of September, 1815, including the twelve months immediately preceding his marriage; during which it is pleaded in particular that he, Burke, was, and professed himself to be, a Protestant. Willis is confident as to dates; having purchased of Burke the remainder of his term in the house in North King street, on his quitting it in September, 1815.

Being so resident in North King street, it appears that Burke became acquainted with his then future wife, Mary Butler, on occasions of her accompanying her father from Cashel, where he resided, to Dublin. Butler, the father, who was a leather merchant, often went from Cashel to Dublin on business; and sometimes, at least, lodged with Burke in North King street during his stay in Dublin. After a short courtship, Burke proceeds to Cashel, the residence of the wife's father, in order to be married there, at Cashel; taking with him a certificate from his parish priest, in [476] Dublin, as to the fact of his being a Catholic—this it seems being always required of a non-parishioner, before a Roman Catholic priest will venture to celebrate the marriage of a non-parishioner as a Roman Catholic and according to Catholic rites. The witness Ryan (a sister of Mary Butler) positively deposes to having seen and read such certificate the evening before the marriage; as also to its actual production by Burke to the officiating priest, at the time of the wedding. Indeed, the penalty to which every Catholic priest is liable for celebrating a marriage between a Catholic and a Protestant (a) creates a strong presumption that such, the usual, precaution was taken in the instance in question, independent of the positive proof of that fact furnished by Ryan's testimony. And I must also presume that the priest who granted the certificate was satisfied as to Burke being a Papist—a matter this with respect to which he could not well be mistaken; as Burke had been for the preceding twelve months residing in one and the same house in his parish, that in North King street.

At Cashel, then, in the house of the wife's father, Burke and the first wife, Mary Butler, were married according to the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church by Dr. Wright, the then parish priest of Cashel, but who is since dead: the marriage is deposed to by two witnesses actually then and there present; and it clearly was a valid marriage, both parties being Papists.

As to the wife this admits of no question—and it should seem to admit of as little with respect to the [477] husband, even upon the facts in evidence already stated. Added to which, every circumstance of the case is strongly corroborative of the fact of Burke being of the Catholic persuasion. His whole family, with the exception of an elder brother, are proved to have been Papists—a brother, Edmund Burke, a Papist, was present at the marriage. The wife's family were all Papists: nor of course would they have consented to the marriage at all, or at least not to its celebration in that form, had they entertained any suspicion that Burke was a Protestant. But the father, in the course of his visits to Dublin already stated, must have known the fact to be so; if, as pleaded, he, Burke, at all times professed himself to be a Protestant; and attended divine service in the churches, and conformed to the rites and ordinances, of the Protestant establishment.

But the fact so constructively, primâ facie, proved, is not left to rest either on the proofs already stated, or upon mere inference from the circumstances to which I have just adverted. Several witnesses have been examined on the libel, who not merely depose to their belief, and to the general reputation, of Burke being a Papist; but who speak to other facts, utterly inconsistent with the case now set up, of his being, in truth, a Protestant. They depose to his attending mass—not indeed very frequently, but still to his attending mass—both at Carlow and Dublin, up to the period of his marriage in 1815. The witness Kehoe, who had been his fellow apprentice at Carlow, and renewed his acquaintance with him at Dublin, speaks to this; and to his demeaning himself, in all respects, as a worshipper at mass, sprinkling himself with holy water on entering [478] the place where it was celebrated, and so on. The witness Mr. Henry, a Roman Catholic priest, deposes to the following fact:—He says that Burke had at one time, lodging in his house in North King street, a Roman Catholic clergyman named M'Quirk; who being very ill, he, the deponent, as the Roman Catholic curate of the parish, was requested by Burke to go and read prayers to Mr. M'Quirk, in the ordinary way of chapel service—Burke adding, that if the deponent would attend, he would himself assist in the responsive part of the service, and get the two lights and wine and other things ready; which he said he knew how to do very well, as he himself was of the same persuasion. The witness goes on to say that he attended accordingly, but declined performing the service, as he found Mr. M'Quirk in too flighty a state of mind to attend to it. Burke, however, he adds, was very urgent with him to proceed, notwithstanding; as considering the prayers in the service for the sick effectual to drive away fairies and evil spirits; "a notion," says the witness, "which none but very weak and superstitious Catholics entertain." Accordingly, "it being a maxim with him," he says, "to discourage such notions," he refused to perform the service. From this, as well as from other circumstances, and from the result of his inquiries at the time of Burke's first coming into the parish as to his religious persuasion, this witness concludes, by expressing his firm conviction and belief that "what religion he, Burke, had during his residence in North King street, in 1814 and 1815, was, without any manner of doubt, that of the Roman Catholic Church."

After this marriage with Mary Butler, in 1815, [479] Burke, accompanied by his wife, went to Dublin; where, and at Clonmell and other places in Ireland, they continued to live and cohabit together as husband and wife, till about the year 1817; he, Burke, still being all this time, or professing himself, a Catholic. This is proved by a variety of circumstances. For instance, they had two children, daughters, Honora and Johanna; each of whom was baptised by a Catholic priest, after the Catholic form; on one, at least, of such occasions, Burke being actually present. In 1817 or 1818, Burke having, as some of the witnesses express it, become "unfortunate in business," left Ireland, and came to this country, accompanied by his wife and children, or one of them, Johanna. Of his history in this country prior to his courtship of Miss Bruce, all that appears in the evidence is, that in 1819 he procured the admission of Mary Butler (or Burke) and a sick child, the daughter Johanna, into Pancras workhouse; where the mother and child remained from the 22nd of September in that year till the 25th, when the child died; immediately upon which the mother quitted the workhouse. Of the mother (the first wife) nothing more appears in the evidence than that she was living at the time of the second marriage. The witness Lee proves that she was actually present in Court, at the Old Bailey, during the defendant's trial for bigamy, in 1822—where, as already said, he was convicted and sentenced to transportation for seven years. So far, then, the marriage with Butler should clearly seem to have been a valid marriage.

In the year 1820, however, notwithstanding the premises, Burke, the defendant, pays his addresses in the way of marriage to Miss Bruce, the complainant; [480] representing himself as a bachelor; and, after a correspondence of some length, clandestine in every part of it, and in defiance of the express prohibition of the lady's father, on its coming to his knowledge, a marriage de facto, by licence, of the parties, is had at Islington church, on the 4th of December, 1820. In the spring of 1822 Mr. Bruce, the father, having learnt that Burke was a married man at that time, procured, in the first instance, his trial and conviction for bigamy; and subsequently the institution of the present suit; in order to obtain a sentence declaratory of the nullity of the marriage de facto so had in December, 1820, between the defendant and his (Bruce's) daughter, the complainant in this cause.

In the history of the trial for bigamy I observe that the bill was found by the grand jury in May, 1822, but that the trial itself was not had till the following July. Burke therefore had full time, as he had every inducement, to set up at that time the invalidity of the first marriage, by the case now sought to be made in this Court; on proof of which to a jury he would most unquestionably have been acquitted. Notwithstanding, however, he is convicted; either not having set up, or having failed to sustain, the case now sought to be made, on the occasion of his trial for bigamy. It was still, however, open to him, in spite of that conviction, to plead and prove in this Court the invalidity of the first marriage, in bar of the sentence now prayed. In order to this he has, here, at least, regularly put in issue the fact of his having been a Protestant at the time of his first marriage in June, 1815; and, by proving it, he will clearly entitle himself to a sentence of dismissal. The matter so pleaded, if it be, is surely [481] not even difficult of proof. For instance, confining it to the last, and most material period of time, the twelve months immediately preceding the marriage—Burke, during all that time, was stationary in North King street. If a Protestant during all that time, frequenting divine service in the churches, and conforming himself to the ordinances of the Protestant establishment, could that, in such a place as Dublin, have escaped the knowledge of his neighbours, friends, and acquaintance? It must have been matter of pretty general notoriety; and easy of proof, in the same proportion. At the same time, the burthen of proof as to this particular fact clearly rests upon him, on every consideration. The fact of his having been a Protestant, against his own professions, at least on the occasion of his first marriage—contrary to all probabilities, and to the understanding, at that time, of all parties and privies to the marriage; and contrary to much at least of his own conduct, as well prior as subsequent to the marriage—he must prove, and by evidence most satisfactory, to bar the sentence prayed by the present complainant. And this the rather, as the conduct of this person to one of these two females (the only question being to which of the two) is infamous, upon his own shewing. Either to Butler, as inveigling her into a sham marriage by passing himself off to her, and her family, as a Papist, whilst in truth he was a Protestant; or to Bruce, as practising on her the equally or still more infamous artifice (to accomplish the same object) of representing himself to her, and her family and connexions, as a bachelor, free from matrimonial engagements, whilst in truth he was under such engagements, and a married man.

[482] Of the evidence actually adduced by Burke of his being a Protestant at the time of his first marriage, it may be sufficient to say that it fails to sustain that alleged fact in every particular. Three witnesses have been examined on the defensive allegation. The two first of these indeed depose pretty confidently, in general terms, to the fact that Burke at all times, according to their impression and belief, was a Protestant—but their grounds of inference, their assigned reasons for that impression and belief, are, most of them, extremely vague and unsatisfactory: nor do the witnesses, as to the few of a contrary description, depose in terms to which the Court can attach much or any credit, contrasting them with the much more probable evidence to a contrary effect, given by the much more credible witnesses on the libel. Dwyer, for instance, the first of the two, who represents himself as a native of the same district in Ireland, and connected by marriage with the defendant, after saying that he knows nothing of his birth, baptism, or education (of which by the way being as pleaded, there is nothing in the shape of proof), but merely that he "always understood that he was bred up a Protestant," goes on to depose that he lived with the defendant, in North King street, for nine or ten weeks, as a sort of assistant in his business (till he could procure some better situation, which he was on the look-out for, as a clerk or accountant), in the winter of 1814. During that period, he says, "Burke, the defendant, by his conversation and habits, always led him, the deponent, to suppose, that he was a Protestant. Deponent could not think otherwise of him. He used regularly every Sunday, at least once a day, to go to church, the regular English [483] Church in Dublin, either to Christ church, or St. Patrick's church: never to chapel or mass. Besides this, he used often to be talking to deponent about his principles, deponent being a Catholic. He used to give him books to read on controversy, and try to persuade him to turn Protestant, and to read the New Testament; and, several times, he prevailed on the deponent to accompany him to church." Does all this appear credible in contrast with what is deposed to of this same Burke, at the same period, by the witnesses on the libel? The witness Dwyer, I should say, is a journeyman painter in this metropolis—as his fellow witness, Egan, whose evidence is of the same general complexion, is a common day labourer. Mr. Armstrong indeed, the third, is a fully credible witness; but his evidence amounts to little or nothing. He, like the others, speaks to his belief that Burke was a Protestant; but it seems to be a belief taken up upon slight grounds—the principal being, his having once seen him at Christ church, in Dublin. He says too that Burke, being a posthumous child, the chief charge of him of course fell upon his eldest brother, Thomas, a Protestant and subsequently a clergyman of the Established Church; from which circumstance he infers that Burke was educated in Protestant principles. But that he really was so; or that he ever professed himself a Protestant; or evinced his adherence to Protestant principles by any act of outward conformity, as by constant attendance at churches of the Protestant establishment, as pleaded, or any thing of that sort, he, the witness, disclaims, in terms, any knowledge whatever.

Upon the whole evidence, of which the above is a [484] summary, I have no hesitation in saying that the defence set up is not made out in proof—but that the defendant's first marriage was a valid and subsisting marriage at the time of his marriage, de facto, with the present complainant; and, consequently, that she is entitled to a sentence declaring and pronouncing that marriage null and void.

ATKINSON v. ATKINSON. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1825.—An allegation exceptive to the testimony of a witness, to be admissible, must plead matter not pleadable before publication: and it must be such as, if proved, will materially discredit the witness. It must be pleaded, too, with all possible specification as to times, places, persons, and so on.—Where a witness is designed (a fortiori vouched) by the one party to precise facts, it is open to the other to plead, before publication, declarations of the witness contrary to those facts: which if he does not, he shall not plead them after publication in exception to the testimony of the witness: unless they are noviter perventa, &c. i.e. come to his knowledge since publication.

(On the admission of an exceptive allegation.)

This was a cause of divorce, or separation â mensa et thoro, by reason of cruelty and adultery promoted by the wife against the husband, as stated in the case next but one preceding. The present question arose upon the admission of an allegation, exceptive to the testimony of a witness examined upon the libel.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The principles applicable to pleas of this description are sufficiently familiar to admit of their being referred to, without the formality of any previous detail of them. As with reference, then, to those principles, it appears to me that the present allegation is altogether inadmissible.

The witness whose testimony is excepted to is a [485] young woman named Harriet Hobbs. She, it seems, has deposed on the 15th and 16th articles of the libel as follows:—On the 15th, that "from what she, the witness, saw on those occasions" (thereby meaning the occasions specially referred to by her in her deposition on the said article), "she has no doubt but that Mr. Atkinson (the defendant) and Ann Rolls" (a party with whom the said defendant is charged to have committed adultery in the libel) "upon many other occasions of their being alone together in the house of the latter, as deposed, had the carnal use and knowledge of each other's bodies," &c. And on the 16th, that she, the deponent, has no doubt but verily believes that Mr. Atkinson and Mrs. Rolls, upon the occasion just deposed of" (thereby meaning upon an occasion specially referred to in her examination upon the said article), "had also the carnal use and knowledge of each other's bodies," as above. The alleged contradiction is that "she, the said Harriet Hobbs, hath, in the presence of divers credible witnesses, both shortly before and shortly after her said examination in this cause, admitted and confessed that she verily believed that they, the said Thomas Atkinson and Ann Rolls, never had the carnal use and knowledge of each other's bodies," and that she hath also, since her examination, in conversation with some of her friends and acquaintance, stated that "she verily believed no such adulterous intercourse had taken place—that it could not, as she verily believed, have taken place without her knowing of or seeing it; and that she never had seen or known of any thing improper passing between the said parties."

[486] Such, in substance, is the first article of this allegation—it is, in a word, that the witness having deposed on the 15th and 16th articles of the libel, to her belief that adultery was committed between the parties articulate; has made verbal declarations out of Court to her belief that it was not.

Now it seems to me that, to the admission of this article of the allegation, there is an objection almost fatal in itself, in limine—it pleads matter which might, and which therefore should, have been pleaded before publication. The 15th and 16th articles of the libel each conclude with averring that adultery was committed between the parties articulate on certain occasions therein severally specified. And the witness designed, and almost vouched, to those articles was Harriet Hobbs. Now if Hobbs, at any time before publication, had asserted her disbelief that adultery was committed between the parties on the occasions articulate, might not this have been pleaded before publication? What inference is justly deducible from such a fact—I mean, how far it impeaches the witness's credit, supposing it to be—is another thing: but it was clearly open to the party to have pleaded the fact itself, if he had deemed it a material fact before publication; so that its being pleaded at the present time, after publication is improper, and strictly inadmissible. Where a witness has been designed to particular parts of a plea it is always open to the other party to plead, before publication, declarations on his part contrary to the facts and averments contained in those particular parts of the plea. Is the party to lay by till he has seen the witness's deposition, and then, if convenient, to plead them? [487] Certainly not. For instance, in the case of a subscribed witness to a will, examined on a condidit. Is the party opposing the will to wait till publication of the evidence has passed, and then to plead that the witness has said he "never attested the will," or, as the case may be, in the shape of an exception to his testimony? I think that such declarations should have been pleaded before publication—unless indeed they had "noviter perventa" newly come to the knowledge of the party pleading them so averred and so proved. Here there is no averment even that these declarations of Hobbs have come to the knowledge of Mr. Atkinson since the evidence has been published in the cause.

But there are other objections strongly applicable to the admission of this article. In excepting to the credit of a witness from what arises out of his deposition, it has been always held that you must shew him to have sworn falsely and corruptly. Would it be matter of just inference that the witness has sworn falsely and corruptly, in this instance, should the allegation, this part of it, be admitted and proved? It assigns a contradiction which does not involve any material impeachment of the witness's credit, in my view of it. What the witness is said to have stated differently, at different times, is not a matter of fact, but a matter of mere inference or opinion. In her deposition she has spoken to her belief that adultery was committed between the parties—at other times she has spoken to her belief (assuming this, for argument's sake) that it was not. But the witness may have entertained different impressions at different times—so that little derogatory to her credit would result from this part of the allegation being proved. The assigned contradiction is not one of that [488] positive and precise nature alone sufficient to discredit a witness. For instance, suppose that an interrogatory had been addressed to Hobbs to this effect. Have you never stated so and so [namely, your belief that the defendant never committed adultery with Mrs. Rolls], either generally, or, à fortiori, specifically; that is, have you never so stated to such or such persons, and so on? Why, the witness might then, not improbably, have admitted that she had so said, and might have accounted for her having deposed differently; as, for instance, by averring that she had altered her opinion as to the conduct of the parties; or that what she had said on that subject was not meant seriously; and that her real opinion and belief was only expressed when she was put upon her oath. Had she denied it, however, the assigned contradiction, as being positive and precise, might have been pleadable. But no such interrogatory was administered to her—and the discrepancy, as pleaded, being, accordingly, not one of a nature to affect her credit materially, if proved, it ought not, I think, to be pleaded, were it upon this ground only. This witness's belief, either way, I may add, is obviously itself quite unimportant in the cause. Her belief, either way (she, too, a mere girl) is no proof that adultery was, or that it was not, committed between the parties articulate. To what inference as to this, either way, is the Court led by the facts and circumstances to which she has deposed? They constitute the material part, the only material part, of her evidence. The Court can draw from these its own inference; in doing which it is likely to derive little aid from the belief, either way, of (especially such) a witness.

[489] Lastly, the allegation, this part of it, is destitute of all that specification so absolutely essential where matter is pleaded to discredit a witness after publication. It merely pleads that the witness has stated so and so—not saying when, where, or to whom in a single instance. How is this to be counter-pleaded; or how can interrogatories be addressed with any effect to the witnesses produced to prove such alleged declarations? In every view of the case it appears to me that this first article of the allegation is one that the Court is bound to reject.

Nor has the second, the only remaining article of the allegation, in part, for the same reasons, any better claim to be admitted. It recites the answer of the same witness, Hobbs (to the effect that "she has not received, or been promised, nor does she expect to receive, any reward, present, or gratuity, or satisfaction for giving evidence in this cause"), upon a general interrogatory addressed to her on that head. And it then pleads, not that she has been bribed, but that she, Hobbs, since her examination, has admitted and confessed "that her father did receive money from

Mr. Weddell, the solicitor of Mrs. Atkinson, for her use and in order to supply her with clothes—that her mother had actually purchased clothes for her with such money; and that Mrs. Atkinson had furnished it." Now these again are facts, namely, that the witness had been bribed, or at least had been tampered with, which, unless they are noviter perventa to the knowledge of the other party, which they are not averred to be, should have been pleaded before publication—and here again, with respect to these admissions and confessions, there is all that want of due specification of times, [490] places, and persons already observed upon, as with respect to the alleged declarations pleaded in the preceding article. Upon the whole, the plea now tendered appears to me to be purely dilatory; and to be made up of matter not pleadable in this shape and in this stage of the cause. Consequently, I reject it; and assign the cause itself to be concluded on the next Court-day.

ALLEN v. MANNING. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1825.—A testator made a will to please his wife: then a second (unknown to his wife) to please himself: sometime after he went to his attorney and gave him instructions for a new or third will—telling him at the same time that he was going that day to make a codicil to (and so, in effect, to revive) the first, terming it his wife's will; but would come the next day and execute the third, which he meant to be his will, expressly in order to defeat the first. He revived the first will accordingly; but died without executing the third. The Court, holding that upon the evidence he was only prevented from executing this third will by the "act of God," in the true sense of that phrase, pronounced for a draft will which had been prepared in his life-time from the instructions so given by the testator as aforesaid.

Thomas Allen, the party deceased in this cause, died on the 16th of December, 1823, leaving personal property only to the amount in value of about 2000l. At the time of his death he was clerk to Messrs. Whitbread and Co., and had been so for nearly forty years.

In 1806 the deceased, being then a widower with two children, daughters, intermarried with Mary Huke, who survived him, being party in the cause as Mary Allen, his widow and relict. She, at the time of her marriage with the deceased, was a widow, and was possessed in her own right of certain freehold and leasehold property and other effects, producing together an income of about 200l. per annum. The [491] whole of such property previous to the marriage was settled on her for life; and afterwards as she by deed or will should appoint. The deceased had issue by this marriage two children, a son and a daughter, both minors at the time of his death. His daughters by the first wife were both married in his life-time—Ann the elder (party in the cause) to Thomas Manning in 1809—and Frances the younger to William Garnham in 1822.

In the months of February and March, 1821, the deceased made a will with two codicils, whereby he bequeathed the bulk of his property to his then wife for her life; and the whole after her death to his four children in equal proportions. This will and codicils, together with a third codicil (of which in the sequel), were propounded by the widow. It appeared in evidence that they were prepared by a solicitor, Mr. Earnshaw, whom the deceased was in the habit of employing, from his own instructions: and they were formally executed and attested. It was expressly pleaded on the part of Mrs. Manning that the deceased was prevailed upon to execute the said will only by the undue influence and importunity of his wife, the other party in the cause; and that the same was contrary to his real wishes and inclinations. But of such express allegation there was no proof; with the exception of the evidence to certain declarations to that effect made by the deceased himself, on two subsequent occasions, that will presently be stated.

In the month of June, 1822, the deceased executed another will, which had been prepared for him by a Mr. Hull, a solicitor in his neighbourhood, but not the solicitor regularly employed by the deceased, from [492] instructions given by him, the deceased, to Hull in the month preceding. The deceased, it was pleaded and proved by the testimony of Hull, both on occasion of his giving instructions for, and on that of his executing, the said will, spoke in strong terms of the injustice of which, as he said, he had been guilty towards his two elder children by the will and codicils of February and March, 1821, alluding to the property settled upon his then wife and, as he expressed it, upon her children; who consequently would be better provided for than his other children in the event of that will remaining operative. On both such occasions the deceased added, "It," meaning the will of February, 1821, "is my wife's will and not mine." Accordingly, by the will of June, 1822, the bulk of his property after his wife's death was given by the deceased to his two elder children in equal proportions, and a legacy only of 200l. each to the two younger, the children of the subsisting marriage. This last will was left with Mr. Hull, to be delivered to his executors after his death—the deceased assigning as a reason for this that "it would occasion words if he took it home," and that "he did not wish his wife to know of it."

On the 10th of December, 1823, the testator called upon Mr. Hull, and told him in the presence of his clerk, a person named Dury, that he wished to make a new will; and desired that his will of June, 1822, should be read over to him. This being accordingly done, the testator proceeded to give instructions for a new will. Such instructions, as taken from the deceased by Dury, purported to be expressed in a paper writing, indorsed "Instructions for altering Mr. Allen's will," written by Dury; and in certain alterations noted in [493] pencil, also by Dury, on the margin of the former will. The general purport of the proposed will, for which instructions were so taken, was to be as follows:—After the death of the testator's wife his property was to be divided into thirds—a third was to be given to each of his two elder children; and the remaining third in equal division to the two younger. At the same time the testator directed (so positively deposed by Hull and Dury, and so purported to be contained in the instructions) that a note of hand for 200l. of his son-in-law, Manning, which the deceased held as a security for money lent him to that amount, should be cancelled; and that a further sum of 100l. also lent or advanced to Manning by the deceased, but for which he had no security, should be retained by him, Manning, over and above a clear third of the residue, so proposed to have been given him by the will.(a) The instructions so [494] taken as above, when completed, were read over to the deceased, who approved of them, and directed that a will should be drawn out conformable thereto, in order that he, the deceased, might execute the same on the following day at Hull's office, by way of concealing all knowledge of the 1st share, to daughter Manning, having had 300l.

---

(a) The "instructions" only purported to express this, sub modo, being in these words:

Personal property to be divided into three shares.

2nd, to daughter Garnham.

3rd, George Thomas Allen, and my daughter Mary Allen, spinster, now seventeen, all payable at my wife's decease.

Manning gave a note of hand for 200l. 1st Jauuary, 1823—100l. advanced before.

Executor to cancel the note on payment of all interest.

Remaining 3rd to be divided between George Thomas and Mary Allen.

Receipt of wife a sufficient discharge.

Cancel note.

Now it certainly might have been a question of construction, on the face of the instructions propounded, whether the testator meant and intended that his son-in-law, Manning, should have a third of his property plus or minus the sum of 300l. which he was so indebted to him. And there was much in the evidence to shew that whatever benefit the testator meant and intended to Manning, it was always his intention to make him account to his estate for this sum of 300l. which he had so had in advance. The Court, however, instead of pronouncing for the instructions propounded, which had been read over to and, as sworn, approved by the deceased, pronounced for the draft will, prepared by Hull from those instructions, which the deceased had never seen; and which only appeared as a script in the cause annexed to Mrs. Manning's affidavit of scripts. Upon the face of the paper so actually pronounced for there was no such ambiguity; it being there expressed clearly enough that Manning was to have a third over and above the 300l. which he was indebted to the testator; and Hull and Dury positively deposed (and no doubt understood and conceived) that such was the deceased's intention. It was objected on the part of the widow that it was not competent to the Court under these circumstances to pronounce for a paper which had never been seen by the deceased—but the Court over-ruled that objection; and actually pronounced, as said, for the draft will.

transaction from his wife. The deceased at the same time said, "I am going to execute another will at home to-day, prepared by Mr. Earnshaw; but it will not be my will—it is not just, it is not right, but I will do it to preserve peace at home. I will come to-morrow and sign this will which will overturn the will that I am going to sign to-day at home." These declarations of the deceased were positively deposed to by Hull and Dury.

On the 11th of December the deceased executed at [495] his own house a codicil to his will of February, 1821. Such codicil was, unquestionably, the instrument referred to by the deceased as a will in his declarations to Hull and Dury: it was to have been executed on the 10th, and its execution was merely deferred till the 11th, by reason of a press of business in the attorney's office, which prevented its being completed, as originally proposed, on the first of those two days. It was prepared by Mr. Earnshaw, from instructions which the deceased had himself called at his office and given to him on the 9th of December. The sole purport of that codicil was to secure the return to his estate of the 300l. which the deceased had lent or advanced to his son-in-law, Manning. In order to this, it directed that the said sum of 300l. should be taken and considered as part of the fourth share to which Mrs. Manning was entitled in and by the will of February, 1821: and the codicil in question confirmed the said will, that of February, 1821, and the two former codicils, in all other respects. It was pleaded on the part of Mrs. Manning that this codicil was only procured from the deceased, as the will had been, by the undue influence and importunity of his wife: but of this again there was no other proof than resulted from the deceased's previous declarations to that effect to Hull and his clerk, Dury.

On the said 11th of December the deceased, who had long been afflicted with cough and asthma, feeling himself worse, sent for his apothecary; by whose advice he staid at home on that day: nor did the deceased, in fact, ever quit his house after the 10th of December. He died in the night of the 16th. It was pleaded on the part of Mrs. Manning that he was [496] incapable of quitting his house after the 10th, and, consequently, of fulfilling his engagement with Mr. Hull. On the contrary, it was pleaded by the widow that the deceased, although indisposed on the 11th, and gradually getting worse till he died, still was down stairs each day; and might, if he had chosen, have gone to Hull's office, situate only 200 yards from his own house, any day previous to the 15th. And Mr. Gore, his apothecary, deposed to this part of the widow's plea that he had recommended the deceased to stay at home on the 11th, merely as a matter of precaution, there being no actual necessity for his staying at home on that day; and he, the deponent, having frequently seen him out, and employed in his ordinary pursuits, when he was worse—that on the 12th he was much better than on the 11th—and that his illness only assumed an alarming character, and was only considered by the deceased himself, and by those about him, likely to be fatal, on the evening of the 14th December.

The will (and its three codicils) of February, 1821, was propounded on behalf of the widow—and the will of June, 1822, in conjunction with the pencil notes on its margin, and the instructions taken by Dury, as above, on the 10th of December, 1823, was propounded on behalf of the daughter, Mrs. Manning.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The evidence taken upon the several allegations leaves no doubt upon my mind, either as to the intentions of this testator, or as to the legal construction to be put upon his several testamentary acts.

The testator made a will in 1821, leaving his property to be divided among his children in equal [497] proportions. It was prepared for and executed by him under circumstances, and in a manner, as appears by the evidence, which negative the imputation of improper interference on the part of the wife or any other of a nature in the slightest degree to affect the legal validity of that will. He might have made it to please his wife; and even at her instance, and through her importunity: still nothing of all this appears in the evidence of a nature at all, I repeat, to affect the legal validity of the will. However, in the month of June, 1822, the deceased makes a new will, through the agency of another solicitor, of a somewhat different tenor from the former: and by this, of itself, and quite independent of any declarations as to his dissatisfaction with that former will, and so on, the will of 1821 clearly stood revoked. This will of June, 1822, would indisputably have been entitled to probate had the testator died without doing any other, or further, testamentary act.

Next in order of time follows the codicil of December, 1823; it was to have been executed on the 10th, but was actually executed on the 11th of December. It confirms and revives the will of February, 1821; and that again, so far, became the deceased's last or effective will. Undue influence and control on the part of the wife is here again charged: but of such, here again there is no proof of a nature to affect the validity of the act, or to prevent its operating as a complete and effectual revivor of the will of February, 1821; and the Court, if matters had stopped here, must have so considered it.

But it also appears that on this 10th of December, [498] the very day upon which the codicil reviving the will of February, 1821, was to have been executed, the deceased goes to Mr. Hull and gives him instructions for a new will altogether; accompanying those instructions with declarations that he is going to execute that day, at home, a will of a different tenor, prepared for him by Mr. Earnshaw; but that he will call on the following day and execute a will prepared from the instructions so then given by him, expressly in order to defeat the will that he is going to execute that same day at home. And the case set up by the daughter, Manning, is that these instructions and accompanying declarations, under the circumstances, are sufficient in law to defeat the actual revival of the first will.

Now it neither has been, nor could be, contended that these instructions and declarations could have the effect sought to be ascribed to them of themselves. Accordingly, it is further alleged, on the part of Mrs. Manning, that the deceased would actually have fulfilled his promise of calling at Hull's office, and executing the proposed will, if he had not been prevented from doing so by what is technically described as the "act of God." This is the daughter's case: and I admit, as insisted, that in order to sustain it she is bound to satisfy the Court in the three following particulars:—First, that the deceased fully meant and intended to execute a will of the same tenor with that which he directed to be prepared on the 10th of December. Secondly, that he was only prevented from carrying that intention into effect by extrinsic circumstances. And, thirdly, that those extrinsic circumstances were such as he himself had no control over; [499] amounting in themselves to what this Court is in the habit of considering a case of prevention by the "act of God."

Is the evidence such, then, as should satisfy the Court as to these particulars? Now, as to the two first, I am quite persuaded, from the deceased's own declarations, and from the circumstances under which the several wills were executed, as both the one and the other appear in evidence, that it was not his intention to bequeath his property to his four children in equal proportions; but that he did intend, and had long intended, a distinction in favour of his children by his first wife, in consideration of what those by his second wife would probably derive from the money in settlement at their mother's disposal. The wife's interference, I have said, is not proved so as at all to invalidate either the will of 1821 itself, or the revival of it by the codicil of December, 1823, viewing those several testamentary acts in themselves. But it is shewn, to a quite sufficient extent to satisfy my mind, that the codicil of December, 1823, may justly be so far ascribed to the husband's anxiety to "preserve peace at home," as he expressed it, that the actual revival of the will of February, 1821, by means of that codicil, is not at all incompatible with the case set up, that the deceased fully meant to execute a will of a different tenor to that so revived by the codicil on the next immediately following day. And viewing this in connection with the admitted facts of the case, and the testator's own positive declarations to that effect, as deposed to by Hull and Dury on the 10th of December, I think I am bound to conclude that his mind was made up to execute the will now in substance propounded on [500] behalf of the daughter: and that he was only prevented from so doing by extrinsic circumstances.

The sole remaining consideration is, whether those extrinsic circumstances do, or do not, constructively amount to, and constitute, a case of prevention by the "act of God," as the Court is in the habit of construing that phrase? Now in order to this it is not necessary that a case of physical prevention should be made out. In the case in question, for instance, it is not necessary to be shewn that it was actually, or even morally, impossible for the deceased to have gone to Hull's office on the 12th of December. If the Court is convinced upon the evidence that he was prevented from going by extrinsic circumstances of such a nature as render his failing to keep his engagement with Hull not justly imputable to any change of intention on his part, the exigency of the law, in the particular in question, appears to me to be fully satisfied.

And I do think the fair result of the evidence is that the deceased was solely prevented by the "act of God," in this sense and construction of the phrase, from executing the will now in substance propounded by Mrs. Manning. It is admitted that he never left his house after the 11th of December; and it is proved that he staid at home on that and the subsequent days, by the advice of his medical attendant. His disorder was asthma, accompanied by a violent cough, and tendency to inflammation; though no symptoms of this were, perhaps, actually discoverable by those about him till the 13th or 14th. The time of year (the middle of December) makes it apparent that such a patient must have left his home at considerable risk, even to go 200 yards, the distance to Hull's office. It has been said that [501] Hull might have been sent for. But the deceased had himself told Hull (so he deposes) that he did not dare send for him: and as the deceased got weaker and worse he probably felt himself more and more unequal to that breach of domestic peace which he, at least, apprehended that his sending for Hull upon such an errand would surely occasion. Under these circumstances I hold that I am bound to carry into effect what I feel to have been the testator's real intentions, by pronouncing for the instructions propounded by Mrs. Manning; in preference to pronouncing for the will of February, 1821, as revived by the codicil of December, 1823, propounded by the widow.(a)

LYON AND WERRINGTON v. BALFOUR AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1825.—A creditor cites an executor to accept or refuse probate, &c. The executor, sub modo, denies the jurisdiction of the Court as not having any knowledge of assets. The creditor, then, in order to found the jurisdiction, is compelled to disclose assets; whereupon the executor retracts his qualified denial of the Court's jurisdiction, and prays probate. Probate decreed to the executor, with costs; as incurred solely by reason of the creditor's undue suppression of the fact of there being assets.

(On petition.)

William Sibbald, a domiciled Scotchman, died sometime in the year 1817 at Edinburgh, leaving a will and codicil, which were duly proved by his executors, one of such executors being Mr. Balfour, in the proper Court in Scotland, on the 19th of December, 1817.

[502] In the month of March, 1824, a decree by letters of request issued under seal of this Court, at the instance of two creditors of the deceased, Messrs. Lyon and Werrington, citing the executors to accept or refuse probate of the said will and codicil in this Court, with the usual intimation.

This decree, having been duly served, was returned in Court, when the executors appeared, and, sub modo, denied the jurisdiction of the Court, by reason, as alleged in their act of Court, that the deceased had, whilst living, and at the time of his death, no "goods, chattels, or credits within the province of Canterbury sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Court," to their knowledge and belief—offering, at the same time, and alleging that they were ready and willing to take probate of his will and codicils in this Court on being satisfied to the contrary.

The creditors, upon this, were compelled to disclose in their act of Court in reply to that of the executors, in order to found the jurisdiction of the Court, that the sum of about 60l., being a dividend of one shilling in the pound upon about the sum of 1200l. due and owing to the deceased on simple contract from a mercantile house in this town, which house had become insolvent in the year 1812, was now in the hands of a trustee of the said insolvent's estate; which dividend the said trustee was ready to pay to any legal representative of the deceased who was duly qualified, as such, to give him a legal discharge for the same.

The executors hereupon retracting their qualified denial of the jurisdiction of the Court and praying probate, the question had now simply become one of [503] costs—the executors praying that the creditors might be condemned in costs, and the creditors the executors—as also that their further expences in the premises might be decreed to be paid out of the testator's estate.

(a) The Court, in fact, pronounced for the "draft will" prepared from those instructions (propounded under its directions, apud acta), and not for the instructions themselves, as already said. See note (a), page 493.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. I have no hesitation either in rejecting the prayer of the creditors altogether or in condemning them in costs, as prayed by the executors. The amount of property recoverable under a probate taken here is only about 60l. The executors, if apprized that any property was recoverable, would, at any time, have taken probate; they so allege, and the Court is bound to believe them. Under these circumstances a formal decree, citing the executors to accept or refuse probate, and so on, was an abuse of the process of the Court; the expence consequent upon which ought, of course, to be borne by those to whom that abuse itself is imputable; I mean the creditors. The creditors have themselves given occasion to the whole by their undue suppression of the fact of there being assets here—a fact, at last, only extorted from them by the necessity which they were under of disclosing it, in order to found the jurisdiction of the Court. And their motive for all this has been to become the legal representatives of the testator within this jurisdiction; in order to apply this sum of 60l. in discharge of their own debt, to the manifest prejudice of all the other creditors of this avowedly insolvent estate. The executors are entitled to probate of this will and codicil of course: and I think myself bound to condemn the creditors in the costs of obtaining it to which the executors have been put through their means.

[504] In the Goods of the Rev. Cavalier Jouet, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1825.—The statute 38 Geo. III. c. 87, though entitled only "an act for the better administration of assets where the executor to whom probate has been granted is out of the realm," is equally applicable where an executor (though not "out of the realm") is out of the jurisdiction and out of the reach of the process of his majesty's English Courts of law and equity.

The Rev. Cavalier Jouet, deceased, died in the year 1810, having first made his will, of which he appointed two executors. Probate of this will was granted to one of his two said executors; power being reserved of making a similar grant to the other: and, on the death of that one, probate was actually so granted to the other, in the month of June, 1822. The surviving executor was living in England at the time of the grant; but left it some time after, and settled at Stirling, in North Britain, or Scotland.

Under these circumstances, administration of the effects of the said testator was granted to the nominee of a creditor, limited to the purpose of his "becoming and being made a party to a bill or bills to be filed against him in a Court or Courts of equity," and to that of "his carrying the decree or decrees of the said Court or Courts into effect, but no further or otherwise," under the provisions of the statute 38 Geo. III. c. 87.(a)

(a) Any possible doubt with respect to the propriety of this grant, as by reason that the executor was resident "in Scotland" at the time, and not "out of the realm," might have been obviated by what occurred in the following case of Hannay v. Taynton, determined by Sir William Wynne in Easter Term, 1800:—

[505] Hannay v. Taynton. Easter Term, 1800.

In March, 1798, probate of the will of John Hannay, Esq., deceased, was granted to Johnstone Hannay, Esq., the sole executor; who having gone to reside in Scotland, a limited administration (with the will annexed), pursuant to the provisions of 38 Geo. III. c. 87, was granted to the nominee (Taynton) of one of the residuary legatees named in the said will.

In December, 1799, a citation issued at the instance of the executor, calling upon the administrator to bring in the administration, and to shew cause why it should not be revoked; as not duly granted within the statute—expressly by reason that he, the executor, was resident in "Scotland" at the time of the grant, and not "out of the realm."

An appearance was given for the party cited; and both parties wrote to an act on petition—the question being, the propriety of the grant solely as with reference to the executor's domicil or place of residence at the time of its issue.

The question so raised was determined by Sir William Wynne (the then judge of the Prerogative Court), on the 30th of April, 1800. He pronounced, upon argument, in favour of the grant, as clearly of opinion that the act was equally applicable to the case of an executor resident out of the jurisdiction, and out of the reach of the process of (see Done's case, 1 P. Wms.) his majesty's English Courts of law and equity, as to that of an executor resident "out of the realm." Indeed, upon reference to the act itself, it should seem to admit this of but little question; although the "title" of the act is only—"an act for the administration of assets in cases where the executor to whom probate has been granted is out of the realm."

WOOLLOCOMBE v. OULDRIDGE. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1825.

—Ordinaries at the present day are bound not to issue faculties appropriating pews to individuals, but under special circumstances.—Sentence of the Court below, refusing a confirmatory faculty for so appropriating a pew, &c., affirmed generally—but quære as to the propriety of an order, part of that sentence, dispossessing the applicant for the faculty of the pew in question in favour of the opponent; that opponent, though setting up, failing to sustain any prescriptive right to the pew, the possessory right to the pew seeming, of the two, to be rather in the applicant for, than in the opponent of, the faculty; and such order not regularly connecting itself with the proceedings, pleadings, and prayers in the cause.

(An appeal from the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Exeter.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a cause of appeal from the Consistory Court of Exeter. It is described originally as a business of "shewing cause against the grant of a license or faculty for confirming a pew, then lately made by the conversion of one large pew into two pews, in the parish [2] church of Lifton, in the county of Devon," to Mrs. Woollocombe, the present appellant. She was the applicant for that license or faculty in the Court below; and its issue was there opposed by Mrs. Ouldridge, the present respondent.

The appellant is described in the evidence as a woman of considerable property, resident at Whiteley House, the principal mansion in the parish of Lifton. But though resident at, she is not the proprietor of, Whiteley House. She is the mere under-tenant of a Mr. Mason, himself not the proprietor. Whether the appellant is, or is not, nominally rated to the parish for Whiteley House, is a circumstance, I think, pretty immaterial. If she the appellant is not, Mason is; who, of course, is repaid his disbursements on that score by the appellant, in the shape of additional rent. Being the occupier of Whiteley House, the appellant was clearly entitled to sittings in the parish church of Lifton, proportioned to and befitting her status in the parish of Lifton, as the occupier of that house, if such could be afforded her.

In this church of Lifton, it seems, was a large pew capable of holding twelve or fourteen persons, exclusively occupied by females; among others, by the respondent, Mrs. Ouldridge and her daughter. She, the respondent, is the owner or proprietor of an estate in the parish, called Poulston; which, however, is rented by a Mr. Ambridge: she herself living at a house in the village of Lifton, for which she is rated to the parish in the sum of 3l. per annum.

In the years 1821 or 1822 the appellant, Mrs. Woollocombe, not being at that time (at least not regularly) seated, applied to the then churchwardens for a seat in the church, suitable to the accommodation [3] of herself and her family, consisting of two daughters. In consequence of this application the churchwardens, by and with the consent of the minister, appropriated a part of this long pew, capable of holding four persons, separated off from the other, to the appellant; who, after fitting up and lining the same, took possession of, by putting a lock upon it; and sat there undisturbed for a considerable time. To this it now seems that Mrs. Ouldridge, who for many years had sat in that part of the pew so appropriated to the accommodation of the appellant, all along dissented; but still without entering any formal protest, or instituting any formal complaint. On the contrary, she withdrew from the pew altogether, sitting as pro tempore in a pew in the regular occupation of her sister, in a different part of the church; and applying in the end to the churchwardens for other sittings in lieu of those of which she, then, for the first time, at least formally, complained that she had been dispossessed for the accommodation of Mrs. Woollocombe, the appellant. And at the end of a twelvemonth, such her application not having been acceded to by the churchwardens, either as wanting the inclination to accede to it, or more probably as wanting the means, she, the respondent, asserts her right as she deems it, to the pew so appropriated, as already said, to the appellant; and endeavours through her son, as by taking off the lock, &c., to recover the actual possession of it, to some extent, by forcible means: when the appellant, instead of suing the respondent (which, probably, she ought to have done) as for a "perturbation," upon this—founding such suit on her possessory right to, as regularly seated in, this pew by the churchwardens—chuses rather to apply to the ordinary for a [4] grant of the confirmatory faculty in question. Mrs. Ouldridge appears in the Court below, in objection to this grant; pleas are given on both sides; and the result is a disclosure in evidence of those facts to which I have thus briefly and generally adverted.

At the hearing of the cause, upon this evidence in the Court below, the judge was pleased to reject the application for a faculty, as prayed by the appellant, and at the same time to order and decree that the respondent "should have peaceable and quiet possession of her usual place or sitting in that part of the seat in question divided off from the original pew or seat;" and, moreover, to condemn the appellant in the sum of 60l. nomine expensarum. An appeal from this order or decree has been duly prosecuted, and it now rests with this Court either to affirm or reverse it.

The first and principal question is, whether the judge below was right or wrong in rejecting the application for a faculty in this instance. I think him decidedly right in this part of his sentence. Applications of this sort are rarely to be acceded to by ordinaries, at the present day, for reasons to which the Court had occasion to advert at some length, in a recent judgment; (a) and which, on that account, it does not formally repeat. Ordinaries are not at this day to tie up their hands against such future arrangements in the churches within their several jurisdictions, as the rapidly increasing population of the country may soon render necessary or convenient, in order best to provide for the general accommodation of those several parishes, respectively, by a too lavish issue of faculties of this description, or by their issue at all, but under special [5] circumstances. I see no circumstance that in my judgment would have justified the issue of the faculty prayed in this case. The applicant for that faculty, the present appellant, was a person whose connection with this parish was recent, and perhaps transitory. She was the mere under-tenant of a mansion, in respect of which she was not, formally at least, it should rather seem, even rated to the parish; and, although entitled to suitable accommodation in the church, as already suggested, still she had no claim whatever, in my judgment, to the issue of a faculty allotting her the permanent and exclusive possession of this, or any pew in the church; a faculty good and valid if once issued, even against the ordinary himself. In the rejection, then, of this application for a faculty I think that the ordinary was quite right. But even if I had doubts upon this head, faculties generally are matters so much within the discretion of the local judge that I should scruple to reverse his sentence so far: for I should be unwilling to disturb the judgment of any local ordinary in a matter of this nature, unless it could be clearly shewn that it either involved the plain violation of some private right, or would give rise actually or probably to some considerable degree of general inconvenience. Costs, too, are pretty much within the discretion of the Court that awards them; so that, also, I see no ground for reversing that part of the sentence appealed from, whereby the ordinary accompanied the refusal of a faculty with a decree against the petitioner for that faculty, for the payment to the other litigant, of 60l. nomine expensarum. It was open, indeed, to the Court to have condemned her in full costs, she having failed to make out her claim (if I may so call it) to the [6] faculty, in her petition for which this suit commenced.

My only doubt has been with respect to the propriety of that part of the sentence by which the respondent is ordered to be put in "the quiet possession of her usual seat," as it is termed, in the pew in question. No reasons were given by the judge for this part of his sentence that I am aware of. If it proceeded upon a notion that the respondent had made out a good legal title to be seated in this part of the pew—good, I mean, even as against the disposition of the ordinary or his officers the churchwardens—it proceeded upon an erroneous notion; and if the necessary inference were that it did proceed upon any such notion, I should hold myself bound to reverse this part of the sentence. It seems that the respondent did originally set up a title of the sort to which I am adverting: for instance, the fourth article of her first allegation pleads "that she, the respondent," "is owner of a considerable estate called Poulston, in the parish of Lifton; and that, in right of that estate, she and her family have for 60 years and upwards sat in that part of the seat now unlawfully divided off and appropriated to Mrs. Woollocombe," the appellant. What is this but setting up a prescriptiver ight to the pew (and this, too, without alleging reparations from time to time, which are absolutely necessary to be pleaded and proved in order to make out a prescriptive title)? But a prescriptive title to a pew, in virtue of the ownership of an estate, is a legal absurdity. It can only be annexed by prescription to a house—it cannot be so annexed to lands. When an-[7]-nexed to a house, the occupier of the house for the time being is entitled to the use of the pew, not the owner of the estate. Consequently, the respondent's asserted prescriptive right in this pew, in virtue of her ownership of Poulston, an estate not in her occupation, is one that could never have been sustained—even had reparations of the pew from time to time been pleaded, which they were not, as already said.

But supposing this part of the sentence not to have proceeded upon any such notion as that which the Court has been combating, still I incline to think it not altogether correct. It must then have been, and indeed it most probably was, founded upon the notion of a possessory right to these sittings in the respondent. But, in the first place, a possessory right is only co-extensive in duration with actual possession—if abandoned, it actually ceases and determines—so that any possessory right which the respondent might once have, as to sittings in this pew, should seem to have been subsequently lost, or forfeited, by her quasi abandonment of that right. When dispossessed of her sittings, by or in favour of the appellant, she acquiesces for a twelvemonth—she withdraws from the pew altogether, and applies to the churchwardens for sittings elsewhere; on her failing to obtain which, only it was, that her right of any sort to sittings in this particular pew came to be asserted. The possessory right was I think, at that time, in the appellant Mrs. Woollocombe, as regularly seated in this pew by the churchwardens, the officers of the ordinary, without the dissent, if not with the (tacit, at least) approval, of the respondent herself: and the appellant would, in my judgment, have acted more wisely in asserting her pos-[8]-sessory right to the pew, at the first invasion of this right on the part of the respondent, by means of the suit already suggested, than in merely seeking to quiet her possession of the pew by this application for a faculty—to a grant of which she had no claim; nor has made out, I think, any valid pretensions. I must also observe, secondly, that the subject-matter of this part of the sentence was not regularly before the judge, nor was it included, as I collect, in the prayer of either party. Ouldridge indeed prays in her first allegation that "the partition may be taken down;" but not even that prayer does she repeat in her second allegation—nor does she at all pray, nor does she porrect, any sentence to the effect that she, Ouldridge, may be replaced in the seat then occupied by Mrs. Woollocombe. All she prays is a refusal of the faculty; and to that and the order as to costs the sentence should have confined itself. This latter part of the sentence is irregular, as being unconnected with the proceedings and prayers—and, though the order itself made in it may be quite correct, and indeed probably is, under all the circumstances of which this Court may be unaware (for I am not to presume that the local ordinary would have lightly repudiated what had been regularly done long before, by the minister and churchwardens, with the apparent consent of all parties), still I think that that order would more fitly have been by the ordinary in his domestic forum, at his visitation, than have been introduced into, as a formal constituent part of the present sentence. Upon the whole, however, I affirm the sentence and remit the cause. When so remitted, the local ordinary will do what is right as to these different sittings, in which respect he is not confined by this gene-[9]-ral affirmance of the present sentence; especially after what has fallen from this Court as to the irregularity, in its opinion, of that one part of it. And as I think that this question has been not altogether improperly appealed, I shall follow the example of the local ordinary, in condemning the appellant in the sum of 40l. only nomine expensarum, and not in full costs.

Sentence affirmed.

BALL v. BALL. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, Bye-Day, 1825.—An exceptive allegation lies to the testimony of a witness, not examined in the principal cause, but examined only in support of an exception to the testimony of a witness in the principal cause. And if admissible generally [i.e. if pleading (and within time) facts of a nature materially to discredit the witness excepted to; and if duly specifying times, places, persons, and so on], such an exceptive allegation is clearly entitled to go by proof.

(On the admission of an exceptive allegation.)

This was an appeal from the Consistory Court of London, in which the cause originally depended, being a cause of divorce, by reason of adultery, promoted and brought by Sarah Ball (wife of George Ball) against the said George Ball. The judge of the Consistory Court had pronounced for the divorce prayed.

In the appellate Court the appellant (the husband) had given an allegation, exceptive to the credit of Ann Tuppy, a (material) witness examined on the respondent's (the wife's) libel in the Court below. This exceptive allegation was, of course, accompanied by an affidavit on his part, and it was also expressly pleaded in the allegation itself, that "the facts and circumstances pleaded in it, in exception to Tuppy's credit, had only come to his, the appellant's, knowledge since the judgment pronounced in the cause in the Court below, and immediately prior to their being so pleaded in this, the appellate Court."

[10] The grounds of exception to the credit of this witness Tuppy, laid in the exceptive allegation so brought in on the part of the appellant, were in substance as follows:—"That she, Ann Tuppy, had at several times, and upon several occasions, expressed herself in terms of the greatest revenge and malevolence against Ann Pennie;" being the person (the sole person) with whom the appellant was charged in his wife's libel, to have committed the adultery, upon the supposed proof of which the Court below had pronounced for the divorce—"that particularly, upon an evening, happening shortly before she, Tuppy, was turned away from the service of the appellant, in or about the month of February, 1820, she, the said Ann Tuppy, told John Garrett, a watchman upon the premises of the appellant (a brewery situate in Bowl Yard, Broad Street, St. Giles's in the Fields), that she had on that evening had some words with the said Ann Pennie, who had been scolding and finding fault with her—and that she, Tuppy, on that occasion, grossly abused the said Ann Pennie, and declared to the said John Garrett that she would match her and do for her some day or other; or words to that very effect."

The appellant had produced as a witness on this allegation the party vouched in it, John Garrett, who was examined both in chief and upon interrogatories. And the question now at issue was the admission of an allegation brought in by the respondent, exceptive to the testimony of this witness John Garrett.

This witness, it seems, had deposed in his answers to the 6th, 7th, and 8th interrogatories, as follows:—To the 6th: "The respondent has on many occasions opened the gates of the Bowl Yard Brewery, to admit [11] and let out the said Ann Pennie, but never at a late hour of the night; and he has not seen her at all on the premises for the last two years. He never knew the said Ann Pennie to come to the brewery early in the morning, in the absence of the ministrant (Sarah Ball), and stay there with the producent (George Ball) for several hours together. He does not know, and has no reason to believe, that such, the conduct of the said Ann Pennie, created suspicions in the neighbourhood unfavourable to the character of herself and the said producent. He does not know, and has no reason to believe, that the people in the neighbourhood, on seeing her about the premises of the said brewhouse, used to call out, 'There goes that whore,' or made use of other terms expressive of her criminality. The respondent does swear that he has not declared that the neighbours, or some of them, used so to call out. The respondent has not declared that the character of the said Ann Pennie began to be known; and that she was hooted at. He does swear that he never did declare to that, or the like, in the presence of the interrogate Hannah Colcott, a servant of the ministrant, Miss Julia Webb, and of the ministrant; or of any, or either of them, or of any other person." To the 7th: "The producent has never been without a female servant at any time while the respondent has lived in his service." And to the 8th: "The respondent does not know, or believe, that an improper intimacy subsisted between the producent and the said Ann Pennie during the absence of the ministrant from the Bowl Yard Brewery. The respondent will swear that he has never stated that such was his opinion. He has [12] not declared that he considered the said Ann Pennie to be worse than a common prostitute. He will swear that he never expressed himself in words to that or the like effect, in the presence of the said Hannah Colcott, Miss Webb, and of the ministrant; or of any, or either of them, or of any other person."

Such were the answers of this witness to the several interrogatories recited in the allegation which now stood on admission. The facts pleaded in the same, in order to found the exception to his testimony, were—that "the said John Garrett, the witness, had frequently declared at the house of William Small, situate at Stockwell, in the county of Surrey, in and between the months of April and August, 1821,(a) in the presence of Hannah Colcott, Julia Webb, Sarah Ball, the ministrant, and Elizabeth Small, wife of William Small," (b)—so and so—that is, in substance, to the very effect of the several declarations, which he denied upon oath that he ever did make, in his answers (recited) to the several interrogatories.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This allegation has one feature of novelty, as being in exception to the credit of a witness not himself examined in the principal cause, but examined only in support of an exception to the credit of a witness examined in the principal cause. But its fate must be governed by those principles which are applicable to this class of allegations generally—in accordance to which, I think [13] that I am bound to admit the allegation. The several declarations pleaded to have been made by the witness excepted to are to the precise effect of those declarations which he has sworn that he never made in his answers to the 6th, 7th, and 8th interrogatories. Accordingly, they are declarations in themselves clearly pleadable upon general principles; as being of a nature, if proved, materially to discredit the witness who is pleaded to have made them. Garrett, indeed, is no witness, or at least no material witness, in the principal cause: so that the question, credible or not, as applied to this witness, is pretty unimportant as to any material fact in the cause in its direct result. But the plain object of the allegation is by discrediting this witness Garrett (though not a witness in the principal cause) to set up the testimony of Tuppy, a witness, and a very material witness, in the principal cause; so that the credit due to Garrett thus becomes, in its indirect and ultimate result, a question of no mean importance in the principal cause itself. Being then an allegation admissible in its general substance, is its admissibility detracted from by any special circumstance? By none that I am acquainted with. The times at and the places in which, and the persons to whom the several declarations now pleaded are alleged to have been made, are, I think, under the circumstances sufficiently specified in the allegation, as now reformed by the Court.(c) And it is not even suggested that they are pleaded out of time or anything of that sort. The allegation, indeed, is brought in (a) "And at other times." These words were struck out by the Court previous to admitting the allegation.

(b) "And of other persons." These words were also struck out by the Court previous to admitting the allegation.

(c) Vide notes (a) and (b).

at as early a period as it could be—that is, immediately upon [14] the publication of the witness's testimony, in exception to whom (an exception founded upon that testimony) it expressly pleads. This allegation, then, has every requisite to ensure its title to be admitted in my view of it. And, so thinking, I have no scruple in directing it to go to proof.

Allegation admitted.

ROSHER v. VICAR, &C., OF NORTHFLEET. Peculiars Court of Canterbury, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1825.—Where a faculty is sought to be had for erecting a vault in a church-yard, &c., the Court will scruple to decree it without being satisfied that the proposed erection is not likely to be generally prejudicial to the parish—even though its issue be unopposed either on the part of the parish or on that of any particular parishioner.

Jeremiah Rosher, Esquire, a parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of Northfleet, within the peculiar and exempt jurisdiction of the deanery of Shoreham, in the county of Kent, being desirous of obtaining a faculty for the erection of a vault in the church-yard of the said parish, and of setting apart and appropriating the same as a burial place for the interment of himself and the members of his family, to the exclusion of all others (and having also, in this instance, first procured the formal consent thereto of the vicar and churchwardens):

A decree had issued, under seal of the court, citing the vicar, churchwardens, and parishioners of the said parish in special, and all others in general, to appear on the sixth day after publication, if a court day; otherwise on the court day then next following, and shew cause why a license or faculty should not be granted as aforesaid; with the usual intimation. That [15] decree was duly published in the parish church of Northfleet on the 30th of October (1825), and was returned into court, duly certified, on the second session; which certificate was continued till the third session of the following Michaelmas Term, the present court day.

No appearance being given, and certain particulars (a) having been previously ascertained, in compliance with the desire of the judge, from which it resulted that the faculty prayed might issue without probable inconvenience to the parish.

The Court was pleased to decree a faculty pursuant to the citation so issued and returned into Court.

PITCHER v. THE VICAR, &C., OF NORTHFLEET. Peculiars Court of Canterbury, Michaelmas Term, 1825.

This was an application for a faculty precisely similar to the former; and similarly disposed of by the Court on the same grounds; on the part of Henry Jones Pitcher, Esq., a parishioner and inhabitant of Northfleet.

[16] IN THE GOODS OF JOHN TOLCHER, ESQ., Deceased. Prerogative Court Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1825.—Where probate, in common form, is sought to be had of a testamentary paper, which the Court is convinced could never be established by proof in solemn form as a will, the Court may feel itself bound to withhold probate in common form of that testamentary paper; even though this be assented to by the only party or parties who have either any apparent right or interest to contest it. At all events, under circumstances, it will require more stringent proof that the party or parties so assenting are conusant of the full import of their act than is furnished by the mere exhibiting of a formal "proxy of consent" executed by such party or parties.

(On motion.)

John Tolcher, Esq., formerly of Plymouth, in the county of Devon, the deceased

(a) Those particulars were the following:—That in 1821, when the last census was taken, there were 351 occupied houses in the parish and 1965 inhabitants; a number supposed in the interval to have rather decreased than augmented—that the church-yard comprised about two acres and a half, being full one-half of it unoccupied by graves—and that the unoccupied part of it was chiefly on the north side of the church where the vault was to be erected.

The judge had said that without satisfactory information, at least to some extent, on this head, he should scruple to decree the faculty prayed; even though no appearance in opposition were given on the part of the parish or that of any particular parishioner.

in this cause, died at Chantilly, in France, on the 2nd of August, 1825. He had been travelling for several years prior to that event on the Continent in a declining state of health; and was on his return to this country when he so died at Chantilly. He left behind him two brothers and a sister, his only next of kin. The sister had accompanied him on his travels. One of the brothers, Christopher, joined him at Chantilly on the 26th of July, having been apprised by the sister of the deceased's increased illness at that place.

On the day subsequent to that of his brother's arrival at Chantilly (the 27th of July) the deceased merely stated to him in conversation that "he had made no will;" but in two days after, on the 29th, he communicated to his brother some of his wishes respecting the disposition of his property, and requested him to draw up a paper expressive of such wishes, which he promised to sign. Mr. Christopher Tolcher accordingly [17] drew up such a paper,(a) of which he afterwards made a transcript; but he never offered either of the papers to the deceased for his signature, as suggested, from motives of delicacy: for the paper, so written, purported to bequeath the deceased's real estates to the two brothers in equal proportions, he, Christopher Tolcher, being the younger, and consequently not entitled to any portion of the real estate. The deceased never asked for the paper, and died without having seen it. In the paper so drawn up (as also in its transcript) was a legacy of 10,000l. 3 per cents. to the sister; and a legacy of 100l. sterling to the deceased's servant. Three other persons were named as legatees, but the [18] amount of their several legacies was left in blank. The residue, personal as well as real, was given and devised equally to the two brothers. The real estate was said to be very large, and the personalty was sworn to amount in value to between 50 and 60,000l.

It is obvious that neither of the above papers could have any effect with regard to the real estate; but it was endeavoured to give to the paper first drawn up operation with respect to the personalty. The only person whose interest could be affected by it was the sister: as she, in case of an intestacy, was entitled to a share of the personalty much exceeding in value the specific sum purported to be bequeathed to her. But the sister had executed a proxy of consent to administration of the deceased's effects with this paper annexed, passing to her brothers as the two joint residuary legatees. And she also had joined with the brother Christopher in an affidavit of the circumstances of the case above stated, as to that (not, however, the most material) part of them within her knowledge.

Under these circumstances, upon this affidavit and proxy of consent, the Court was moved by counsel to decree administration with the first of the two testamentary papers annexed, of which the second was a mere transcript, to the deceased's brothers, Edward and Christopher Tolcher, Esquires, as the residuary legatees therein named.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. I think that I am bound not to grant this prayer, although it is seemingly at least assented to by the only party who has any interest to oppose it; I mean by the sister of the deceased, who joins in making the [19] affidavit upon which this motion is founded; and who has also executed a proxy of

(a) The paper so drawn up was in these words:—

My sister, 10,000l. 3 per cents.

My servant, Mary, 100l. sterling.

———— Magrath, l. sterling.

William Hawker, l. sterling, in lieu of the cottage at Buckland, which I promised him.

My god-child, James Brooking, l. sterling.

The rest of my property, of whatever kind or description, both real and personal, to be equally divided between my brothers, Edward and Christopher Tolcher, and to their heirs and assigns for ever.

It was stated by Mr. Christopher Tolcher in his affidavit that the legacy or bequest to the sister, as directed by the deceased, was 10,000l. sterling. But that he, knowing his brother's personal property to have chiefly consisted of money invested in the 3 per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, through misapprehension and inadvertency, took down the sum as 10,000l. in that stock.

This paper was subscribed—"N.B.—These wishes were expressed to me this morning by my brother, John Tolcher, as forming the important parts of his last will.

consent to the administration passing as prayed. Had the sister spoken (being capable of speaking) to the material facts contained in the affidavit—were the Court perfectly satisfied, again, that she had executed this proxy of consent with a just knowledge and true apprehension of her legal rights, in case of her brother's intestacy —lastly, had the question itself, testate or intestate, been a question in any way doubtful in the case, the Court might possibly, in all these events, have had no scruple in giving operation to the paper now sought to be established. But the sister neither has spoken, nor could speak, to the material parts of the affidavit, as she was not present at either of the conferences between Mr. Christopher Tolcher and the deceased, relative to his proposed testamentary arrangements: and the Court has no proof beyond the ordinary presumption (hardly, I think, quite satisfactory in such a case), that in signing this proxy the sister was fully aware of its legal import; and that, in fact, by so doing, she was giving away property to the amount in value of nearly 10,000l. Thirdly, however, and principally, so far is the question testate or intestate from being a doubtful question, in the present case, that I am quite satisfied of the utter impossibility of the paper sought to be rendered operative ever, if opposed, being established as a will. In the first place, that it was written at all by the direction of the deceased rests solely (although the Court, morally speaking, has no doubt whatever of the fact) upon the testimony of Mr. Christopher Tolcher, an interested and, therefore, an incompetent witness. And the Court could never establish such a [20] paper on the testimony of a single releasing witness, even should Mr. Christopher Tolcher, by releasing his interest, regain his competency. Consequently, that the deceased was privy to the contents of this paper at all is a fact incapable of being so put in evidence, as to have much, if any, weight with the Court in deciding upon its legal validity.

But were the whole history of this paper, as furnished in the affidavit, put in plea, and proved to the Court by the most unquestionable testimony, it would still, I think, be quite inefficient to sustain the paper itself as a will. On the 27th of July the deceased merely says that he has no will, but expresses no wish or intention to make one. What passed on the 29th would, at the utmost, only be proof, to my mind, that some loose notions as to the future disposal of his property by will were floating in the deceased's brain at that time; it would be no proof, to my mind, that at that time the deceased seriously conceived that he was making his will. The subject itself seems never to have suggested itself to him, either previous or subsequent to that time. If previous, he would have been prepared with fuller instructions at that time; whereas, of the proposed legatees, a majority of the legacies are left in blank. Subsequent to that time the subject is never recurred to. His promised signature is never obtained; and as the deceased had large real property, which the paper purports to bequeath, he must have known, I presume, that not only its execution, but that its execution in the presence of witnesses, was essential to give this paper full operation. The legacy to the sister is 10,000l. 3 per cents., both in the original paper of instructions, and in the transcript. But it is [21] now discovered, by what process I do not very clearly comprehend, that the legacy to the sister was meant to be 10,000l. sterling (see note, p. 17). What then is the paper, upon this shewing, but the hasty inception of a testamentary project; neither much considered in its origin, nor far advanced in its progress? As an imperfect paper, however, which this is, in the fullest sense of the term imperfect, it could only be sustained by proof, first, that it expresses the deceased's final intentions; secondly, that he was prevented by extrinsic circumstances from putting those final intentions into a more formal and legal shape. But what was to prevent the deceased in this case from putting his final intentions, as expressed in this paper, if such were his final intentions, which I can hardly deem them, into a legal shape? He lived till the 2d of August, without any allusion or reference whatever to this paper, even as suggested in that interval. The legal presumption, accordingly, is, either that he thought no more of this paper at all, the whole transaction relative to which I must then suppose to be the result of a mere transient impression; or that, if he did, he had altered his mind about it, and finally meant to die intestate—in the teeth of which presumption it would be out of the question to establish this paper as a will. In every view of the case, therefore, it appears to me that I am bound to reject this motion, and to pronounce that the deceased is dead, so far as appears, intestate in law.

Motion rejected.

[22] IN THE GOODS OF CHRISTOPHER COKE, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1825.—Special certificates to the facts of the case, necessary to found the grant, superadded to the oath of the applicant, in the instance of every administration applied for (the obvious and only general scheme suggested for preventing frauds in obtaining letters of administration) would involve a general inconvenience, less tolerable than the particular evil in question. But the Court may direct such special certificates in certain cases: and if, being exhibited, they are unsatisfactory to the Court [for instance, as failing to certify the principal facts by the testimony of third persons, speaking of their own knowledge; or, as the case may be], the Court will, at least, suspend, and may probably in the end altogether reject, the application for the grant itself in such case.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The party deceased in this cause is a Mr. Christopher Coke; described as late of the Million Bank, in the parish of St. Clement's, East Cheap, in the city of London. He is alleged to have died in the month of August, 1802, intestate, and a bachelor, without parent, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, nephew or niece; leaving behind him Eleanor Norris, his lawful first cousin, and one of his next of kin; and, consequently, one of the parties entitled to letters of administration of his personal estate and effects. The present claimant of the said letters of administration is her attorney, a Mr. Joseph Adey, described as of No. 16 Houndsditch, hatter. He, Mr. Adey, has annexed certain documents in support of his claim to a memorial which he has addressed to the Court. And the question is whether those documents furnish such precautions as the Court required to be furnished with, previous to a grant of administration, in any case, issuing to this particular individual, Mr. Joseph Adey.

The Court's motive or inducement to make any order of the sort applicable to this person in particular may be said in a few words. The Court had been given to understand that Mr. Adey was a dealer in this traffic; a kind of trader in administrations—that he was in the practice of sending circulars all over the [23] kingdom, addressed to particular individuals, promising to make disclosures of monies to be obtained under letters of administration of the goods of parties dead intestate (mostly at very distant periods in point of time), with whom the individuals addressed were ascertained or presumed to be connected; on condition of being secured a specific sum in return for such disclosures; or, more frequently, a per centage on the monies to be recovered. In the course, and by reason, of this traffic the Court was given to understand that administrations had, in several instances, been unduly taken by persons so addressed by Mr. Adey, or by him on their behalf; and that, in some cases, in which Mr. Adey had taken letters of administration, as the attorney of parties entitled to them resident out of the province, those who were interested in, could obtain from Mr. Adey no satisfactory account of the property. Representations to this effect were made to the Court by a public body—which suggested several schemes in the nature of a general plan to obviate fraud and circumvention in grants of administration by the Court generally. The Court was fully disposed to have adopted any one of these, if any one general plan had been suggested, of remedying the particular evil, without involving a greater general inconvenience. No such, however, was suggested. Were the Court to require special certificates to the facts of the case in the instance of every administration applied for (the obvious, and, in fact, only general remedy suggested), the general inconvenience would greatly overbalance the particular evil. Accordingly, it limited the precautions suggested to cases under special circumstances—[24] and, at the same time, it did, in particular, direct that no grant of administration should pass to Mr. Adey, as the attorney of any other person or persons, but under the order of the Court itself; after being certified as to all the principal facts necessary to found the grant, by the testimony of third persons; who could speak to them as of facts within their own knowledge, and not from mere hearsay or report.

What, then, is this particular case? The deceased, it is said, died intestate twenty-three years ago; leaving a cousin-german, among others related to him in the same degree, next of kin. This cousin-german is an old woman aged eighty years, resident at Gateshead, in the county of Durham; and she it is who appoints Mr. Adey, her attorney, to take administration to her use and in her behoof. Such is the foundation of Mr. Adey's claim. Now it seems to me that the documents annexed to his memorial are insufficient to sustain that claim—and that, if in shew and semblance, still, in substance and effect, they do not amount to that proof which the Court required to be furnished with, under the circumstances of this particular case.

These documents, exclusive of the usual power of attorney, are two affidavits. The first of these, that of Norris herself, a markswoman, is to the mere effect that the deceased did die, as alleged, intestate, leaving her, the appearer, his first cousin, and one of his next of kin. The other affidavit is that of a Mr. Daniel Robertson, of Gateshead, nearly as short as the first; and to the mere effect that he has for many years known, and been acquainted with, Eleanor Norris, who is upwards of eighty years of age; and that, knowing her [25] to be a woman of good faith and credit, he believes, &c.—that is to the precise effect of what she, Norris, has sworn.

Now, I think that these affidavits are no effectual compliance with the order of the Court; at least not in this particular case. In the case of a party who had died recently—a case, too, otherwise attended with no special circumstances—I won't say that the Court might not have decreed administration to Mr. Adey upon affidavits, even to the mere effect of those just stated. But the case in point is one attended throughout with very special circumstances. In the first place, the deceased died twenty-three years ago, possessed of or entitled to property, said to amount in value to 500l., though of what consisting or where deposited nothing is said. He left behind him, it is admitted, two at least, probably many, and possibly very many more, next of kin; not related to him in any remote degree; being, as alleged, first cousins. Yet the sole applicant for administration, and at this remote period, is this aged female, resident at Gateshead, out of the province, by her attorney, Mr. Adey. It is to be observed, by the way, that it is only on behalf of a person resident out of the province of Canterbury that administration can be taken here by an attorney. Accordingly, of Mr. Adey's principals in the several grants to which I have before adverted, the whole have been (indeed necessarily) fixed, some, like this Norris, in the province of York; some, in North Britain; and more, in Ireland. Under the special circumstances, then, to which I have adverted, do the affidavits exhibited sustain Mr. Adey's claim, as the Court required it to be sustained? They certainly do not, in my view [26] of them. The Court required to be certified, as to the principal facts necessary to sustain that claim, by the testimony of indifferent parties, themselves not unacquainted with those facts. How are these affidavits a compliance with that requisition? Norris's affidavit is merely to her kinship and to the deceased's intestacy, without any nearer relations—that of the other appearer, again, is to the same mere effect; and upon what founded? Not upon any, pretended even, knowledge of the facts; but upon the appearer's belief (a belief possibly well founded) that she, Norris, is a person who would not wilfully perjure herself. The Court is not forward to suspect that Norris has so done. It must still, however, have fuller and more satisfactory information as to the facts of this case, before it grants these letters of administration to her attorney; that attorney being Mr. Joseph Adey. It must be better assured (under the circumstances of this case) that she, Norris, is this intestate's cousin-german; and that he died, leaving no person or persons of kin to him in a nearer degree. She may, somehow, have been persuaded to believe all this; and the facts after all may not so be. Her discoveries on this head, no doubt through the instrumentality of Mr. Adey, at this remote period, are, however, a little suspicious. But the Court has also, I think, a right to know something of the other next of kin; for Norris admits herself not to be the sole person entitled. They, assuming, as the fact probably is, more than one other next of kin, have a majority of interest; and, so having, are entitled to this administration in preference to Norris herself; à fortiori in preference to her attorney, Mr. Adey; in whom they may have scruples to confide, though she, [27] Norris, has none. Even a single other cousin-german has an equal interest with Norris; and, consequently, is equally entitled with Norris to the letters of administration now applied for. Some other cousin-german, too, may be resident here, though Norris resides out of the province; and, if any, I do think that, under the circumstances, an opportunity should be afforded him or her of taking out these letters of administration in his and her own right; and that they should not be hastily and blindly committed to Mr. Adey, as the attorney of Mrs. Norris. At present, then, I direct this motion to stand over, for fuller and more satisfactory information generally. In the event of the Court ultimately acceding to Mr. Adey's application, on being furnished with such, it will still, however, most undoubtedly require his securities to justify.

Motion suspended.

HUTCHINSON v. LAMBERT AND CURLING. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1825.—The ordinary practice, where an executor fails to represent a testator, is to grant administration, with his will annexed, to the residuary legatee, in trust, if any; and failing such residuary legatee in trust, then to grant the same, not to his or her representative, but to such person or persons as have the beneficial interest in the residuary estate under the will.—Administration decreed, however, in this case, to the representative of a surviving trustee, in preference to either or both of two other claimants, styling themselves "residuary legatees" simply, but without any violation of the ordinary practice, as explained above; such other claimants being in fact residuary legatees for life only, each in a fifth of the residue; she, the representative of the surviving trustee, having also, as such, herself a beneficial interest in the residuary estate greater than that of either of the other claimants; and the will of the testator plainly excluding the interference or control of those other claimants, or either of them, in the general management of his estate.

(On petition.)

This was a cause, or business, of calling in letters of administration (with the will and codicils annexed) of [28] the goods, chattels and credits of James Hutchinson, deceased, left unadministered by Bury Hutchinson, also deceased; while living, the son, and surviving executor, and residuary legatee in trust named in the said will; thentofore obtained by Nutty Lambert, wife of William Lambert, Esquire, and Harriet Curling, wife of Bunce Curling, Esquire; in the said letters of administration described (ex parte) as two of the children, and as such two of the residuary legatees named in the will of the said testator; and of citing the said Nutty Lambert and Harriet Curling to shew cause why the same should not be revoked, and declared null and void; and why letters of administration of the testator's effects left unadministered as aforesaid should not be committed and granted to Esther Mary Hutchinson, widow, the relict and administratrix of the goods of the said Bury Hutchinson, promoted by the said Esther Mary Hutchinson against the said Nutty Lambert and Harriet Curling.

James Hutchinson, Esquire, the testator, by his will dated on the 16th of June, 1823, appointed Robert Sherson, M.D., and his son, Bury Hutchinson, executors and residuary legatees in trust. Mr. Bury Hutchinson, alone, took probate of the will, on the renunciation of Dr. Sherson, in October, 1807; and having survived Dr. Sherson, died in October, 1824, intestate, leaving goods of the testator unadministered. The testator by his said will devised and bequeathed his real and personal estates (directed to be converted into money) to the said Robert Sherson and Bury Hutchinson, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust that they, or the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of such survivor, should, after payment of debts and [29] legacies, apportion the residue of his personal, and produce of his real, estate among his five children, a son and four daughters, share and share alike; that is to say—a fifth to his son Bury Hutchinson, absolutely; and the remainder in separate parts to his trustees, for each of his four daughters, in trust, to invest and lay out the same in the purchase of stocks or funds, or at interest upon Government or real securities, in the trustees' own names; and upon further trust, to pay from time to time the dividends or annual produce of such stock, &c., to each daughter, for her life, independent of her husband, if any; and at her decease to transfer her fifth to her children, if any; but in the event of either of his said daughters dying without issue, then to stand possessed of her fifth, in trust for such of his, the testator's, other children (including his son, Bury Hutchinson) as should then be living; such accruing shares to go to and among the said survivors, in like manner as the original shares; and to be subject (those of the daughters) to the same limitations. And in case of his said trustees, or either of them, or of any future trustees or trustee, dying, or declining to act in the trusts of his said will, the said testator especially provided that each of his said daughters should or might nominate and appoint new trustees, or a new trustee, as to her peculiar share, in the place and stead of the trustees or trustee so dying, or declining to act; which power of nomination or appointment each of the daughters, for herself, had actually exercised, on Mr. Bury Hutchinson becoming by the renunciation of Dr. Sherson sole executor and trustee of and in the said will.

In support of the grant of letters of administration so [30] made as aforesaid, it was principally alleged by the parties cited, in their act of Court, and principally insisted by their counsel at the hearing, that it was a grant made in strict conformity with the ordinary practice of the Court; it being stated as the ordinary (or rather as the constant) rule and practice of the Court, in all cases where an executor fails to represent a testator, to grant administration with his will annexed to the residuary legatee in trust, if any—and, failing such legatee in trust, then to grant the same, not to his or her representative, but to such person or persons as have the beneficial interest in the residuary estate, under the provisions of the will.

On the other hand, it was alleged and contended that the case in point was exempted from the operation of the ordinary rule in such cases, admitting it to be, as well by the double character of the son, Mr. Bury Hutchinson, who was not only the residuary legatee in trust, but had a beneficial interest in the residuary estate, greater than that of either of the daughters; as also by the circumstance that the daughters, especially if under coverture, were virtually excluded from any right of intermeddling personally in the administration of his effects by the testator himself. The son, it was said, took under the will an absolute and beneficial interest in a fifth of the residue: he had also a contingent interest in each of the remaining four fifths, expectant on the demise of either of the daughters without issue; which contingent interest was a vested interest, and constituted part of his personal estate. The daughters, on the contrary, had not, like the son, an immediate or disposable interest in or over even their own shares—they had a mere life [31] interest in these; and the limitations of the will were plainly intended by the testator to exclude his said daughters from any power or control in or over even their own shares beyond that of nominating, each for herself, a trustee for her own share, in a certain contingency; which power of nomination each, for herself, had actually exercised. Of the husband of either of his married daughters, the testator had carefully excluded all interference; even in respect to his wife's own portion. Here, the administratrixes being both married women, in the event of this grant being unrevoked, their husbands in effect will be administrators of his general estate; in plain opposition to the testator's intention. Under these circumstances it was said Mrs. Bury Hutchinson, as administratrix of her husband, the surviving trustee, is become, according to the will of the testator, the trustee of the residue of his personal estate and effects; and in her the legal title thereto is clearly vested—in respect of which, as well as in that of a priority of interest, she is preferably entitled to letters of administration. Nor can she, as representative of her husband; nor can the trustees of Mrs. Lambert and Mrs. Curling, trustees of their own nomination and those of the other daughters, safely permit the letters of administration to remain in the hands of Mrs. Lambert and Mrs. Curling, the present administratrixes.

Court—Sir John Nicholl. The practice relied on in support of the grant sought to be revoked may obtain without inconvenience in ordinary cases. But in no case similar to the present is [32] it shewn to have obtained at all—still less is it shewn to have obtained in any similar case, the circumstances of which were brought, judicially, to the notice of the Court and solemnly decided upon. I have, therefore, no hesitation in saying that, in this particular case, Mrs. Hutchinson, as the personal representative of the residuary legatee in trust, and not either of the residuary legatees themselves, so styled, is the proper person to represent the testator. As administratrix of Mr. Bury Hutchinson, she it is who has a right to administer the estate; both in regard to the beneficial interest given by the will to the son, Mr. Bury Hutchinson, for his own use—an interest greater than that of either of the daughters—as also in regard to the shares given to the said son, in trust for the daughters and their issue. The testator himself has restricted the daughters (especially if under coverture) from intermeddling, personally, in the administration of his general estate; by interposing trustees from whom they are to receive the interest or proceeds each of her fifth share and for life only. Accordingly, they are not, though so described in the grant, residuary legatees simply—they have a mere life-interest, each in a fifth, of the residue: and nothing can be more contrary to the testator's plain intention than that the general management of his estate should fall into the hands of any one or more of his daughters, if a married woman or married women; as their husbands are expressly excluded from any power or control, in, or over, even their particular shares. Without disturbing the general rule, I am of opinion that it has no application in the present case; and that I am at full liberty to direct [33] this administration to be revoked; and to decree administration as prayed to the widow and administratrix of the surviving trustee.(a)

CURTIS v. CURTIS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1825.—It is incompetent to the Court to strike out or expunge any part of a will (however immaterial) on mere verbal statements to the fitness of this [i.e. statements unsupported by any evidence, &c.], even though with the consent of all parties whose interest it can by possibility affect.

[Referred to, In the Estate of White, [1914] P. 154.]

(On motion.)

This was a business of proving, in solemn form of law, the last will and testament of James Curtis, deceased; promoted and brought by Joseph Curtis, as administrator of Mary Curtis, also deceased, whilst living the sister, and universal legatee, named in the said will, there being no executor named therein, against Emma Maria Curtis, widow, the relict of the said deceased.

The will to be proved, all in the deceased's hand writing, was in these words:

"I leave all property of every kind to my sister Mary, in consequence of the cruel and murderous conduct of my wife, in this illness, as well as in past instances.

"13th December, 1823. "JAMES CURTIS."

[34] An allegation had been given, propounding this will, and witnesses examined; and publication of their evidence was now prayed. It was stopped by the proctor for the wife, asserting an allegation. At the same time he stated that his principal, the wife, though perfectly satisfied of her capacity to oppose the paper propounded, effectually, by reason that the deceased was of unsound mind at the time of his writing it, still, in consideration of the small amount in value of the property, would waive her asserted allegation, and consent to administration with the paper annexed passing to the other party; provided the Court would strike out that extraneous part of it, so injurious to her (the wife's) character—for which there was said not to be the slightest foundation—but that it solely proceeded from, and indeed was evidence of, the deceased's insanity, at the time when it was written. The property, after such erasure, would still stand wholly bequeathed to the sister.

The Court said that, not having authority to strike out or expunge any part of a will written by a testator, propriâ manu, upon a mere verbal application like the present, it was compelled, unwillingly, to withhold its assent to the proposition, now made on the part of the wife. It remembered that a similar application on the part of a nobleman, whose wife had made serious reflections upon him in her will, had been rejected by its predecessor, Sir William Wynne, on similar grounds; although in that, as in the present case, all parties were consenting.

Under these circumstances the proctor for the wife asserted an allegation.

[35] IN THE GOODS OF MARTHA FENTON, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1825.—It is the practice of the office not to receive the renunciation of an executor, &c., without the original will. Hence the Court, when applied to for letters of administration, limited to assign a satisfied term of years to the nominee of the owner of the fee (in which case it is not the practice of the office to annex the original will), on the renunciation of the party

---

(a) As administratrixes of James Hutchinson, deceased, Mrs. Lambert and Mrs. Curling had also obtained administration of the unadministered effects of John Hutchinson, who died at Anjingo, in the East Indies, in the lifetime of his father, a bachelor and intestate, to whose effects James Hutchinson, the father, while living, had been administrator. The propriety of this grant depending on that of the former, the leading grant, the Court, at the same time, revoked the letters of administration thentofore granted to Mrs. Lambert and Mrs. Curling of the unadministered effects of John Hutchinson, deceased, and decreed letters of administration of the said unadministered effects to Mrs. Hutchinson, as the true representative of the father, the former administrator.

entitled to the administration of the deceased's effects with her will annexed, in preference to receiving the renunciation without the original will (this not being to be had), decreed the party entitled to be cited to accept or refuse, &c., promising to grant the administration to the nominee of the owner of the fee, on the other's default.

By indenture, dated the 3rd of December, 1759, certain premises situated at Sampford, in the county of Essex, were assigned to Martha Fenton, for the then remainder of a term of 1000 years, as security for the payment of a principal sum of 365l., with interest to her, the said Martha Fenton.

Martha Fenton died in the year 1760, without having been paid the said mortgage debt; having made her will, and thereof appointed her daughter, Martha Brentnall, sole executrix, who proved the same in the Court of the Archdeacon of Suffolk. She, Martha Brentnall, also died, having made her will, and thereof appointed Daniel Fenton and John Stephen Debenne, executors; who proved the same in the Consistory Court of Norwich.

In September, 1790, the said mortgage debt and interest then due thereon, amounting to 420l., was paid to the said executors; who, on the 29th of that month, by indenture, acknowledged the receipt thereof; and assigned the said term to a trustee of the then owner of the fee, to attend the inheritance of the premises.

Lastly, John Stephen Debenne, the survivor of the said two executors, also died, having made his will, and thereof appointed two executors, who proved the same in the Court of the Archdeacon of Norfolk—one of [36] which two executors, Mr. Charles Clark, was still living.

Martha Fenton, the original testatrix, had of course made no assignment of the term; and the assignment thereof made by the executors of her daughter and sole executrix was deemed invalid in law by reason that they were not her representatives by the authority of a competent Court, as a prerogative probate of her will should have been had: consequently, the legal right or interest in the remainder of the said term of 1000 years was still held to be an unadministered part of the personal estate and effects of Martha Fenton—the whole of her personal estate and effects, save as to such remainder, having been long since fully administered.

The present owner of the estate, being the only person equitably and beneficially interested in the said term, had by proxy, under his hand and seal, authorised his proctor to obtain an administration of the effects of Martha Fenton, deceased, limited to her interest in the said term, to be granted to his nominee; and Mr. Clark, the surviving executor of the surviving executrix of the sole executrix of the original testatrix (Martha Fenton), had, by proxy, under his hand and seal, renounced his right to letters of administration, with the will annexed of the goods of the said original testatrix, Martha Fenton. But the office had scrupled to pass the grant, by reason that this renunciation had not been accompanied with the original will of the deceased,(a) (which Mr. Clark had no means of obtaining, it having been proved, and still remaining in the [37] Court of the Archdeacon of Suffolk); and it not being the practice of the office to receive the renunciation of a party, unless it be accompanied by the original will of the deceased, probate of which or administration, with that will annexed, it purports to renounce. Under the special circumstances, however, of the case, the Court was moved to decree administration, limited as above, to the nominee of the owner of the estate, upon the renunciation of Mr. Clark, without the production of the deceased's will. But

The Court said that in preference to so doing, in violation of a settled rule of practice, it would decree Mr. Clark to be cited to accept or refuse letters of administration, with the will annexed, &c., of the unadministered effects of Martha Fenton, deceased; and that in the event of his not appearing, or of his appearing and failing to shew cause to the contrary, it would then decree a limited administration, as now prayed, to the nominee of the owner of the fee. Accordingly, it directed a decree to that effect to issue.

(a) Note, that it is not the present practice of the office to annex the will to an administration limited to assign a satisfied term of years.

CLEMENT v. RHODES AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1825.—No party, whether such originally, or a mere intervener in a cause, can, of right, plead in the principal cause after publication has once passed of evidence taken in that cause. But the Court, if prayed, may still, ex gratia, permit a party so to plead on cause shewn. Facts set forth in an affidavit, in order to found a prayer to that effect, on the part of an intervener, stated by the Court; and held, for reasons stated, to be insufficient to sustain the prayer. But the party so praying permitted, under the circumstances, to cross-examine the witnesses on the other side (so, after their evidence published, that is), on first giving security for the payment of costs if finally awarded against him by the Court.—Interveners must take the cause in which they intervene as they find it at the time of such their intervention. Hence they can only of right do what they might have done, had they been parties in the first instance; or had their intervention occurred in an earlier stage of the cause.—Facts noviter perventa, newly come to the knowledge of the proponent, are the sole facts pleadable after publication (and that only by special leave of the Court), except under circumstances very extraordinary.

(On motion.)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This application, which is one of some importance in its bearing upon a point of practice, arises out of the following case:—

[38] The testator in the cause, Thomas Millson, died on the 20th of March, 1825. The will propounded in the cause bears date on the 21st of March, 1821. On the 26th of April, 1825, a decree issued at the instance of Alice Clement (a natural daughter of the testator), sole executrix of this will of the 21st of March, 1821, against Thomas Rhodes, the testator's nephew, and one of his only two next of kin,(a)[1] and against Thomas Millson (the testator's natural son) or legatee, or annuitant, in and under a former will of the said testator, bearing date in the month of August, 1820, citing them, the said Thomas Rhodes and Thomas Millson, to see the said will of the 21st of March, 1821, propounded and proved in solemn form of law; with the usual intimation. This decree to see proceedings was personally served, both upon Mr. Rhodes and upon Mr. Millson, on the 30th of the same month of April.

On the first session of the ensuing Trinity Term a proctor appeared for, and exhibited a special proxy under the hands and seals of, the said Alice Clement and her husband, Richard Clement, and brought in a special affidavit of his said parties, as to scripts, with scripts annexed, marked from letter A to letter N; and then, in pain of the parties cited, propounded the paper marked letter A, being the will of March, 1821; [39] and asserted an allegation. That allegation (a common condidit) was brought in on the second, and was admitted on the third, session of the term. On the fourth session additional articles were brought in and were admitted on the bye-day; such additional articles pleading merely the death, character, and hand-writing of one of the three subscribed witnesses to the will.

On the condidit, and these additional articles, five witnesses were examined;(a)[2] and on the first session of the present (Michaelmas) term the Court decreed publication and assigned the cause for sentence on the first assignation; upon which, and the usual accompanying assignation as to exceptive allegations, the cause stood till the third session. All the above proceedings were regularly had on pain of the parties cited. But on this third session of Michaelmas Term an appearance is at length given for Mr. Thomas Millson; not as in order, either to defend his case by counsel at the hearing, or to plead, as he would be entitled of right to do, in exception to the testimony of the witnesses examined on the condidit; but as praying, now, in this last stage of the cause, and after the publication of evidence already taken in it, to be permitted to plead in the principal cause. The question to which this prayer gives rise, being that now to be disposed of, is whether the petitioner is entitled de jure, or should be permitted, ex gratia, so to plead.

(a)[1] The sole other next of kin, John Rhodes, brother of Thomas Rhodes, had previously executed a proxy of consent to a probate of the will of the 21st of March, 1821, issuing to Alice Clements, the executrix.

(a)[2] Namely, on the condidit, Mr. Langton, a solicitor who prepared the will, and the two surviving subscribed witnesses; and, on the additional articles, two persons, to the death, character, and hand-writing of the third subscribed witness.

[40] Now the question of right may be disposed of in a very few words. No party can, of right, plead in a principal cause after publication has once passed of evidence already taken. And the rule as to interveners being that they must take the cause in which they intervene as they find it at the time of their intervention; and that they can, at such time, as of right, only do what they might have done had they been parties in the first instance, or had their intervention occurred in an earlier stage of the cause, it follows that Mr. Millson can, of right, only plead in exception to the testimony of the adverse witnesses; and that he cannot, of right, now, after publication, give any plea whatever in the principal cause.

But the Court may even rescind the conclusion of a cause in order to new facts being pleaded; so that clearly it may accede to this petitioner's prayer, ex gratia, as the cause at the time of his intervention was not actually formally concluded. And the real question, in this view of the case, is whether the grounds laid by the petitioner, in an affidavit which he has filed in support of his prayer, are, or are not, of a nature to induce the Court, in the exercise of a sound legal discretion upon all the circumstances of the case, to permit him to plead now, after publication, not in exception to the testimony of the witnesses whose depositions are so published, but in the principal cause.

The petitioner's affidavit is to this effect: it states that the testator in the cause died in the month of March, 1825, at the age of eighty-eight years, having first duly made and executed his last will and testament, bearing date on the 14th of August, 1820, [41] wherein he bequeathed the petitioner an annuity of 200l., charged upon his real property, for life; and afterwards to his, the petitioner's, children; that in the month of November, 1824, the testator was found to be of unsound mind, and to have so been from the 25th of September, 1820, under a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo, which issued about that time out of Chancery, at the instance of the petitioner, founded upon the testator's incompetency to manage his affairs; and that a committee, ad interim, of his person and estate was afterwards (for so the affidavit generally expresses it) appointed by the high court of Chancery; consequently, that the will propounded in this cause was made six months after the time from, and subsequent to, which a jury had found and returned that the alleged testator was non compos mentis.

Now, of the facts so alleged or disclosed in the affidavit, being the facts (if not the sole, the principal facts) proposed to be pleaded, it is evident that Mr. Millson was in possession of the whole even prior to the commencement of this cause. None of these are facts newly come to his knowledge; the sole facts pleadable after publication, and only by special leave of the Court, except under circumstances very extraordinary. The petitioner fails, then, to lay in support of his prayer the only ground upon which the Court, except in a case, I repeat, very extraordinary, would be justified in acceding to it.

A case, however, to justify the Court's interference, is attempted to be made in a subsequent part of the affidavit, in which the petitioner states that he was disabled from appearing to the decree to see proceed-[42]-ings in this cause, in the first instance, by extreme poverty and indigence; that ever since the month of April, when he was personally served with the said decree, he has been busied in applying to his friends for assistance; but, that only on the 22d of November, just prior to this third session of the term, his father-in-law came forward and consented to afford him the pecuniary means of opposing the will propounded in this cause on behalf of Mrs. Clement.

Now is the case so set up? is this attempt to account for the petitioner's late appearance in the cause, for it only comes to this, strictly satisfactory? I can hardly so deem it. If in extreme indigence, as he now states, the petitioner's regular course was to apply for leave to sue in formâ pauperis. He might well, indeed, have experienced some difficulty in obtaining that privilege, as he is an annuitant in the sum of 100l. for life, under the will which he now opposes. He did not, however, even seek to obtain it; which not having done, I think that I am bound not to suffer the fact, admitting it to be, of the petitioner's extreme indigence, so averred in this stage of the cause, to operate unduly to the prejudice of the other litigant.

But a circumstance discloses itself in this part of his affidavit, not of a nature to sustain the petitioner's prayer. His annuity under the will of August, 1820, as I have said, doubles in amount that which he is entitled to under the will of March, 1821. If, then, his friends had conceived that he had good legal grounds of opposing the latter, in order to set up the former, will, would not their assistance have been furnished him earlier? Would they, especially his father-in-law, not have come forward till after the evidence was pub-[43]-lished, and when the cause was on the point of being concluded? The father-in-law had every inducement, for the sake of his daughter and her children, to whom the annuity of 200l. is limited by the will of August, 1820, failing the petitioner. Their backwardness, especially that of the father-in-law, who now comes forward, tends to shew that they, at least, are not sanguine in their belief that any effectual opposition can be raised to the will propounded in this cause.

The rest of the petitioner's affidavit is simply this: After making oath that neither he nor any person on his behalf has seen or perused any of the depositions published in the cause, he concludes by averring his belief that the will propounded was made while the deceased was of unsound mind; and that he, the petitioner, shall be able to prove that fact by the evidence of good and competent witnesses, if allowed to do so by the Court.

Now the principal averment in this part (indeed in the whole) of the affidavit is, that the deceased was incompetent at the time in question of the making of this will. The petitioner swears to his belief that he was so incompetent; but he assigns no ground for such his belief; save and except that of the finding of the jury, mentioned at the head of his affidavit. It appears, however, from the affidavit of Mr. Langton, the deceased's solicitor, which has been filed by the executrix in answer to that of the petitioner, that the circumstances respecting that verdict, and the application for a commission of lunacy itself, are a little extraordinary. It appears by this that the commission issued at the suit of Millson, the present petitioner, on the 20th of November, 1824; and that the writ of inquiry [44] was executed on the 26th of November; no notice whatever, either of the commission itself, or of the execution of the writ of inquiry, having been communicated either to Mr. and Mrs. Clement, with whom the deceased was residing, or to Mr. Langton, his solicitor, till the 25th, the day immediately preceding the execution of the writ of inquiry. It appears by this that, under these circumstances, proceedings were immediately instituted in the Court of Chancery to traverse the inquisition, and set aside the verdict; which proceedings were actually depending when the testator died in March, 1825. And lastly, it further appears by Mr. Langton's affidavit that, though a committee, ad interim (the reason of such conditional appointment of a committee now, for the first time, disclosing itself), was appointed as sworn by Millson, yet that such committee, ad interim, was the testator's daughter, Mrs. Clement, the executrix of, and party propounding, this will. All these circumstances are extremely suspicious; to which I may add another, namely, the period fixed upon by the jury as that at which the testator's incapacity is found to have commenced. They find him to have been of unsound mind from the 25th of September, 1820. Now the will, under which the petitioner Millson takes the annuity of 200l. for his own life and that of his children, is dated in August, 1820. But it does so happen that at the back of this will is a codicil, dated in December, 1820, by which Millson's powers, in respect of this annuity, are materially abridged; this codicil providing that his life-interest shall be forfeited in the event of his attempting to anticipate this, as by sale or mortgage or otherwise; and that the annuity shall then go [45] to his children as if he were naturally dead. Hence the verdict of the jury, fixing the commencement of the testator's mental incapacity so precisely between the date of the will and that of this codicil, is, in conjunction with those other facts stated in Mr. Langton's affidavit relative to the commission of lunacy itself, and the execution of the writ of inquiry, to which I have already adverted, a very singular and alarming feature of the case.

I have looked through the several testamentary papers in this cause in order to see whether they afford any circumstances tending to sustain the present application. That, however, I am bound to say, is not their effect by any means. The son is a mere annuitant in every one of these wills; the principal estate, both real and personal, is given and devised to the daughter in each and all of them.(a) The trustees in all are the same, particularly Mr. Langton; and through his agency every one of these wills appears to have been executed. There is a paper of instructions for a will of March, 1821, dated on the 14th of that month, in the testator's handwriting; and that will itself (dated on the 19th of March) is drawn up and attested by Mr. Langton; who also attests as well the will of August, 1820, as the codicil of December in that year; by which Millson's powers in respect of his annuity are abridged, as already said. The will of the 21st of March, 1821 (that propounded), is precisely to the same effect with that of the 19th of March, two days prior, except in some legal technical particulars, not at all interfering with the substance of the will. [46] This last will, indeed, is not attested by Mr. Langton (possibly as with reference to his being a trustee), but he prepares that will, like all the others, and two of the three attesting witnesses are persons in apparent connexion with him; being described as he, Mr. Langton himself, is, of Clothworker's Hall. The circumstances, then, so disclosed on the face of these testamentary papers are not at all of a nature to sustain this application—as they go strongly to negative the testator's asserted incapacity, at the time when this will was actually executed; the sole ground of the projected opposition to the will itself.

What, however, lastly, as appears from the petitioner's own affidavit, is the sort of case meant to be set up in opposition to the will? It is obviously a case of general insanity. But if this be established on his part, it is still open to the executrix to set up a lucid interval or capacity at the time in question of the making of the will—on proof of which, notwithstanding general insanity proved, the Court will still be bound to pronounce in favour of the will. What the Court then is to expect from Mr. Millson is probably a lengthy allegation, setting up a case of general incapacity or unsoundness of mind—its effect after all, at the utmost, being to throw some additional onus probandi on the executrix—and so to render a stricter proof of the factum of the will in question, especially in the article of capacity, essential than the Court might otherwise possibly require. Now, for the petitioner's own sake, it is surely best not to allow him to involve himself and his friends in the intricacies of such a case—especially if I can put him in the way of attaining his object by a more summary and less expensive mode. And if I [47] allow him, as I incline to do, to cross-examine the witnesses on the condidit, in particular, Mr. Langton, it appears to me that, by so doing, he may attain all the benefit which he proposes to himself, by going into a substantive plea. He may bring out by this process the commission of lunacy, and the finding of the jury, that the deceased was non compos mentis at the time when this will was executed. Mr. Langton must admit, for he has already sworn to, this. He may arrive, by this same process, and it should seem by this alone, at all the circumstances connected with the preparation and execution of the will, which is the immediate subject of this suit. He is even to some extent placed by this in a better situation than he would be in the event of his being permitted to plead. If that privilege is accorded to him, the executrix will be entitled to plead again, of course—and though he, so sworn, has not seen the depositions, she has seen them; and may bolster up her case, if at present a weak one, by a new plea, so shaped as to supply any defect of proof in her case, as it now stands. Upon the whole, therefore, it appears to me that I go the utmost length, and at the same time provide best for the petitioner's own interest, by restricting him to a cross-examination of the witnesses on the condidit. This privilege, accordingly, under the circumstances which are stated in his affidavit, I propose to concede to him—but, in justice to the other party, I think that I am bound to accompany that concession with a condition that, prior to availing himself of this privilege, he, the petitioner, gives security in the sum of 100l., for the payment of such costs as the Court, if it should be of opinion that his opposition to the will, and consequently that this application to the Court, are frivolous or vexatious, or both, may in the [48] result think fit to award against him. The friends who have consented to assist the petitioner in opposing this will by plea will, of course, I presume, be bound for him in the sum now required—but, be that as it may, such security must be given before I can permit him, in this stage of the cause, to cross-examine the adverse witnesses with any shew of justice to the other party in the cause.(a)

(a) In the event of this suit the Court, in Trinity Term, pronounced for the will—Mr. Millson, after giving the security required, having cross-examined the witnesses on the condidit—but without condemning Mr. Millson in costs.

LONG v. ALDRED. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 26th Nov., 1825.—If a will be made before marriage, and the wife survive the husband, that will does not revive by and upon the mere death of the husband. But if a woman republish, in her widowhood, a will that she had made, being a feme sole, such will is equally good and valid to dispose of her property, as if it had been actually and originally made by her in her widowhood.—Note, facts and circumstances of what nature will amount to the republication of a will of personal estate.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

In the year 1813 Margaret Brown, widow, the deceased in this cause, then resident at Bengal in the East Indies, duly made and executed her last will and testament, bearing date the 12th of April, 1813; whereby she bequeathed the whole of her personal property in equal moieties between Mary Ann Brown, her heirs, &c., and Mary Aldred (party in the cause), her sister, and appointed Henry Churchill, Esq., sole executor.

After executing the above will the deceased intermarried with Henry Minson Baker, by whom she had no issue; and who died on the 15th of June, 1819.

The party deceased in the cause (then Margaret Baker) died on the 9th of June, 1820, leaving behind [49] her Mary Aldred and Samuel Aldred, her sole next of kin; and supposed, at that time, the only persons entitled to her personal estate and effects, in case of her legal intestacy.

The sole executor named in her said will having died shortly after the deceased herself, without proving the same, administration, with the said will annexed, was granted by the Court in the month of October, 1821, to Mary Aldred, the sister, as one of the universal legatees therein named; Samuel Aldred, the brother, and the supposed only person interested to contest the will, consenting to that grant.

It subsequently appeared, however, that the deceased left certain nephews and nieces entitled in distribution to her personal estate, if dead intestate in law: and a decree was now taken out at the instance of one of those parties, James Long, a nephew, citing the sister, Mary Aldred, to bring in the letters of administration, with the will annexed, so obtained as aforesaid, and to prove the will in solemn form of law; on pain of the deceased being pronounced to have died intestate. The sister, Mary Aldred, had appeared to that decree; and the question at issue was the admissibility of an allegation propounding, on her part, the said will.

This allegation pleaded in the 1st and 2d articles, or positions, the factum of the will of April, 1813—the subsequent intermarriage of the testatrix with Henry Minson Baker—and the death of Mr. Baker in the month of June, 1819, as already stated. It then pleaded in the 3d and 4th articles as follows:—

3. "That on a day happening in or about the month of March, 1820, the said Margaret Baker, the [50] deceased in this cause, being confined to her room by illness, desired her nurse, Jane Leader, who was then attending her, to bring her a mahogany box, in which she kept her papers of moment and concern, for the purpose of taking therefrom her marriage bond—that the said Jane Leader accordingly delivered the said box to the said deceased, and whilst engaged in looking over the papers therein, the said deceased took therefrom her will, being the very will pleaded and propounded in this cause, and observed to her, the said Jane Leader, pointing to the said will, 'Nurse, this is my will'—and upon the said Jane Leader observing that it was not a will and that it was all eaten by mice, the deceased replied, 'that it was so eaten by cockroaches—that it was the will she would abide by—that people wished her to make another; but that she would not, as, if she did, she should not alter it;' or words to that very effect. That the deceased then observed to the said Jane Leader that she, the deceased, would read the said will to her, which she accordingly began to do; but on some person coming into the room she desisted therefrom and replaced the said will in the said box, desiring the said Jane Leader not to mention that she, the said deceased, had a will; and adding, 'Now, nurse, if any thing should happen to me, you know where it is,' meaning the said will, which she, the deceased, had so replaced in the said mahogany box."

4. "The said Margaret Baker has also, since the death of the said Henry Minson Baker, on several occasions, up to the time of her death, declared to various persons, and particularly to ——— Claypole, spinster, [51] and Benjamin Baker, that she had made a will in India, of which Captain Churchill (meaning the said Henry Churchill, Esq.) was executor—that she intended the same to operate—and that her affairs were to be settled according to the directions contained in such will."

5. The fifth article of the allegation merely pleaded the finding of the will propounded among the deceased's papers of moment and concern in the box where she was pleaded, in the third article, to have deposited the same—and that no other testamentary paper whatever of the said deceased had been found, either there or elsewhere. And,

6. The sixth article only went to the death of the executor, without proving the will; and to the granting of letters of administration, with the will annexed, to Mary Aldred, as already stated in the case.

The admission of this allegation was opposed, principally, as with reference to an old case, before the Delegates,(a)[1] in which it was held that, "if a will be made before marriage, and the wife survives the husband, yet the will shall not revive upon the husband's death." But,

The Court was decidedly of opinion that the case cited only went to shew that the will, under such and similar circumstances, did not revive by the mere circumstance of the husband's death—but that if a woman republished a will which she had made prior to her coverture in and during her widowhood, that will, upon general principles, was equally good to dispose of her property, [52] as if the same had actually and originally been made in, and during, her widowhood. Consequently, as being of opinion that the facts and circumstances pleaded in the third and fourth articles of the allegation would, if proved, clearly amount to a republication of the will propounded by the party deceased in the cause, in and during her widowhood, so far as respected her personal estate, it admitted the allegation to proof.

Allegation admitted.(a)[2]

[53] KNIGHT AND LITTLEJOHNS v. GLOYNE. Arches Court, Hilary Term, Bye-Day, 1826.—It is, though usual, not essential to the validity of a church-rate, that it be "confirmed by the ordinary;" and the circumstance of a church-rate not being so confirmed, is no obstacle to its being sued upon, in the Ecclesiastical Court.

(An appeal from Winchester.)

This was an appeal from the Consistory Court of the Lord Bishop of Winchester. The cause, in that court, was a cause of subtraction of church-rate, promoted by James Knight and Joram Littlejohns, the churchwardens of the parish of Farlington, in the county of Southampton and diocese of Winchester, against Samuel Gloyne, of the said parish of Farlington, yeoman. A libel in the usual form was given in, in the Court at Winchester; upon which the defendant's answers were taken; and two witnesses had also been produced and examined. A third witness was about to be produced; when the defendant took an objection to the rate as "not having been confirmed by the ordinary." This objection the judge allowed: and on the 21st of October, 1825, "pronounced the rate to be invalid," on the ground that the same "had not been confirmed by the ordinary;" and dismissed the suit with costs. The present was an appeal from that sentence, duly prosecuted, to the Arches Court of Canterbury. But,

[54] The counsel for the respondent admitted that they were unable to sustain the sentence. Prideaux, indeed, says, speaking of a church-rate, that "when the churchwardens have got the rate confirmed by the archdeacon, or other ordinary authorized thereto, they may then sue it upon all that shall refuse to pay their proportions." This would certainly seem to imply that it was not competent to the churchwardens to sue upon a church-rate, until it was so "confirmed by the archdeacon or other ordinary." But Prideaux's book, however excellent, is not, in itself, authority; nor does it appear, either in any book of authority, or by any adjudged case, that a confirmation of the rate by the ordinary is essential to the validity of the rate. On the contrary, there is much to shew that the rate may be sued upon, equally, whether so confirmed or not. This, for instance, is to be collected from the precedents in "Oughton;" in which are many libels in causes of subtraction of church rate—in about the one half of which the rate is pleaded to have been, and in the other it is not pleaded to have been (and therefore must be taken not to have been), confirmed by the ordinary. Accordingly,

The Court pronounced for the appeal; reversed the sentence; and retained the principal cause: reserving the question of costs till the principal cause came to a hearing.(a)[1]

[55] In the Goods of James Milnes, Esquire, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1826.—Administration, with the will annexed, may be committed to a residuary legatee during the lunacy of a surviving executor and residuary legatee, in trust; at least by and with the consent (given or implied) of the committee of the lunatic.

(On motion.)

This was an application for letters of administration, with the will annexed, of the goods of James Milnes, Esquire, during the lunacy of the surviving executor and residuary legatee in trust, to be granted to the joint residuary legatees for life named in his will.

On the 18th of May, 1805, the will, with three codicils, was proved by the oaths of two executors; one of whom died, leaving a surviving executor, who was afterwards (under a writ de lunatico inquirendo) found a lunatic.

The two executors were also residuary legatees in trust; and were directed, by the will, to lay out such residue in the purchase of freehold estates; one moiety of such estates to be settled to the use of Benjamin Gaskell, Esquire, for life, and then to the first son and his heirs; and, in default, to the second son and his heirs, and so on: the other moiety to Daniel Gaskell, Esquire, &c., in like manner. Under these circumstances,

The Court was pleased, on motion of counsel, to decree letters of administration (with the will annexed) of the unadministered effects of the deceased to be granted, during the lunacy of the surviving executor and residuary legatee in trust, to Benjamin and Daniel Gaskell, [56] Esquires, the joint residuary legatees for life; by and with the consent of the committee of the lunatic.(a)[2]

(a)[1] It should seem, from the answers (taken in the Court below), that the defendant's original objections to the rate were general inequality; and that the rate was made at a vestry held without due and legal notice.

(a)[2] It had been suggested that, under a recent statute (6 Geo. IV. c. 74) relating to estates and funds vested in lunatic trustees, &c., the Court of Chancery could make such an order respecting the property not administered as would render a temporary grant of administration, in this case, unnecessary. But a Chancery barrister, who was consulted upon this point, having given an opinion, that that act did not enable the Court of Chancery to make any order respecting the unadministered property until a legal personal representative was appointed by the proper Ecclesiastical Court to act for the lunatic executor, the present application was resorted to.

(b) Same term, bye-day. In the case of Rodnall v. Webb an administration was decreed, under circumstances precisely similar; only, that there was no actual consent of the committee of the lunatic. But there had been a personal service of the citation, calling upon him to shew cause, &c., upon the committee, and no dissent expressed.

testament (with a codicil) of Ann Timbrel, late of Sevenoaks, in the county of Kent, deceased. It was propounded by the executors, Mr. Urquhart and Mr. Waterman; and was opposed by Mr. Fricker, one of the principal legatees under a former will of the deceased. Seven witnesses were examined in support of the will; to each of whom Mr. Fricker had addressed interrogatories: and the [57] cause now came on to be heard upon their evidence. The will and codicil were admitted to be fully proved; so that the question merely resolved itself into one of costs; which, it was prayed, by Mr. Fricker, might be taken out of the estate of the deceased.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The argument which has been addressed to the Court on this question of costs appears to me to have taken a wrong direction. The counsel for the executors have argued against costs being taken out of the estate; as if it were a rule, in similar cases, that costs should be taken out of the estate of the deceased, to which they were bound to make out this particular case an exception. But the rule in such cases is, that costs are not to be taken out of the estate; so that the burthen of excepting this case from the operation of a general rule clearly rested with their opponents—the counsel for the legatee under the former will.

I am much disposed to think that the question as to costs, if any, in this case, should have been, whether the legatee, who prays to have his costs allowed him, ought not to be condemned, partly at least, in the costs, to which the executors have been put, through his means. True it is that where a next of kin calls for proof of a will, per testes, and merely cross-examines the witnesses produced in support of that will, he is not subject to costs, generally speaking. I add this last, because I can easily conceive a case in which even a next of kin may exercise his undoubted right in this matter so vexatiously as to make himself responsible, if not wholly, in part, for the costs of his opponent. But next of kin are favourites of courts of law; [58] their interests in cases of intestacy accrue by mere operation of the law; and they have the plainest and most undoubted right to be satisfied that those interests are not defeated but upon good and sufficient grounds. A legatee under a former will is not so favourably regarded: he may certainly call for proof, per testes, of a will, by which his interests, under a former will, are prejudiced: he, as certainly, may interrogate the witnesses produced in support of that will; but he, I apprehend, must clearly do this at the risk of being condemned in costs; if the Court has reason to suspect him of undue and vexatious litigation. And this, especially, in a case like the present, where the legatee is a mere legatee, acting for his own sole benefit; that is, where he is neither an executor at the same time of the will under which he claims, nor a trustee in it for the benefit of some other person or persons; for whose interest, in common with his own, he can be suggested to have acted in opposing the latter will.

What, then, are the circumstances of the present case? It appears that in 1815 the deceased, who was then resident at Lewisham, made a will in favour, among others, of Mr. Fricker. About ten years before her death she removed to Sevenoaks; and there, in the year 1819, was first introduced to a Mr. Urquhart, a solicitor, at that place, to whom she subsequently became much attached; and whose next-door neighbour she was for the last two or three years of her life. In 1822, after an intimacy of three years, she made the will now propounded, leaving the bulk of her property to Mr. Urquhart—a will executed, in duplicate, in the presence of three witnesses; not at Sevenoaks, [59] or through the agency, in any manner, of Mr. Urquhart; but in London, at the office of her solicitors, Messrs. Egan and Waterman, in Essex-street, by whom it had been prepared. In September, 1822, two months after, she executes the codicil, in the presence of two witnesses, increasing the benefit to Mr. Urquhart, her residuary legatee, by reducing several legacies given in and by her will. This codicil is executed at Sevenoaks; but not, again, through Mr. Urquhart's agency—it is prepared by Mr. Austen, of Sevenoaks, pursuant to instructions taken by that gentleman, a solicitor, verbally, from the deceased herself. Added to this are now produced the "instructions" for the will, all in the deceased's hand-writing, and executed in the presence of three witnesses, in the month of June, 1822; expressly in order to give them effect, in case of her dying without executing a formal will of the same tenor. There also are produced two letters written by the deceased; the one to Mr. Waterman, who prepared the will; the other to Mr. Austen, who drew up the codicil. In these letters the deceased both asserts her right to make a free disposition of her property, "as she has no relations;" and recognizes the disposition which she has actually made of it, in favour of Mr. Urquhart; whom she terms "her sincere friend;" adding, that she has not, in her own opinion, met with suitable returns from those in whose favour her former will was made. She survives the making of this will and codicil two years; and she is proved to have been a shrewd woman; in perfect possession of her intellects at all times, down to the day of her death.

Yet, aware of all these circumstances (not, indeed, [60] possibly of the "instructions," and of these "letters," till after the allegation was given in to which they now appear annexed as exhibits), Mr. Fricker institutes and persists in his opposition to this will and codicil; to each of the witnesses examined in support of which he has addressed interrogatories; not suggesting that the deceased was incapable, or any case of fraudulent circumvention; but only, or at least principally, that these "letters" were not of the deceased's composition; but that they were either dictated (or written from a form supplied to the deceased) by Mr. Urquhart. Even these suggestions are wholly negatived; especially by the witnesses, Mr. How and Mr. Austen, who both swear to their belief of the letters being her own composition, from what they know of her habits of thinking, and style of expressing herself, and conducting business—it appearing, from all the evidence, that the deceased was fully capable of drawing up such papers. Not that, if the fact had accorded with Mr. Fricker's suspicions, it would have carried his case any further, or at all have interfered with the obligation of the Court to pronounce for this will and codicil. Now, under these circumstances, the question as to costs, if any, I again say should have been, whether Mr. Fricker was not liable, in part at least, to the costs of the executors. Not that I am disposed to take this step in the present instance; the executors have not prayed costs: but I wish it to be distinctly understood that, if a mere legatee under a former will puts the executors of a latter will on proof, per testes, of that will, and interrogates such witnesses at length (especially if upon suggestions wholly negatived in their answers, and with nothing in the transaction to [61] justify such a procedure), the Court is fully disposed to act, in any future case, upon the principle that he is liable, in part at least to reimburse his opponents for the expenses to which they have been put, through his means, in proof of the latter will.

BYRNE v. DALZELL AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1826.—A. dies leaving a will and codicil, whereby he appoints B. residuary legatee for life; two other codicils (so styled) propounded by the executors, and opposed on the part of C., one of the contingent residuary legatees substituted in the will and a legatee in the (first) codicil. Part of an allegation setting up that B. had no interest, in consequence of A.'s property being insufficient to pay the legacies bequeathed in his will and (first) codicil (in order, this, to make out B.'s competence as a witness against the second and third codicils so styled), admitted to proof. But the Court said that, howsoever proved, it would pay little respect to B.'s evidence; unless she also qualified as a witness, in the usual mode, by releasing; which she, B., could have no difficulty in doing if, in effect, she had no interest.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

John Simon Farley, the deceased in this cause, a lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, died on the 5th of June, 1824. The deceased left a will; a regularly executed codicil; and two testamentary papers marked C and E, propounded as second and third codicils to his will by John Francis Byrne, Esquire, one of the executors named in the will. The will and (first) codicil were not opposed; the second and third codicils so styled were opposed by Eliza Rebecca Cuthbert, spinster, one of the contingent residuary legatees substituted in the will, and a legatee in the (first) codicil.

An allegation, propounding the papers C and E, had been filed by the executor, Mr. Byrne. A responsive allegation was now brought in on the part of Miss Cuthbert; the first article of which pleaded as follows:—

"That John Simon Farley, Esquire, the deceased in this cause, died on the 5th of June, 1824, aged about seventy-six years; that the said deceased, in and [62] by his last will and testament, bearing date the 10th day of May, 1821, appointed the Reverend Robert Hesketh and John Francis Byrne, Esquire, executors; and Elizabeth Cuthbert, wife of Robert Cuthbert, Esquire, now Elizabeth Cuthbert, widow, residuary legatee for life; and that in and by such will (and a codicil thereto, bearing date the 30th of December, 1823) he, the said deceased, gave and bequeathed divers legacies, and an annuity, which he directed to be paid free of legacy duty; that the deceased's property left behind him was insufficient to pay the legacies and annuity given and bequeathed by the said will and codicil; so that by reason of the premises she, the said Elizabeth Cuthbert, widow, was to all intents and purposes in law competent to be examined, as a witness in this cause, on the part and behalf of Eliza Rebecca Cuthbert, spinster." And the allegation, accordingly, went on to vouch Mrs. Cuthbert as a witness to nearly all the principal facts pleaded.

The admission of this first article of the allegation was opposed by the executor, Mr. Byrne; as by reason of the facts pleaded not going (it was said) so absolutely and totally to the extinguishment of Mrs. Cuthbert's interest under the will, as to render her a competent witness against the second and third codicils (so styled) now propounded.

The Court—Sir John Nicholl. I shall admit this article, in order to the proposed witness being examined; but there must be the clearest proof (as by the answers admitting this or otherwise) that her interest in the event of the suit is extinguished [63] before the Court will permit her evidence to be read. If, however, which is pleaded, she really has no interest as residuary legatee under the will, she can have no difficulty in releasing; which will remove at once all objections to her competence as a witness. A biassed witness she must still be, and open to observation as such; even should she release, and also be proved (sub modo, at least) to have no direct interest in the event of the suit; a matter this, which, after all, must depend upon contingencies. She is the mother of the party who proposes to examine her; and has, herself, been cited to "see proceedings" in the cause, though she has given no appearance. I have only further to observe that, to whatever the evidence furnished upon this article of the plea may amount, the Court will pay little respect to the testimony of the witness whose competency it sets up; unless prior to her deposition being taken she qualifies as a witness in the usual mode, by releasing.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH, BY HIS COMMITTEE v. THE COUNTESS OF PORTSMOUTH. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1826.—In all suits of nullity of marriage brought by or on the part of the husband, the wife, de facto, is regularly entitled, as well to alimony, pending suit, as to payment of all such costs as she incurs in her defence. Hence, the costs of the defence are (in the first instance at least) as necessary a charge upon the husband's funds, as are those of the prosecution of every such suit; and this, although fraud in procuring the marriage is expressly charged upon the wife in the libel; and although costs are prayed in the libel (and may ultimately be awarded by the Court) against the wife.

[See further, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 355.]

(On petition.)

This was a cause of nullity of marriage, promoted and brought by John Charles, Earl of Portsmouth, acting by Mr. Fellows, his committee, against Mary Ann, [64] Countess of Portsmouth (styled in the proceedings Mary Ann Hanson, spinster, falsely calling herself Countess of Portsmouth), "by reason" (as stated in the citation) "of the said John Charles, Earl of Portsmouth, being at the time when the said marriage was solemnized of unsound mind, and incapable of forming such a contract; and also by reason of the fraud and circumvention practised on the said John Charles, Earl of Portsmouth, by Mr. Hanson, the father of the said Mary Ann Hanson, and his family, on that occasion." (a)

A citation in the cause had been duly served and returned—and on the fourth session of Michaelmas term, 1825, a libel with exhibits was admitted, and the proctor for the party cited was assigned to answer thereto on the bye-day. On the bye-day that assignation was continued till the first session of the ensuing Hilary Term, when the proctor stood assigned to answer under pain of suspension.

On the first session of Hilary Term (1826) the defendant's proctor gave an issue, confessing the marriage; but otherwise contesting suit negatively. At the same time, he brought in a "bill of costs," on behalf of his party; which he prayed might be referred to the registrar for taxation—a step objected to by the proctor of Mr. Fellows, the committee; out of which objection the present question arose.

(a) The earl had been found to be of unsound mind on the 28th of February, 1823, and to have so been from the 1st day of January, 1809. The fact of marriage sought to be annulled was had on the 7th day of March, 1814.

[65] In support of that objection it was principally alleged, on the part of the committee, that this was a suit, not commenced by the husband or his committee merely, but under the express authority of the high Court of Chancery, signified by a special order in that behalf—and that the facts pleaded in the libel were of a nature to enure, being proved not only to a sentence of nullity, but to a condemnation of the party proceeded against in costs, which costs were prayed in the libel—that the committee had no power over the funds of the lunatic; but that the same were under the control of the Lord High Chancellor, and could only be appropriated by his special order—that the sum of 6000l. per annum, allowed to the committee by the Lord High Chancellor, was required to be expended for the "maintenance and establishment" of the lunatic—and that by the "costs, &c., of the present proceeding," specially directed by an order of the Chancellor to be paid by the committee (under the sanction of a Master in Chancery) out of the lunatic's surplus income, were meant and intended the costs only of the prosecution, not those of the defence, of this suit; (a)[1] which last it was expressly alleged that the [66] Master would not be authorised to allow under the aforesaid order—lastly, that the Chancellor having allotted 1500l. per annum for the maintenance of Lady Portsmouth and her infant child, she would not be without means to defend her cause; although the Court should reject her present prayer.

In reply to this, it was submitted on the part of the defendant that in all suits of nullity of marriage brought by the husband, the wife, de facto, was entitled to payment of all the costs incurred in her defence; so that the wife's costs, in this case, as forming a part of the usual, and therefore the "reasonable, costs, charges, and expences, of the proceeding," might well be paid by the committee out of the husband's surplus income, by the very letter, even, of the order under which the suit was instituted—that as to the allowance of 1500l. per annum made to the wife by the Court of Chancery, this, having been made long prior to the commencement, and without any view to the expences of this suit, could only be considered in the nature of alimony—and that as well from the contents of, and the number of witnesses already produced upon, the libel, as by reference to proceedings in another Court, which involved to a considerable extent the same inquiry, the wife's probable costs in this suit would absorb that sum of 1500l. per annum so allowed her, in the nature of alimony, altogether.

Court—Sir Christopher Robinson. I am unable to distinguish this case, in principle, [67] from a late case, that of Smith v. Smith, in the Court of Arches,(a)[2] in which that Court refused to proceed in a suit, perfectly similar to the present, until funds were provided by the committee of the husband to enable the wife to conduct her defence. In that, as in this, case, fraud in procuring the marriage was expressly imputed to the wife; and the libel there, as in this case, concluded by praying costs against the wife. The spirit of the "order" under which this suit commences clearly, I think, enables the committee to defray the wife's costs out of the husband's surplus income, if decreed by the Court; and if no such provision (which may be doubted) occurs in the letter of the order, this is probably owing to the mere circumstance of its not being in the immediate contemplation of the person or persons who drew it up that the costs of the defence are as much a charge upon the husband's funds as those of the prosecution in a suit of this nature, by the regular practice of these Courts. If, however, the "order" be defective in this particular, it may, no doubt, be cured, on application

(a)[1] By this order, made by the Lord Chancellor for instituting the present suit (under the Master's report) on the 23d day of August, 1824, it was directed—that "the surplus income of the said Earl of Portsmouth (after providing for the allowances already made for the maintenance of the said Earl of Portsmouth and his establishment, and of the present Countess of Portsmouth and her infant child, and also the costs of suing out and prosecuting the commission of lunacy in this matter, and of the defence thereto, and such other costs as have been, or may be, incurred therein, and be directed by any other order or orders in this matter to be paid thereout) be, with the approbation of Master Courtnay, from time to time applied by the petitioner (Mr. Fellows) in discharging the reasonable and proper costs, charges, and expenses of the aforesaid proceeding, until further orders."

made to the Chancellor on the part of the committee. The allowance to the wife, I am quite clear, is to be taken in the nature of alimony—and, as such, it of course does not prejudice her claim to her costs—to which, as well as to alimony, pending the suit, she is of right entitled.

[68] DEVEY v. EDWARDS AND TAPPEN. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1826.—If the Court be prayed, at the instance of parties in distribution, to pronounce an administration-bond forfeited, &c., in order to its being put in suit, against the sureties to that bond, at common law; the question for the Court is not, properly, the ultimate responsibility of the sureties; it is, generally speaking, the mere fact of whether the conditions of the bond have, or have not, been fulfilled. If unfulfilled, it will be the Court's duty, generally speaking, to pronounce for the forfeiture of the bond; without any reference to that other question of whether the sureties are, or are not, ultimately responsible; leaving it to the sureties to plead and prove elsewhere, if they are capable of so doing, that the parties putting it in suit are still, as by their own laches or otherwise, not in a condition to recover upon the bond, notwithstanding its forfeiture.—In the case of principal and surety there is not, as between the obligee and the surety, any obligation of active diligence on the part of the obligee against the principal. Still the abandonment of a suit, once commenced by the obligee against the principal, is clearly a circumstance in favour of the surety; and one that may even possibly operate to his full discharge.—Administration-bonds are too frequently considered to be, and treated as, mere matters of form. It is the duty of practitioners not to countenance this erroneous notion by being privy to parties who, to their knowledge or belief, are not responsible parties becoming sureties to administration-bonds.

(On petition.)

Blanch Wollaston, the party deceased in this cause, died sometime in the year 1809, intestate, and a widow; without child or parent; leaving behind her Sir Thomas Hyde Page, Knight, Ann Pugh, widow, and Sarah Ostler, widow, since respectively deceased, her natural and lawful brother and sisters, and only next of kin; and, together with Sarah Devey (then Sarah Perry, spinster), Mary Blanch Perry, and Anna Barbara Perry, the children of her sister, Mary Perry, deceased, the only persons entitled, in distribution, to her personal estate and effects.

In the month of May, 1809, letters of administration of all and singular the goods, chattels, and credits of the deceased were committed and granted to Sir Thomas Hyde Page, the brother of the deceased: and Messrs. Edwards and Tappen became, jointly and severally, bound with Sir Thomas Hyde Page, for his due administration of the effects of the deceased, in [69] the usual administration-bond, in the penal sum of 12,000l.

In the month of November, 1825, a decree issued, at the instance of Sarah Devey, one of the parties in distribution, as above, calling upon Messrs. Edwards and Tappen, the sureties, to appear and shew cause why the said administration-bond should not be pronounced to be forfeited; in order to its being put in suit by the said Sarah Devey, the party so entitled in distribution at common law.

An appearance having been duly given for the said sureties, an act on petition was entered into by the proctors of the several parties in which the facts of the case were stated, on the one side and on the other, to the following general effect:—

On the part of the sureties it was alleged that the said Blanch Wollaston having died in the year 1809, intestate, administration of her effects was duly granted, in the month of May in that year, to Sir Thomas Hyde Page, as one of her next of kin; when they, the sureties, at his request, consented to execute the usual administration-bond: that Mr. Edwards was induced to this, as being Sir Thomas's solicitor, and his then receiver of rents and other income to the amount in value of 1300l. per annum (of the whole of which he continued to be the receiver for some years after; and of part, to the death of Sir Thomas Hyde Page, in June, 1821); and also as knowing that he, Sir Thomas, had a life-interest in other real property of the clear annual value of 300l., or thereabouts; and was entitled for life to the interest of 17,000l. 3 per cent. reduced Bank annuities, standing in the names of trustees; and that the other surety, Mr. Tappen, had [70] consented to execute the bond on the faith of Mr. Edwards, whom he knew to be connected with the administrator, as above, being his co-surety; that in the month of May, 1809, Sarah Devey, the party now proceeding, was a spinster, and had attained her majority; that she subsequently received of the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page, by payments to herself and to her husband, Richard Devey, for her use, several sums of money on account of her distributive share of the said intestate's estate; and that if she, the said Sarah Devey, not having received the whole thereof, had proceeded against the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page, in due course of law, within a reasonable time, she might and would have recovered the whole of her distributive share of the said deceased's estate; that the said Sarah Devey, however, took no legal steps as for the recovery of the same until the month of January, 1819, when she cited the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page, by a decree of this Court, to exhibit an inventory and render an account of his administration of the effects of the said intestate; and to see portions allotted, and distribution made, of the surplus of the said effects; that the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page appeared to the said decree; and subsequently exhibited an inventory and rendered an account, and produced vouchers in verification thereof; whereupon he was dismissed from all further observance of justice in the cause in the month of February, 1820, without opposition on the part of the said Sarah Devey; that, had the said Sarah Devey then proceeded to enforce the terms of the said decree, and had called upon the sureties to make good the same, in the event of failing to obtain her distributive share, the said Richard Edwards could and would have indemni-[71]-fied himself and his co-surety, by means of the income of the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page passing at such time through his hands; but that neither of the said sureties had now any means of reimbursing themselves for any sum which they might be called upon to pay if the penalty of the said bond or any part thereof were recovered of them, the bond being now put in suit; upon all which several grounds they prayed to be dismissed.

On the part of Mrs. Devey it was alleged, in reply, that the party deceased having died in 1809, and letters of administration having been committed to Sir Thomas Hyde Page, as aforesaid, Messrs. Edwards and Tappen, the other parties, did, in fact, howsoever induced, consent to become sureties; and entered into the usual administration-bond in the month of May in that year; that numerous applications were made in that and the subsequent years by the said Sarah Devey and her husband, Richard Devey, to the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page, for payment of her distributive share of the personal estate and effects of the deceased; but that the same were only successful to the extent of procuring several sums of money to be paid to her, on account, between the years 1809 and 1819, amounting together to the sum of between 170l. and 180l.; that in the month of January, 1819, the said Sarah Devey being unable to obtain any account of her distributive share of the said estate, or any payment of the same, save as aforesaid, caused the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page to be cited, by the authority of this Court, to exhibit an inventory, and to render an account of his administration of the said estate, which inventory and account were subsequently [72] exhibited; whereupon the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page was dismissed; that, in the said account, the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page admitted a balance in his hands, amounting to the sum of 4664l. 17s., the part or share of which, due to the said Sarah Devey, amounted to nearly the sum of 400l., exclusive of interest; and that the said inventory and account were prepared from instructions furnished by Mr. Edwards (the surety) himself to the proctor of the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page; that the said inventory and account were considered by the then legal advisers of the said Sarah Devey very defective and erroneous; but, it being also considered that it would be more advisable, on their parts, to proceed against the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page, in the Court of Chancery, as the said account could be investigated therein, with more effect than in this Court, she, the said Sarah Devey, did instruct her proctor not to oppose the prayer of the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page to be dismissed from the suit in this Court; immediately, however, upon which dismissal she caused a bill in Chancery to be filed against the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page, to recover the amount of her said distributive share; pending the proceedings in which Court, to wit, in the month of June, 1821, the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page died in insolvent circumstances; that the said Sarah Devey was also administratrix of the goods of Blanch Wollaston (the original intestate), left unadministered by the said Sir Thomas Hyde Page; as well as of the goods of Sarah Ostler, widow, deceased (whose distributive share of the estate of the said Blanch Wollaston, deceased, had likewise never been paid, or accounted for), with her will annexed, left unadministered by the said Sir [73] Thomas Hyde Page and George Watts, the executors and residuary legatees named in her said will; and the act, on the part of Mrs. Devey, concluded by averring that she, the said Sarah Devey, proceeding in each and every of the above several characters, had no remedy in the premises but by putting the administration-bond in suit against the sureties, which bond it accordingly prayed that the Court would pronounce to be forfeited, in order to its being put in suit; and that, being put in suit, it would further direct the said bond to be attended with, and produced, when and wheresoever such its production might be requisite, to the furtherance of justice in the suit so proposed to be instituted.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a proceeding at the instance of a party entitled to a distributive share of the effects of an intestate, of which administration had been duly committed by this Court to a next of kin many years ago, calling upon the sureties to the administration-bond to appear and shew cause why the bond should not be pronounced to be forfeited, as a preliminary step to its being put in suit at common law. The sureties have appeared to that call, suggesting and contending, not so much that the bond is not forfeited, as that they, the sureties, are still not responsible. But the question here, as I take it, is not properly the ultimate responsibility of the sureties; it is rather, generally speaking, the mere fact of whether the bond is or is not forfeited. In the latter case the sureties are clearly entitled to be dismissed; in the former, parties in distribution are as clearly, at least generally speaking, entitled to a sentence of this Court, pronouncing for the forfeiture of the bond. [74] The bond itself, pronounced to be forfeited, is to be put in suit, not here, but elsewhere; and there it is for the sureties to plead and prove, if they are capable of so doing, that the parties who put it in suit are still not in a condition to recover upon it. True it is that under circumstances the Court might hesitate to pronounce a bond of this sort forfeited, although its conditions were shewn not to have been complied with. In other words, the parties seeking to put it in suit might be proved to have exonerated the sureties so incontestably and beyond any possibility of question, as to justify the Court in declining to pronounce an administration-bond forfeited at their instance, although the mere fact of its being forfeited were ever so clearly established in evidence to the Court. Still the rule laid down above as to the proper office of the Court in this matter of administration-bonds will be found, I conceive, to apply in all ordinary cases.

Such, then, being the proper office of the Court, the questions for my consideration in respect to this administration-bond are, first, whether, the bond itself is or is not proved to be forfeited; and, secondly, whether, being proved to be forfeited, the sureties are so clearly exonerated as to be entitled to a dismissal.

Now what, so far as respects the present question, are the conditions of an administration-bond? The bond is conditioned for the administrator exhibiting an inventory, and rendering a true and just account of his administration; and for making due distribution of the residue of the effects of the intestate, as the Statute of Distributions limits and appoints.

Such, then, being in brief the conditions of an administration-bond, it admits of no question that the [75] bond in this instance, which is in the usual and accustomed form, is in the article of distribution absolutely forfeited. Mrs. Devey, the party proceeding, is herself entitled to a distributive share of the effects of the intestate in her own right. What is suggested as to her is merely that she has received several sums on account; it is not that she has received the full distributive share accruing to her, even in her own right. But she is also the representative of an aunt, a sister of the party deceased in the cause, entitled in distribution to a fourth of the residue of her effects, no part of which is suggested to have been paid; not even, that I see, any sums on account. She is administratrix, again, of the unadministered effects of the party deceased in the cause herself. She is proceeding in all these characters; and, that the condition of the bond has been complied with by distribution made, or that any funds have been placed in her hands, as administratrix of the original intestate, to enable her to make distribution, retaining her own distributive share, is not pretended. The bond, under these circumstances, is clearly forfeited; its condition in the most essential article, that of distribution, not having been in any sort complied with.

Have, then, the sureties, the only other question, made out their exemption from liability so incontestably and beyond all question as to justify the Court in declining to pronounce for the forfeiture of the bond? They have not so done, by any means, in my judgment, although, whether they are or are not in fact ultimately responsible, is a question, as I have already said, for another forum. The case set up on their [76] part, in effect, is that they are exonerated by the laches of the next of kin, in not having proceeded in due time and with due activity against their principal, the administrator; coupled with the relation in which the sureties, or, at least, one of them, Mr. Edwards, stood to that principal, the administrator. The case so set up in both parts of it may be well considered under one point of view.

As with respect, then, to the connexion which subsisted between Mr. Edwards and the administrator, this, as it appears to me, is a circumstance which, though (in part) he grounds his exemption upon it, aggravates his liability. He was the land-agent or receiver and solicitor of his principal; with whom from time to time he must, consequently, have been in communication; and with whom he must, from time to time, have had a current account. He must have known then, I think, all along, that the administrator had not proceeded to fulfil the conditions of the bond. As this is a matter, however, differently represented by the parties prior to 1819, I lay no great stress upon what Mr. Edwards's knowledge of that fact might or might not have been up to 1819. But from 1819, ten years after administration taken, there is no pretence for saying that Mr. Edwards was not fully aware that the conditions of this bond were still unfulfilled. In 1819 Mrs. Devey, the party now proceeding, calls for an inventory and account; it is proved that Mr. Edwards assisted in making up this inventory and account: so that, to the true state of the case, from 1819, at least, he could be no stranger. The principal survives this two or three years; yet, what steps were taken by [77] Mr. Edwards in that interval to relieve himself and his co-security, the guarantees, from responsibility? Absolutely, so far as appears, none whatever.

At length, however, in 1819, this inventory and account having been exhibited, the administrator is dismissed; and it is a circumstance very much relied upon that he was so dismissed without any objection on the part of Mrs. Devey. This, primâ facie, does certainly form a ground of exemption; for although, in the case of principal and surety, there is not, as I have always understood, as between the obligee and the surety, any obligation of active diligence on the part of the obligee against the principal (which disposes of one supposed ground of exemption set up by the sureties); yet still, if the obligee begins to sue the principal, and then actually or virtually abandons that suit, this is a circumstance which the surety is clearly entitled to the benefit of; and it may even, for any thing that I know to the contrary, operate as suggested to his full discharge. But what was the case here? Did the obligee (the next of kin, that is) abandon her suit against the principal, as she must have done in order properly to raise the question as to the effect of such abandonment? Certainly not. Immediately upon the dismissal of the administrator in this Court she causes a bill of complaint to be filed in the High Court of Chancery against the administrator for the recovery of her distributive share; that is, of two jurisdictions, either open to her, she resorts to one (possibly the one most convenient, but certainly the one most usually resorted to for such purposes); and pending proceedings in that jurisdiction the administrator dies, it is said, insolvent. Now, under these circum-[78]-stances, it seems to me, though it is a matter which I am not called upon to decide, that Mrs. Devey has a remedy, by putting the bond in suit against the sureties. At all events it is by no means clear that she has not any such remedy—the only circumstance which could justify a dismissal of the sureties, or any hesitation on the Court's part to pronounce for the forfeiture of the bond. If upon this state of facts the party proceeding has no claim upon the sureties, these administration-bonds should really seem (what, too frequently, they are considered to be, and are treated as) mere matters of form. It is the duty of practitioners in this Court, a duty which they owe to their profession and to the public, to correct this erroneous notion, so far as in them lies, by not being privy to parties who, to their knowledge or belief, are not responsible, becoming sureties. It is the duty of the office, too, which has been cautioned in this respect, not to suffer persons to be sureties whose frequent appearance on such occasions warrants a suspicion of its being a matter of traffic on their parts. This is rather, indeed, in the nature of a digression from, though naturally suggested by, the subject immediately before the Court, for the Court has no reason to suspect that any thing of this sort has occurred in the present instance; or that the present sureties, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Tappen, are, like those others to whom the Court has been alluding, mere "men of straw," as it is called. In this case I have only to pronounce that the bond is forfeited; and to direct that it shall be attended with as prayed, in the event of Mrs. Devey proceeding to put it in suit at common law. It will be for the sureties to set up their defence if any; that is, that they are not re-[79]-sponsible at common law; or to apply to a court of equity to restrain proceedings upon the bond, if they should be advised that a court of equity is best calculated to afford them that relief to which they claim to be entitled.

DEW v. CLARK AND CLARK. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1826.—Partial insanity is good in defeazance of a will founded immediately (so to be presumed) in or upon such partial insanity. If A. then make a will plainly inofficious in respect to B., and is proved at the time of making it to have been under a morbid delusion as to the character and conduct of B., the Court of Probate will relieve against by pronouncing this will to be invalid, and holding A. to have died intestate in law; how sane soever, in other particulars, or even generally, A., at the time in question of making the will, may be proved to have been.

[S. C. in Chancery, 5 Russ. 163; 6 L. T. (O. S.) Ch. 186. Discussed, Waring v. Waring, 1848, 6 Moore, P. C. 353. See further, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 311.]

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a question as to the legal force and validity of the will of a Mr. Ely Stott, who is the party deceased in the cause. He died on the 18th of November, 1821, at the age of seventy-two years; leaving a widow, and a daughter by a former wife, an only child; and it should seem that, at the time of his death, he was possessed of personal property to the amount in value of nearly 40,000l. In the month of February, 1821, a commission (in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo), to inquire of the lunacy of the deceased, issued from the High Court of Chancery, at the instance or petition of Mary Stott, the supposed lunatic's then wife. And the deceased was found, under that commission, to be of unsound mind; and to have been in the same state of mind from the first day of January preceding or in the same year, 1821.

The will, however, the subject of the present suit, was made previous to this finding of the jury by several [80] years, bearing date the 26th of May, 1818. The following, in substance, are the contents of that will:—

It gives and bequeaths to Mary Stott, the wife of the deceased, all the deceased's household furniture, linen, china, and books; to his nephews, Thomas and Valentine Clark, legacies of 100l. and 150l. respectively; and to his friend, Mr. Daniel Goff, a legacy (the sum left in blank). It gives and bequeaths to his three executors (after appointed), Mr. Reid, Mr. Fletcher, and Mr. Rawlings, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the sum of 1333l. 6s. 8d. 3 per cent. annuities, upon trust, to pay the dividends or interest to Lydia Iley, spinster, for and during the term of her natural life; and a further sum of 1333l. 6s. 8d., like stock, upon trust, to pay the dividends or interest unto, and equally between, the children of Elizabeth Jouls, deceased, for and during their natural lives, and for and during the natural life of the survivor of these; so that such survivor during his or her life shall enjoy the whole of such dividends or interest. It gives and bequeaths to his said executors a further sum of 2833l. 6s. 8d., like stock, upon trust, to pay the dividends or interest to his (the deceased's) daughter, Charlotte Mary Dew, wife of George Dew, for her life, to her own sole and separate use: and it directs that his said executors do, and shall, lay out and invest all such monies, when recovered, as may be due to the deceased at the time of his death, as the representative of his first wife, Mary Stott, under the will of the honourable Charlotte Clive, in the public stocks or funds; and that the interest or dividends of such public stocks or funds shall also be paid to his said daughter for and during her life to her own sole and separate use as [81] above. It provides that if one or more servant or servants shall have lived with the deceased five years, and shall be living with him at the time of his death, his said executors shall invest so much in the public stocks or funds as will produce an annuity or annuities, for life, of 40l., payable to such servant or servants. It directs that each and every of the said several principal sums shall, from and after the several deaths of the said several annuitants, respectively, fall into, and become part of, the deceased's residuary estate after disposed of. It gives and bequeaths that residue, real and personal, of what nature or kind soever, to the said executors, upon trust, to convert the same into monies, and invest such monies in the public stocks or funds, or upon government or real securities, at interest; and, upon further trust, to pay to his said wife, Mary Stott, from and out of the interest, dividends, or annual produce of the said stocks, funds, or securities, the sum of 400l. per annum, for her life, or during her widowhood; and it appoints that, from and after the decease or marriage of his said wife, they, the said executors, shall stand possessed of as well the stock, &c., from which such annual sum shall accrue, as all other the stocks, funds, and securities to be purchased by and with the monies by them got in, as aforesaid, upon trust, for the benefit of all and every the child or children of him, the deceased, by his said wife, Mary Stott, with benefit of survivorship, &c. But in the event of his leaving no child by his said wife; or in the event of his leaving a son or sons only, that die under age without lawful issue; or a daughter or daughters only that die under age, and unmarried, it then provides that they, the said [82] trustees, do and shall transfer the whole of the aforesaid stocks, funds, and securities to the nephews, the said Thomas and Valentine Clark, or the survivor of them, absolutely; further provided only, in case of the death of either of his said nephews in his (the deceased's) life-time leaving issue, then that his share shall be payable unto and equally between such issue if more than one; but if only one, to such sole issue. Lastly, Mr. Reid, Mr. Fletcher, and Mr. Rawlings are named executors, and the said Mary Stott, during her widowhood, executrix of the will. Such is the will, the subject of the present suit, in point of substance: in point of form it is an instrument of some length, contained in seven sheets of paper, technically drawn up; and it was executed by the deceased in the presence of three subscribed witnesses.

Several scripts are before the Court in the shape of drafts or sketches of former wills or codicils of the deceased. There is also a former will itself, bearing date the 19th of March, 1817, being the script marked No. 5. The purport of each and every of these is to give the daughter a life interest in a comparatively small portion only of the property of the deceased. For instance, the purport of No. 1 is to give her an annuity of 80l. for life—the residue to her child or children, if any, born in lawful wedlock, on attaining the age of twenty-one; "such child or children to be put out to nurse, and then to school, unconnected with the parents, and brought up in evangelical principles:" in case of the daughter having no children, then the residue to the Bible Society. By the script No. 3 the daughter is to have 100l. a year for [83] life—the residue to her issue as above at the age of twenty-one; and failing such to the Bible Society and the Church Missionary Society in equal moieties. The same in script No. 4, with an express provision that the child or children of the daughter, from and after the age of six years, shall "be placed entirely under the direction of his (the deceased's) executors and trustees for the time being as to the manner of their education and every other matter connected with their bringing up, maintenance, and support." By the script No. 5 (the will of March, 1817), certain parts of the residue (failing the daughter's issue as above) are bequeathed to trustees, in trust for Thomas and Valentine Clark; and the remainder only in trust for certain public institutions. But by the will now propounded, as already said, Thomas and Valentine Clark are the general residuary legatees in the first instance: no part of the property of the deceased is bequeathed by this to the issue of the daughter (then a married woman) if any. Even the principal stock, out of which the daughter's provision for life, of somewhere about 100l. per annum, is to accrue, is not given and bequeathed by this will upon her death to her issue; it is to fall into and become part of the residuary estate bequeathed as above to the nephews, the Mr. Clarks.

Administration, with this will of May, 1818, annexed, of the effects of the deceased is granted to Thomas and Valentine Clark, the residuary legatees (the executors renouncing), on the 29th of December, 1821. In the month of April, 1822, a citation issues at the suit of Charlotte Mary Dew, the deceased's only child, in effect, calling upon the administrators either to prove [84] the will per testes, in solemn form, to the satisfaction of this Court, or to submit to the Court's pronouncing the deceased to have died intestate in law.

The nephews (the administrators), so called upon, formally propound the will, in a plea known here as a common condidit, from its merely pleading the deceased to have made the will, being of sound mind and so forth, in a set form—in common use as of common application in this description of cases.

The daughter's plea, in opposition to this, admits the facts of the case to be as pleaded in the condidit, with a single exception. It admits in effect that the deceased gave instructions for and made this will as alleged in the condidit; and that he did all this of his own mere motion. It imputes no fraud or circumvention either to the nephews or to any other party or parties as with relation to this will; it ascribes it in no degree or respect whatever to external control or influence of any sort exercised over or upon the deceased. It consents, in effect, to its being taken as the act of the deceased alone—but it denies it to have been his act, being of sound mind at the time; in which denial consists the sum total of the case which it sets up, on the daughter's part, in opposition to the will. It alleges, in order to sustain that case, that the deceased conceived an irrational antipathy to this daughter, his only child, in her earliest infancy; and that he was actuated by such during and throughout the whole remainder of his life: and it charges that the will sought to be impeached was founded in, and owing solely to, this irrational antipathy; not being (as averred in, and necessarily to be proved upon, the condidit) the act of a testator of sound and disposing mind. [85] And it further alleges, in aid of that case, insanity or mental aberration, as visible in and to be collected from other parts of the deceased's conduct, into the particulars of which it enters—though at the same time principally betraying itself in his feelings towards and treatment of his daughter; which last are, accordingly, more especially pleaded, and upon which last it is evidently meant by the daughter principally to rely.

A responsive allegation is filed, on the part of the nephews, consisting of thirty-one articles; accompanied with a variety of annexed exhibits. The objects of that allegation, briefly stated, are: 1st, to sustain the deceased's general sanity, by reference to his general history, and to his conduct throughout his whole life, generally; 2dly, but very principally, its aim is to shew that the deceased's treatment of his daughter, so in particular relied on in proof of the contrary, as I have said, admitting it, possibly, to have been harsh and severe, was still not irrational or insane. Accordingly, it formally imputes it to a series of gross misconduct on the daughter's part; and to the operation or effect of this upon "great violence and irritability," upon "great pride and conceit," upon ideas of the "total and absolute depravity of human nature, and the necessity of sensible conversion (derived from rigid Calvinistical principles)," and upon "high notions of parental authority;" of all which it pleads, in form, the deceased's character to have been made up.

Lastly, the daughter rejoins upon this allegation, either contradicting or explaining the several principal facts, of both descriptions, pleaded in it; and in some few particulars also amplifying and amending [86] her own original case, as the Court permitted her to do, under special circumstances in the case, for reasons into which it entered, at large, when the admission of this rejoinder was formally debated (see vol. ii. p. 102, et seq.).

The above is a mere outline of the several pleas, sufficient, however, to shew that the case before the Court is one of great difficulty (in some of its features, indeed, a perfectly novel case), and consequently to be treated by the Court with proportionable care. Its importance, indeed, is sensibly felt by the Court, which has, most attentively, considered the whole evidence upon which its judgment is to be ultimately framed.

It thus appears, upon the shewing of these several pleas, that the true question at issue between the parties in this cause is a mere single question of fact: Was the deceased, who is admitted to have made this will, insane at that time? or, was he a person of sound mind, and memory? His daughter it is who alleges him to have been the first of these, or insane at that time: and the onus probandi, the burden of proving this, clearly rests with her, she being the party who affirms or sets it up.

In discharge of that onus she has produced a body of evidence to much in the conduct of the deceased, to say the very least of it, extraordinary and extravagant, in the highest degree. I feel myself at liberty, even here, to go this length in speaking of the evidence on her part; as the adverse counsel, in the course of their argument, have admitted it to be good so far. The adverse case indeed, taken as a whole, has admissions to nearly this extent, on the face of it. Still, however, [87] it was pleaded, it was endeavoured to be proved, and it has been strongly argued, as the true result of the whole evidence, on the part of the nephews, that no part of the deceased's conduct ever evinced actual insanity; that the whole of it is to be fairly accounted for by the operation of untoward circumstances, upon peculiar feelings and habits; and that nothing occurs in the evidence to justify any other conclusion than that the deceased was at all times in the full possession of (and so was competent, at all times, to the performance of any act requiring), in the technical language of these Courts, "thought, judgment, and reflection."

And here a subject of inquiry presents itself, fit, and necessary even, to be disposed of, in the first instance (previous, that is, to any consideration of the evidence, for the purpose of arriving at a due estimate of the merits of the case), which is this: What is the true criterion of madness or insanity? And herein, very principally, as with reference to the present question, where is it that mere eccentricity or extravagance ends and that this begins?

It may safely be assumed, at least to the present auditory, in the outset of this inquiry that madness subsists in every variety of shape and degree. It subsists in the maniac chained to his floor—it subsists in the patient afflicted with mental aberration on certain subjects, or on a certain subject only; and in respect of such even never betraying itself in violence or outrage. The affliction is the same in both cases in species; the difference is only in degree. The intermediate degrees between the highest and lowest grade of insanity are almost infinite. Patients afflicted with this terrible infirmity, in some minor degree, often [88] conduct themselves rationally in all but certain respects; and this, not in shew or semblance only, but in truth and substance. Instances have occurred of patients in Bedlam employed as keepers, in some sort, of their fellow-madmen; they themselves being, at the same time, essentially insane. It is well known that a sufferer in this class who fancied and styled himself Duke of Hexham, became the agent of his own committee for the management of his own estate; and did for a time the duties of that office, it is said, not incorrectly. Few madmen are so mad as to be incapable of some degree of self-control; and the cunning which madmen are often found to exercise, if bent upon carrying some favourite point, is a circumstance of the malady too well known to require any specific illustration. Instances again of the extraordinary power of, at times, concealing their infirmity, commonly inherent in madmen, are familiar to most people, as having occurred within their own personal observation.(a) Still, however, (a) The following instances were especially noticed by the Court, from Mr. Erskine's speech of the trial of James Hadfield, for shooting at his late majesty. The first may be given in Mr. Erskine's own words.

"I examined," he says, "for the greater part of a day, in this very place" [the court of King's Bench], "an unfortunate gentleman, who had indicted a most affectionate brother, together with the keeper of a mad-house, at Hoxton, for having imprisoned him as a lunatic; whilst, according to his evidence, he was in his perfect senses. I was, unfortunately, not instructed in what his lunacy consisted, although my instructions left me no doubt of the fact; but not having the clue, he completely foiled me in every attempt to expose his infirmity. You may believe that I left no means unemployed which long experience dictated, but without the smallest effect. The day was wasted; and the prosecutor, by the most affecting history of unmerited suffering, appeared to the judge and jury, and to a humane English audience, as the victim of the most wanton and barbarous oppression. At last, Dr. Sims came into court, who had been prevented by business from an earlier attendance; and from him I learnt that the very man whom I had been above an hour examining, and with every possible effort which counsel are in the habit of exerting, believed himself to be the Lord and Saviour of mankind; not merely at the time of his confinement, which was sufficient for my defence, but during the whole time that he had been triumphing over every attempt to surprise him in the concealment of his disease. I then affected to lament the indecency of my ignorant examination; when he expressed his forgiveness, and said with the utmost gravity and emphasis, in the face of the whole Court, 'I am the Christ!' and so the cause ended."

The other, a still more memorable instance of the power of concealing this malady, is the following, as stated to Mr. Erskine by Lord Mansfield:—

"A man of the name of Wood," said Lord Mansfield, "had indicted Dr. Monro for keeping him as a prisoner in a mad-house, at Hoxton, while he was sane. He underwent the most severe examination by the defendant's counsel, without exposing his complaint; but Dr. Battie, having come upon the bench by me, and desired me to ask him 'What was become of the princess, whom he had corresponded with in cherry-juice?' he shewed, in a moment, what he was. He answered that there was nothing with all this, among [89] the vulgar, some are for reckoning madmen those only who are frantic or violent to some extent. Insanity, [90] however decided, unaccompanied with such symptoms, they are content to refer to eccentricity or extravagance. Others, again, in the opposite extreme, are too apt to confound mere folly with phrensy; and to describe as odd or eccentric, or in some such phrase, patients who, in better judgments, are actually and essentially insane. What, then, to come back to our proposed subject of inquiry, is the true criterion of insanity? and, principally, how is it distinguished (this being obviously our principal concern) from eccentricity or extravagance merely.

The true criterion—the true test—of the absence or presence of insanity I take to be, the absence or presence of what, used in a certain sense of it, is comprisable in a single term, namely—delusion. Wherever the patient once conceives something extravagant to exist, which has still no existence whatever but in his own heated imagination; and wherever, at the same time, having once so conceived, he is incapable of being, or at least of being permanently, reasoned out of that conception; such a patient is said to be under a [91] delusion, in a peculiar, half-technical, sense of the term; and the absence or presence of delusion so understood forms, in my judgment, the true and only test or criterion of absent or present insanity. In short, I look upon delusion, in this sense of it, and insanity to be almost, if not altogether, convertible terms; so that a patient under a delusion, so understood, on any subject or subjects, in any degree, is, for that reason, essentially mad or insane on such subject or subjects in that degree. On the contrary, in the absence of any such delusion, with whatever extravagances a supposed lunatic may be justly chargeable, and how like soever to a real madman he may either speak or act on some or on all subjects; still, in the absence, I repeat, of any thing in the nature of delusion, so understood as above, the supposed lunatic is, in my judgment, not properly or essentially insane.

The Court is confirmed in, or rather possibly has derived this, its own, view of the subject by and from writers, as well medical as other, best qualified to discuss it; and upon whose authority, accordingly, it may safely rely. It is thus, I apprehend, that delusion, in the sense that I have explained it, is made the distinguishing feature of insanity by Dr. Battie in the first chapter of his celebrated essay or treatise on that disorder. On the same principle it is that Dr. Willis, in a recent publication on mental derangement,(a) lays it down that insanity from disease (as contra-distinguished from native insanity) chiefly consists in the "pertinacious adhesion of the patient to some delusive [92] idea in opposition to plain evidence of its falsity." And Mr.

at all in that, because, having been (as every body knew) imprisoned in a high tower, and being debarred the use of ink, he had no other means of correspondence but by writing his letters in cherry-juice, and throwing them into the river which surrounded the tower, where the princess received them in a boat. There existed, of course, no tower, no imprisonment, no princess, no river, no boat; but the whole was the inveterate phantom of a morbid imagination. I immediately directed Dr. Monro to be acquitted: but this man Wood, being a merchant in Philpot-lane, and having been carried through the city, in his way to the mad-house, he indicted Dr. Monro over again, for the trespass and imprisonment, in London, knowing that he had lost his cause, by speaking of the princess, at Westminster; and such is the extraordinary subtlety and cunning of madmen that, when he was cross-examined on the trial in London, as he had successfully been before, in order to expose his madness, all the ingenuity of the bar and all the authority of the Court could not make him say a single syllable upon that topic which had put an end to the indictment before; although he still had the same indelible impression as before, as he signified to those who were near him: but conscious that the delusion had occasioned his defeat at Westminster, he obstinately persisted in holding it back." *

* This evidence at Westminster was then proved against him by the short-hand writer; upon which Dr. Monro was, of course, again acquitted.

Lock, in treating of the difference between idiots and madmen, had before said, in perfect accordance with the above, that the infirmity of madmen was not so much in any "loss of the reasoning faculties," as in "delusion" on their parts: or, as he terms it, in their "mistaking for truths some ideas wrongly joined together." The passage from Mr. Lock, indeed, is illustrative of the subject before the Court in so many respects (as will appear in the sequel) as to justify the Court's taking this occasion to recite it at length:—

"The defect in naturals," says Mr. Lock, "seems to proceed from want of quickness, activity, and motion in the intellectual faculties, whereby they are deprived of reason; whereas madmen, on the other side, seem to suffer by the other extreme. For they do not appear to me to have lost the faculty of reasoning: but having joined together some ideas very wrongly, they mistake them for truths; and they err, as men do that argue from wrong principles. For by the violence of their imaginations, having taken their fancies for realities, they make right deductions from them. Thus you shall find a distracted man fancying himself a king, with a right inference, requires suitable attendance, respect, and obedience: others, who have thought themselves made of glass, have used the caution necessary to preserve such brittle bodies. Hence it comes to pass that a man who is very sober, and of a right understanding in all other things, may in one particular be as frantic as any man in Bedlam; if, either by any sudden very strong impression, or long fixing his fancy upon one sort of thoughts, incoherent ideas have been cemented to-[93]-gether so powerfully as to remain united. But there are degrees of madness as of folly; the disorderly jumbling of ideas together is in some more, in others less. In short, herein seems to be the difference between idiots and madmen; that madmen put wrong ideas together and so make wrong propositions, but argue and reason rightly from them: but idiots make very few or no propositions, and reason scarce at all." (a)

It may be assumed that these authorities sufficiently fortify the Court's position, with respect to the true test or criterion of insanity, to justify it in pronouncing that, if the evidence in this cause be satisfactory to the existence of delusion in the mind of the deceased at the time of his making this will, it is also satisfactory to the existence in the mind of the deceased at that time of some degree of insanity; whether, indeed, of that degree of insanity; and whether of insanity of that kind, or rather on that subject, which should operate to defeat this will, is another question. But before I proceed to consider the nature and effect of the proofs to this delusion, both on the one side and on the other, it may be proper that I should dispose of an objection raised by the counsel for the residuary legatees, founded on the term "partial insanity;" which had often been used by the counsel for the next of kin in the course of their argument in the cause.

It has been said then repeatedly by the counsel for the residuary legatees that this "partial insanity" is a something unknown to the law of England. Now if it [94] be meant by this that the law of England never deems a person both sane and insane at one and the same time, upon one and the same subject, the assertion is a mere truism (as well indeed in reason as) in law; and as such is incapable of being effectively opposed. At the same time, as no such sort of partial insanity is set up by the daughter, the case of partial insanity, which she has really undertaken to sustain, is at no risk from the truth of that position so understood being conceded. But if by that position it be meant and intended that the law of England never deems a party both sane and insane at different times upon the same subject; and both sane and insane upon different subjects (the most usual sense, this last, of the phrase "partial insanity;" and the one in which I take it to have been used throughout by the counsel for the next of kin), there can scarcely be a position more destitute of legal foundation; or rather, there can scarcely be one more adverse to the stream and current of legal authority.

It is only, I should conceive, by the way, in point of legal consideration, that the existence of this sort of partial insanity could by possibility be meant to be questioned. It is a common parlance to say of a man that he is mad on such a subject or on such subjects; and it is a common parlance not by any means founded upon notions which are confined to or only entertained and pressed by the vulgar. For instance, Mr. Lock, if it be worth while to refer to his authority for so self-evident a position, has just told us that "a man who is very sober and of a right understanding in all other things may, in one particular, be as frantic as any man [95] in Bedlam;" which is precisely in point. But to consider briefly what occurs of legal authority on the subject of partial insanity.

A single passage from Lord Chief Justice Hale upon this head may render possibly any other authority on the subject unnecessary. Lord Hale says, "There is a partial insanity of mind and a total insanity. The former is either in respect to things [quoad hoc, vel quoad illud insanire—some persons that have a competent use of reason in respect to some subjects are yet under a particular dementia in respect of some particular discourses, subjects, or applications]; or else it is partial in respect of degrees [and this is the condition of very many, especially melancholy persons, who, for the most part, discover their defect in excessive fears and griefs, and yet are not wholly destitute of the use of reason]." (a)

In what follows upon this passage Lord Hale is considering the application of the doctrine of partial insanity to criminal cases only; in other words, his observations, occurring in a work on criminal law, are limited to the species or degree of insanity necessary to protect their agents from criminal responsibility for actual crimes committed. But the case of Greenwood,(b) [96] often referred to in the argument, is good in proof of the equal applicability of the doctrine to cases of contract or civil cases. It is even more than this; being not only good in proof of the applicability of the doctrine of partial insanity to civil cases generally; but recognising in particular that such partial insanity will avail to defeat a will, the direct offspring of that partial insanity, both here and at common law; though the testator at the time of making it were sane in all respects upon ordinary subjects. Consequently the case of Greenwood is a precise recognition of the principle upon which the Court admitted the allegation originally setting up, and to which it is bound to adhere in ultimately adjudicating upon, the present case of partial insanity; and it furnishes of itself a more than sufficient answer to the objection that this partial insanity is a something unknown to the law. At the same time the case of Greenwood, however accordant with the present case in point of general principle, is materially distinguished from it by one not unimportant circumstance. There the deceased being insane, and so admitted to be on all hands, insanely conceived, among other no doubt equally absurd imaginations, that his brother, and only next of kin, had administered poison to him. His recovery, admitted in other respects, was denied in this last particular; and influenced (so said) by still subsisting insanity in this last particular, the deceased made the will disinheriting his [97] brother, the validity of which was at issue in that cause. And the question in Greenwood's case accordingly was, whether that insane aversion which the deceased was admitted to have once felt towards his brother had or had not subsided—was or was not in operation at the time when he made his will. Here the question is, whether that actual aversion or antipathy, or call it what you will, which the deceased is admitted to have felt towards his daughter, and under the present impression of which he is hardly denied to have made this will, was either founded in, or ever had any connection with, insanity at all, on his part? It is whether he, the deceased, at the time of making this will, had ever laboured under mental derangement, either on the subject of his daughter in particular; or, in fact, on any subject? It is this which distinguishes the present case from that of Greenwood; and which constitutes, at once, the novelty and difficulty of the present case—the

"That gentleman, 'Mr. Greenwood," whilst insane, took up an idea that a most affectionate brother had administered poison to him. Indeed it was the prominent feature of his insanity. In a few months he recovered his senses. He returned to his profession as an advocate, was sound and eminent in his practice; and in all respects a most useful and eminent member of society; but he never could dislodge from his mind the morbid delusion which disturbed it, and under the pressure, no doubt, of that diseased pre-possession, he disinherited his brother."—Mr. Erskine's Speech, ub. sup.

novelty and difficulty, I mean, in point of proof; for, really, in point of general principle, I do not see that Greenwood's case and the present are distinguishable. In speaking of Greenwood's case throughout I am to be understood as confining myself to the principle adopted as the law in that case: of the evidence, I can know nothing; publication of the evidence (if any) taken in Greenwood's case not having passed in this Court. Greenwood's case, in this Court, terminated early in a compromise; (a)[1] as it also terminated, [98] though not till after two conflicting verdicts, at common law.(a)[2]

The Court, after this ample discussion of the principles applicable to the facts of the case before it, now approaches, at some advantage, the facts of the case themselves. But it may be convenient, in preparatory to a discussion of that part of the evidence which requires to be thoroughly investigated, that the Court should dispose, in limine, of some facts which, either from the parties being agreed as to them, or from their being in the judgment of the Court of minor only, and very subordinate, importance in the cause, admit of being treated by the Court somewhat summarily. And, first, as to certain parts of the case, hardly in dispute between the parties.

1. It is pleaded by the nephews, in support of the deceased's capacity, that "the deceased had considerable practice as a surgeon and medical electrician," from the year 1795 to the year 1820; and that "he, at all times before, and down to the end of the year 1820, conducted and managed the whole of his pecuniary and domestic affairs in a rational manner; and rationally conducted all matters of business" until he was afflicted with a paralytic stroke, which impaired his intellects, towards the end of the last-mentioned year.

Now, the whole of this which is so pleaded by the nephews is fully proved; and the parties who pleaded, having so proved it, are clearly entitled to the full benefit of that whole. My only reason for [99] stating this part of their case somewhat generally is, as already suggested, that it is a part of the case as to which there is little, if any, conflicting evidence: it is not even denied by the daughter, generally, in plea. The single question as to this respects its effect on the whole case. That effect I take to be this. It is undoubtedly a strong, but it is by no means a conclusive, circumstance, against the case set up by the daughter; as it is not, by any means, wholly inconsistent with that case. The deceased might be, and do, all which he is deposed to have been, and to have done, in such respects—and might still be under a delusion, and therefore insane, on certain subjects—particularly on this of his daughter, as she, the daughter, in particular charges. Still, its effect undoubtedly is to require the very strictest evidence of this; and to render still more difficult of proof a case difficult enough of proof, in its own nature—as indeed the Court, it will be remembered, suggested the daughter's case to be, when the allegation pleading it stood before the Court on admission, after being debated (see vol. 1, p. 279, et seq.).

2. Secondly, of the exhibits annexed to the allegations filed on behalf of the nephews, something may be said here in preparatory, not inconveniently by the Court confining itself, however, in this place, to a mere general view of the contents of these. Now these exhibits (I mean that part of them consisting of letters from the deceased) may, as contended, be, indeed, many of them undoubtedly are, forcibly and correctly written—they may, and do, furnish many proofs of strong powers of reasoning couched in as [100] strong and energetic language. But upon what premises are such reasonings founded? Are they true or false? are they realities; or are they fancies which have no basis but in the mere imagination of the deceased? The ultimate effect of these exhibits on the true point at issue in the cause must depend on the answers proper to be returned to these questions; which answers, again, are only to be collected from all the circumstances of the case, taken as a whole. If the facts bear out the letters, these last are among the strongest proofs of sanity; but in the other event, so far are these letters from being any proofs of sanity, that they actually themselves evince the contrary, or that the writer of them was really insane.

(a)[1] After an allegation given by the brother, responsive to the condidit—upon which, however, it is believed that no evidence was taken—

The Court, it should be said, also referred, in this part of its judgment, to a case actually determined, partly on the principle adopted as law in Greenwood's case, that of Heath v. Watts, Pr. 1798, Del. 1800.

(a)[2] The jury finding for the will on the first trial in the Court of King's Bench; and against it on the second trial in the Court of Common Pleas.

3. Thirdly, of the evidence on the condidit, the Court may dispose here, in limine, for the same reason, with a single observation. In proof of the condidit have been examined two of the three subscribed witnesses to the will—one of these being also the solicitor who prepared or drew it up. It may be sufficient to say of this, once for all, that if the question at issue rested upon their sole evidence, there could be no doubt as to the result. Their evidence would, in that case, be amply sufficient to sustain the will. The solicitor deposes fully to instructions for the will given by the deceased, with whom he had several interviews on the subject as the will was in course of preparation; and he deposes fully to his belief that the deceased was at all such times of sound mind. He also, with the other subscribed witness, proves the deceased to have executed the will; and to have then also been, according to his conviction (and so says the other witness), in full possession of his memory and understanding. Proofs, too, are before [101] the Court, taken upon this plea, to the death, character, and hand-writing of the third subscribed witness—which account for, and supply in a manner not unsatisfactory, the absence of the testimony of this third subscribed witness. I have only to add to this that the counsel for Mrs. Dew have abstained from any argument tending at all to impeach the sincerity of the witnesses on the condidit.

So much, then, for those parts of the case as to which the parties, in a certain sense, are agreed. Next, to dispose summarily of certain points, which seem to admit of being so disposed of; as being in the judgment of the Court of minor and subordinate importance in the cause.

1. At the head of these may be fairly reckoned, in the judgment of the Court, the conduct of the several parties, as to which there is much in the evidence, subsequent to the death of the deceased. On the one hand, it is pleaded and proved as to this that the daughter, to a certain extent, acquiesced in the will, for some time previous to the institution of the present suit. On the other, it is pleaded and proved that the daughter was induced so to acquiesce by certain promised arrangements on the part of the nephews, under which she, the daughter, was to participate largely in the property of the deceased, notwithstanding the will; which promises not being fulfilled by the nephews, led to the institution of the present suit on her part. This I take to be, at least, the substance of what is pleaded and proved by the several parties respectively on this head; and the effect of the one shewing, upon this view of it, is to my mind pretty much neutralized by that of the other. But be that as it may, the whole [102] of this can have little bearing upon the real question at issue—depending, this, not at all upon what took place subsequent to the death of the deceased; but upon his state of mind three years and a half before his death, when this will bears date.

2. As little importance, in my view of it, can be attached to the circumstance that the deceased in February, 1821, was found to have been a lunatic only from the first day of January preceding. This is pleaded and proved by the nephews; and here again (a circumstance which perfectly neutralizes its effect) it is also pleaded and proved on Mrs. Dew's part that the petition for the commission of lunacy was applied for and obtained by Mary Stott, the then wife of the deceased; and that the inquisition taken under that commission was executed without the same, or either of them, being communicated to the daughter, or her husband; who, accordingly, were entirely unacquainted with, and strangers to, the whole proceeding. And even were this not so—could the daughter and her husband be shewn to have been privies to the proceeding—still it could be opposed in no sense to proof now furnished on her part, of the deceased's insanity at the time of the making of this will, that he was found lunatic on the inquisition from a period only subsequent to that time, as we all know.

3. Still less weight, in my view of it, has the circumstance pleaded by the daughter, of a verdict against the nephews in the year 1822, in an action at common law, brought by the daughter in respect to certain freehold property of which the deceased died possessed. It even appears that the deceased's sanity was not put in issue on that occasion by the nephews—the nephews declining, at the expense of costs, going to a [103] trial upon the deceased's sanity before a jury, as she, the daughter, invited them to do by means of that action; and by preference submitting that question, in the first instance at least, to the judgment of this Court. They had a perfect right so to act if they thought fit; nor can their choice in this respect be objected to their prejudice. But the deceased's capacity not having been put in issue in that action, of course nothing is to be inferred from the verdict as to what the finding of the jury would have been had it been put in issue. And lastly, had this even been put in issue, and found against by the jury, still, notwithstanding, on proof of capacity here it would be the duty of this Court to pronounce for the will; and to leave the nephews by this in possession of that property of the deceased (his personal property), upon which, and which only, a sentence of this Court can have any effect—though the verdict, that is, might have put the daughter in undisturbed possession of his real property; (a) a verdict, too, founded upon proof made to a jury that the deceased was incapable of devising his real property at the time of his making and executing this identical will.

The Court having thus disposed as well of the principles applicable to this case as of some parts of it which seemed to admit of being summarily dealt with, for reasons already explained, now addresses itself to the case in those other and more important particulars, the evidence as to which requires to be thoroughly sifted, in order to arrive at any thing like a true estimate of the merits of this whole question. [104] And in so doing, it purposes to proceed in the following order:—

I. In the first place, to state the general effect at least of the whole evidence: 1st. As to those peculiar feelings and habits, of which the deceased's whole character is pleaded by the nephews, in apology, if I may so term it, for some parts of his conduct, to have been made up. 2dly. As to the character and conduct through life, differently pleaded, and undertaken to be proved, by the parties respectively of the daughter of the deceased. 3dly. As to the uniform treatment of that daughter by the deceased; also differently pleaded and undertaken to be proved on her part, and that of the nephews, the respective parties in this cause. And in commenting, both by the way and in conclusion, upon this evidence, the Court will have ample opportunities of delivering its judgment, whether the daughter's principal case of insanity, quoad hanc, is proved on the one hand; or whether the evidence is such, on the other hand, as to acquit the deceased altogether of delusion or insanity on that score: which is the case that the nephews have principally undertaken to sustain: the Court will then proceed.

II. In the second place, to consider the evidence as to those other less material but still not unimportant particulars, in which the deceased is also pleaded by the daughter (who here, again, is met and encountered by the nephews, either in plea, or through the medium of interrogatories) to have been, and to have conducted himself as, a person of unsound mind—particulars, I mean, in which she, the daughter, had no manner of concern; and which, consequently, have no relation to, or connection with, his treatment of her [105] in particular. And the Court's object in considering this other evidence will chiefly be to ascertain, and to determine, the proof of which principal case, that of the daughter, or that of the nephews, both as explained above, this other evidence, on both sides, is best calculated to assist. And the facts of the whole case being ascertained by these means, in the Court's view of them, it will then only remain,

III. Thirdly, that the Court should state its impression as to the legal result upon the question at ultimate issue—the validity, or the contrary, of the contested will.

Under the one or the other of these general heads nearly the whole mass of evidence taken in this cause (which, in point of bulk, I conceive, has no example) will, in turn, present itself to the Court, to be stated and commented upon. In undertaking so to state and comment upon that evidence, the Court is aware that it is pledging itself to the performance of a laborious, if not a difficult, office. But it is a labour this, which it feels itself bound to undergo; it is a difficulty this, which it holds itself obliged to encounter, in order to render its judgment in the case, if not satisfactory to both parties (of which there can be no hope), still intelligible to both; and intelligible, at the same time, to the profession, and, through the profession, to the public: which has a manifest interest that the judgment of the Court in a case, especially a novel case, of this magnitude should be so delivered as not to be easily susceptible of mistake or misrepresentation.

I. First, then, with respect to what is pleaded by the nephews, as in apology, for some parts of the con-[106]-duct of the deceased—prefacing this only by a general outline of the admitted history of the deceased.

(a) The deceased's real property, it should be said, was of no great value.

(1) The deceased, I have said, died at the age of 72. His origin was obscure, and little appears of his early history. He told the witness, Mr. Paternoster, that he had been apprenticed to an apothecary in Yorkshire; and came to London, at the expiration of his indentures, to "seek his fortune." But the Court suspects, as the witness did, the truth of this statement on his part—it is rather proved (what, indeed, his nephews plead) that the deceased, in early life, had been a gentleman's servant. However, when Mr. Paternoster first knew him, some time in the year 1788, he was a clerk in the Ordnance Office (a situation procured for him by Lord Clive, whose daughter's waiting-maid he had married), and resided at chambers in the Temple. By this (first) wife he had two children—the one, still-born; the other, a daughter, named Charlotte Mary, the present Mrs. Dew, born in November, 1788. The mother died soon after her confinement. The witness Paternoster's acquaintance with the deceased commenced at the house of a Mr. Birch, a surgeon, in Essex-street; with whom the witness resided as a pupil. The deceased, at that time, was intimate with Mr. Birch, and attended his lectures on electricity; being fond of medical studies and pursuits, though not, at that time, professionally engaged in them. He subsequently, however, commenced student, in form, at St. Thomas's hospital, and, after the usual attendances as a pupil at that hospital, was examined, and admitted to practise as a surgeon, by the surgeons' company, in the month of February, 1795. [107] He then established himself in business in Bishopsgate Street, where his principal employment was that of an accoucheur. But in 1798 he removed to Hart Street, Bloomsbury; where he continued to reside till his death; and where his practice was nearly confined to medical electricity. His patients, in this line, were numerous; many of them persons of rank; and by this principally the deceased acquired that considerable property of which, I have said, that he died possessed. He married a second wife in 1814, who died in 1816; and a third in 1818, who survived him, being an annuitant in the sum of 400l., and an executrix, under this contested will. Such is a general outline of the deceased's history. Next, to

His character, as represented by the legatees. Now they describe him, in the second article of their plea, as a man of an "irritable and violent temper; of great pride and conceit; very precise in all his domestic and other arrangements; very impatient of contradiction;" and embued with "high notions of parental authority." His religious persuasions they plead to have been the same with those of "persons who are usually denominated Methodists, Calvinists, or evangelical persons." Finally, they plead that the deceased "frequently expressed himself by reference to scriptural language and imagery; and entertained rigid notions of the total and absolute depravity of human nature, of the necessity of sensible conversion, and of the necessity or expediency of persons confessing to each other the most secret thoughts of the heart."

Such, in substance, are represented by the nephews, in their plea, to have been the peculiar temper and feelings upon certain points of the deceased. In sup- [108] -port of that representation they have produced a variety of witnesses, whose depositions on this head are very various, and some not very accordant. Several of the witnesses are ignorant of any facts to bear out the representation in parts of it—others, as to parts of it, more than bear it out—that is, go beyond the plea. There are few, if any, of the witnesses to whom the deceased seems to have betrayed the whole of his character, even as this is put in plea by the nephews. For instance, Mrs. Desormeaux, what representation does this witness, who has been much relied on in support of the deceased's sanity, give of the character of the deceased? She says in her deposition on the 2d article of the allegation, given in by the nephews, that "the deceased was, as articulate, a man of an irritable and violent temper, exceedingly self-willed, and impatient of contradiction, and had his full share of pride and conceit; he was very precise and exact in his domestic arrangements, and had certainly very high notions of parental authority; if he said to his child that such a thing was to be done, there was no disobeying or contradicting him." "His religion," says the witness, "was that of the Church of England—of his being a Calvinist, she knows no more than that it was Church of England calvinism. If his notions of religion were correct, which she believes them to have been, she concludes that he did believe (but then it is no more than the Church of England believes) that human nature is totally and absolutely depraved; that an entire change of the heart must take place; and that of this change or conversion a man must be sensible—but of his notions on the subject of persons confessing to each other the secret thoughts of their hearts, &c., she knows nothing."
